Why I am not satisfied with the minister's response on source protection is this, and I've said this before. In 1999, the then Minister of the Environment, Tony Clement, said that they were looking at source protection, and then it appeared as though nothing happened. Walkerton came along and I brought forward my Safe Drinking Water Act, and nothing happened with that for two years. I implored, I asked question after question, I had petitions out all over the communities to get that bill at least up for reading so that, after a second reading, we could get it out to committee—which the government never agreed to. When it did pass second reading in this House, what the government members did was very clever, very cute, like a fox. They supported the bill, because how could they not support a Safe Drinking Water Act? It was a good bill. So what they did was vote yes to the bill, but then—and this is procedural stuff, so people out there can understand it: once a private member's bill passes in this place, we can stand up and ask for the bill to go to a government committee, which is what I did. I asked for it to go to general government so that we could take it out to public hearings and bring it back into the House after amendments were made. The government then voted that down after voting for the bill and sent it to something called the committee of the whole House. We all know in this place that when a bill—and the government members knew full well what they were doing—is sent to the committee of the whole House, it goes nowhere. It's dead. It's finished. That's what they did to my Bill 3. So we wasted all of this time, in terms of moving on with the Safe Drinking Water Act and the source protection act that the government had said they were working on.

Then, on the day the government introduced the Safe Drinking Water Act, they announced that they're moving forward with source protection but they still are setting up an advisory committee to advise them on how to do it. That's why it's a problem that there is not that legislative link with this bill, and we don't know when it's coming. If they're just setting up an advisory committee now and we don't know who's going to be on it, that is really problematic. Because source protection is far more complicated than the pipes and pumps aspect of the Safe Drinking Water Act. It involves agriculture, land use, urban sprawl, other ministries.

Having said that, I will repeat again, so hopefully the minister will know that I have made some other quite legitimate criticisms of this bill—and I will be making amendments to try to improve the bill. Because what the government said at the time when they were willing to introduce or carry on with my bill was that they would amend it but improve it based on Justice O'Connor's recommendations, and I supported that. I thought that was a good idea because I wrote my bill without the benefit of Justice O'Connor's recommendations. He took a different approach. He recommended that source protection be dealt with under an amendment to the Environmental Protection Act. He dealt with the Safe Drinking Water Act more from the pipes and pumps perspective, the treatment and delivery of water. That's fine. But I also see Justice O'Connor's recommendations as the floor; that if it's possible to improve upon it, we should. We shouldn't take it as a ceiling and say, "Justice O'Connor said do exactly this" and not actually improve it.

So some things are missing from the Safe Drinking Water Act, and Justice O'Connor certainly didn't say, "If you can improve upon it, don't do it. Just follow my recommendations." The public right to know is something I've brought up before, and for the record, I will say again, that's a big piece that's missing from the government's version of the Safe Drinking Water Act. That is a big piece of the American Safe Drinking Water Act, which they've had in place for over 25 years. As we know, one of the problems out of several that were found which led to the awful situation in Walkerton was that not only was the reporting all messed up because of the privatization of the labs, which happened so quickly, but also the notification to the community was delayed. Part of my bill went into great detail about the public right to know. I've discussed in this House on other occasions and even showed samples of the kind of notification I'm talking about, as well as a registry. That has all been left out of the government's Safe Drinking Water Act. I think that's one of the key things.

Some of the other things that have been left out are—I mentioned the registry. That's an electronic form containing all test results, copies of COAs, accredited labs, bad test notices.

The other one has to do with how people suffering damages may bring court action. I will say again, Justice O'Connor recommended against that; I recognize that. He said the government should stay away from that and bring in a certain standard of care. But I still argue that this bill—there's a compromise here: that people should have that right, and the way to do it would be to bring the whole Safe Drinking Water Act under the Environmental Bill of Rights. Once something comes under the Environmental Bill of Rights, it is subject to investigation if people request it and the Environmental Commissioner deems it is worthy of an investigation and, secondly, people under certain circumstances would have the right to sue. Maybe that's the best compromise. There are certainly other bills that come under the Environmental Bill of Rights, and this would be a good bill, in my view, to put under that.

Another piece that's missing is requiring the minister to conduct research. This is something that was a big piece of many requirements I wanted to see the minister do, and that included dealing with source and groundwater protection, which admittedly, because mine was a private member's bill, needed to be improved and built upon. But that was part of my bill, to have the minister directly deal with source protection.

One of the big pieces that's missing, and I know the minister is not going to put this in the bill but it's absolutely critical, is what I call a safe drinking water fund, which was part of Bill 3, my Safe Drinking Water Act. You can have the best legislation and the best regulations in the world, but if you do not have the resources to have the inspectors, the people to enforce the law, the scientists to do the tests and all of those things, then it's not worth the paper it's written on.

We've seen that already after the massive cuts to the Ministry of the Environment. Justice O'Connor goes into great detail in discussing how that impacted on what happened in Walkerton, and indeed advised the government—it wasn't one of his recommendations because he felt it was not in his mandate, but he made a point of saying he was very concerned about the downloading. He called it restructuring, but I call it downloading to the municipalities, particularly around social services, which municipalities were scrambling to cover. He suggested the government review that downloading to see what kind of impact it was having on municipalities, particularly in light of calling for full cost recovery of water services.

That has not been touched upon in this bill. It is being dealt with under the other water bill before us, but the minister told me, and I'm sure he's right, that he didn't put it in the Safe Drinking Water Act because we would disagree about the amount and he's hoping to have a bill that we can at least all live with. I understand that. I'm happy to see that safe drinking water fund in the other bill, as long as it's adequate.

But I don't see any signs of the government putting the resources back in the ministry or enough resources back into the whole water area to make this act work. I understand that municipalities are very nervous about these two bills, particularly the smaller ones, many of which have not been able to fulfill the requirements of the new regulations the government brought in after Walkerton happened. I know that not all the money that was supposed to be allocated under SuperBuild has been spent, that some municipalities applied and for whatever reason didn't get it, and that money has now gone back into the consolidated revenue, which I find extremely alarming, given what we're hearing about municipalities that have recently been charged and are before the courts on some of these infractions.

These are some of my concerns about the Safe Drinking Water Act as it's now written. There are other things in the bill that I have concerns with, and they're more technical but could really make a difference. There are parts of the bill that say "a minister may" or "the ministry may" instead of "the ministry shall." It opens it up to too much discretion on the part of the minister or the ministry. Those are the kinds of things we have to look at.

There are a couple of big pieces I would like to see incorporated into the bill, like the purpose of the act, which has been watered down, so to speak. The purpose in my bill is much stronger and really sets the tone for what the bill should accomplish. The public's right to know and the registry are vital. I know I'm not going to get the safe drinking water fund in here, and I still would like to see it here, but I want to see the government in some way put dedicated funding back into our water system. Several other amendments will be more technical in nature around strengthening the bill.

So I would say to Mr Stockwell, the Minister of the Environment, that I have pointed out on many occasions over the past week or so, when I've had the opportunity to speak to those bills at length, and have put on the record and have again today, the concerns I have about the Safe Drinking Water Act.

I've also been fair. I believe the government followed fairly closely Justice O'Connor's recommendations for a safe drinking water bill from his point of view, around looking at it from the pipes and pumps perspective: safe delivery of the water once it comes out of the tap. The problem is that there are some pieces from my bill that could have improved on that that Justice O'Connor talked about. In fact, he talked quite a bit about the public's right to know. He hasn't recommended, as far as I know, where it should go, but he certainly talked about it as being very important. This is the perfect bill to include that piece in.

I'll wrap up by talking again about source protection. We will be watching the government very closely and holding their heels to the fire on this one, because we know that with this bill and the nutrient management bill but without source protection, another Walkerton could happen. That's just not acceptable.

I understand an awful lot of work still needs to be done, and that's going to mean properly funding the conservation authorities as well, because the government cut, I believe, up to 70% of the conservation authorities. They also, when they came to power, cut the CURB program, the clean up rural beaches program, which the NDP brought in and which dealt directly with keeping manure out of our waterways, working directly with the farmers on that. They also got rid of the green planning act, which of course dealt directly with source protection, because it stipulated where and how developers could build—or not at all—in environmentally sensitive areas. As Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations in the NDP government, I brought in the toughest regulations in North America around leaking underground storage tanks.

There were a lot of things the NDP started to do around source protection. It needed to be improved upon and all brought together, and there was more work to be done. What this government did in fact was to walk in and, of all this work that had been done and put in place, most of it was taken away and resources cut and the ministry cut to the bone. A lot of the work that had taken place was completely stopped in its tracks. Now the government is scrambling to put together a source protection act, which I'm going to tell you right now is going to include a lot of the things that were in that green planning act and the CURB program.

I'm disappointed the minister feels he had to time-allocate this. I know many of my colleagues who haven't had an opportunity to speak on the bill will now not have that opportunity. I'm very disappointed that the government did not allow more time for hearings and disappointed that they've been bundled and we have to do two bills, very important bills, within, I think, the course of a week. I understand it's going to be the week after constituency week, the week after next.

We won't be in the House—I guess we'll get special permission to do that—and we'll be travelling around. I agree we should not be just in larger cities, but particularly we need to be in the rural areas where it's probably going to have the biggest impact.

Thank you for this opportunity. I will leave the rest of the time to my colleagues who are waiting anxiously to have an opportunity to speak to this bill.

Mr Ernie Hardeman (Oxford): I'm pleased to have this opportunity to take part in the debate on the proposed Safe Drinking Water Act. As you will remember, Mr Speaker, in his presentation the minister did an eloquent job of explaining the closure motion before us, to facilitate the passage of the Safe Drinking Water Act. He spoke about his reluctance to have to do it, but also explained to us all the reasons it had to be done, to facilitate the passing of this bill, so I won't spend a lot of my time on that.

Our government is committed to ensuring that Ontario has and enforces the best and the toughest clean water policies in the world.

In part two of his Report of the Walkerton Inquiry, Commissioner O'Connor was firm about Ontario's need for legislation that would ensure the safety and sustainability of our drinking water.

The proposed bill supports the delivery of 50 of the 93 recommendations in part two of the report. For the purpose of this discussion, I will focus my comments on the compliance and enforcement provisions in the proposed bill. A key priority for this government is to include the public in its decision-making process. To this end our objective is to implement all of the recommendations of the O'Connor report as clear evidence of this commitment. In balance with this consultative approach, however, is our unwavering commitment to set and enforce tough environmental standards. A number of recommendations related to compliance and enforcement are nested within recommendation number 67 of the proposed Safe Drinking Water Act. In addition, Commissioner O'Connor made the following recommendations:

"Recommendation 72: The provincial government should create an office of Chief Inspector—Drinking Water Systems."

"Recommendation 73: Inspectors should be required to have the same or higher" degree of "qualifications as the operators of the systems they inspect and should receive special training in inspections." In other words, we have to be more knowledgeable than those whom we are inspecting.

"Recommendation 74: The Ministry of the Environment should increase its commitment to the use of mandatory abatement."

"Recommendation 75: The Ministry of the Environment should increase its commitment to strict enforcement of all regulations and provisions related to the safety of drinking water."

"Recommendation 76: The Ministry of the Environment should initiate a process whereby the public can require the investigations and enforcement branch to investigate alleged violations of drinking water provisions."

The bill would modernize and strengthen the laws that protect the quality of our environment. We propose to strengthen compliance and enforcement provisions and we will create a new position of chief inspector. We are prepared to take a tough stand and give our chief inspector the tools he or she needs to enforce the proposed Safe Drinking Water Act. The duties of the chief inspector for drinking water systems are defined in our proposed act. We believe these duties provide the chief inspector with the level of authority he or she needs to effectively fulfill his or her obligations.

For example, the chief inspector of drinking water shall: provide advice and recommendations to the content of the ministry's inspection policies and be responsible for implementing that policy; be responsible for developing and updating the inspection protocol; be responsible for developing, updating and implementing the inspection training program; monitor the overall frequency and adequacy of inspections; report to the public about the overall performance of Ontario's water supply systems and inspections program; and perform any other duties as may be prescribed by regulation. As time goes on the minister can, by regulation, increase the number of regulations that would empower the inspector.

Specific compliance and enforcement provisions will include the following: systems with deficiencies must have a follow-up inspection within one year—again, that was one of the items in the O'Connor report that suggested there was not enough follow-up after deficiencies were found; the minister will have explicit authority to issue directives on inspection policies and protocols; the Ministry of the Environment will also train inspectors to ensure that they have the same or higher level of qualifications of the systems they inspect. As well, they will receive special training in inspections; and we will also establish clear procedures for addressing requests from the public for the investigation of alleged offences. In addition to being guided by Commissioner O'Connor's report, the proposed compliance and enforcement provisions are already based on a strong foundation.

In the report Managing the Environment: A Review of Best Practices, we have outlined a framework for this government to move forward with a vision that will enable the Ministry of the Environment to carry out its core business of environmental protection more effectively. The bill is consistent with the concepts of the Managing the Environment Report and is based on the premise that in order to ensure sound environmental stewardship, Ontario must have clear laws, stringent regulations and tough standards in place. It also sets the stage to move beyond what is required by law, and adopt an ethic of continuous improvement.

There are also several compliance and enforcement provisions of the proposed bill that build on the Environmental Protection Act and the Ontario Water Resources Act. These provisions include: inspection powers similar to the powers in the Environmental Protection Act and the Ontario Water Resources Act, such as entry to dwellings, seizures and use of force; new powers for provincial officers to inspect labs that test drinking water; director's and minister's orders to deal with imminent drinking water health hazards; orders to decommission or replace systems; the appointment of an interim operating authority or proven alternative service delivery; and penalties that are consistent with the Environmental Protection Act and the Ontario Water Resources Act. We did, however, increase the fines for subsequent offences for individuals who cause a drinking water health hazard from $6 million to $7 million. This is consistent with the proposed fines in Ms Churley's private member's bill.

As well, the proposed bill includes other powers that are needed for the effective functioning of the bill. These powers are aligned with the Environmental Protection Act and include such key elements as control orders, stop orders, remedial orders, preventive orders and program approvals.

In the past year we've worked hard to ensure that Ontario's drinking water is the best and safest drinking water in Canada. We will continue such programs as Operation Clean Water and move forward on a comprehensive strategy to protect Ontario's groundwater. We will work to increase the amount of waste diverted from landfills and develop a framework for cleaning up contaminated lands.

Through the proposed creation of the new position of chief inspector, this government's vision of strengthened environmental management will take even firmer hold. We will rely on contributions from all Ontarians to support the chief inspector's role in compliance and enforcement.

I urge all members to support the proposed Safe Drinking Water Act and to pass it as quickly as possible to benefit all the people of Ontario.

Thank you very much, Mr Speaker, for allowing me a few moments to speak to the bill.

Mr Bradley: As I always do when we're dealing with a time allocation motion, I express my concern that the government has once again resorted to a time allocation motion, which has the effect of choking off debate in the Legislative Assembly.

It would have been my preference to have an extended debate on this matter. I thought the government House leader made a good case in a couple of other bills for shortened debate. I've always believed there are some bills that should pass the House with very little debate because there's a consensus, they are simple bills and so on.

This is one that has some significant ramifications. This is the kind of bill that should have all members of the Legislature who wish to speak to it, speak to its specific provisions. We won't have the time to do so because the bill is being time-allocated and others won't have that chance to bring up, as my colleague from Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke did, the instances of the smaller towns. That's one of the concerns I have about this bill that is being time-allocated this afternoon.

For the regional municipality of Niagara or, if you want, the city of St Catharines, it will be onerous because there are new responsibilities that must fall upon the local government, and those responsibilities will cost money. It is likely, however, though it will be somewhat of an imposition, that the larger municipalities, with a larger tax base, will be able to implement the provisions without too much pain to that community, though it is going to have some impact.

Where we will see it is in the kinds of towns, villages and hamlets the member for Pembroke mentioned in his constituency and across the province. What is implied in the recommendations, and they were solid recommendations, in my view, from Justice O'Connor, is that it is going to require, first of all, for the Ministry of the Environment the hiring of a significant number of additional staff, the provision of probably millions of dollars of additional funding, and of course the clout necessary for the ministry to be able to carry out its obligations under this bill. That is where some of the resistance will come.

I think in general people will say, "You know, we need this kind of legislation." I found in the bill some very supportable provisions and I think people would find that. But what you're going to find is that in the smaller municipalities, or where there are exceptional cases where water is supplied to just a small number of people, it is going to be extremely onerous. This is where I think the provincial government must give an undertaking, with the passage of this bill, to be a funding partner along with those local municipalities. I remind you that that cost will not only be a capital cost but it will be an ongoing operating cost for those municipalities.

Second, as I have mentioned previously, I would have preferred that we deal with the source of the contamination in legislation of this kind or in parallel legislation. Let me tell you why I think it perhaps would have been important, I won't say ahead of this piece of legislation but as part of or in partnership with this legislation. If you protect the raw water supply for many of these communities, you will find that all the sophisticated equipment and all the details of this bill would be less relevant. I'm not saying they wouldn't be important enough, but if you deal with the contamination in the raw water supply itself, you go a long way to protecting the drinking water in any specific area. So I have a concern about that.

The bill did not take into account some of the serious and reasonable suggestions of the Canadian Environmental Law Association, which has had a long history of calling for this kind of legislation and of dealing with the details of it. I had a chance to meet with members of CELA, as it's called, to discuss specific aspects of this bill. Although they had not seen the legislation, they did draw to my attention what they felt should be in such legislation. So I find it unfortunate that we will not have members from various communities who will be able to get up and perhaps isolate some provisions of the bill that may be of great significance to their municipalities.

I know as well that those who are involved with conservation authorities and those who in the past have worked for the Ministry of Natural Resources and the Ministry of the Environment and have had their jobs chopped will be able to tell us how important it is going to be to restore that staff. I mention the Ministry of Natural Resources, because a lot of people don't recognize that they are also involved in water quality issues themselves and through their association with conservation authorities across Ontario.

I also have a concern about municipalities selling their operation to the private sector, although I must say the concern may be greater in the companion bill, Bill 175, dealing with full cost accounting. I would hope the government would include as its own amendment, if not accepting an opposition amendment, a provision in both these bills that would call for the retention in public ownership of water systems in this province. I don't have a problem with OCWA, the Ontario Clean Water Agency, which provides some of these services and indeed came to the rescue in Walkerton at a key time. It is a quasi-governmental or crown corporation type of operation in which I think a lot of people have some considerable trust. I do have a problem, though, when municipalities faced with these new obligations feel compelled to completely sell and relinquish the ownership of their water systems because, again, I feel that's something that should remain in the public domain. There are a lot of things that I believe should remain in the public domain, and there are some that of course should be in the private sector.

There are going to be hearings. I listened with some interest again to the member for Pembroke, who suggested that we usually go with these hearings to the major metropolitan or urban areas in the province. I think there was a suggestion on his part that perhaps we, as a committee, might want to visit some of the other smaller communities that will be impacted by this, or if we are in larger metropolitan or urban areas, at least ensure they're close enough that people from smaller municipalities can make their views known.

We will also want to hear from the environmental community, which has studied this problem and had a great interest in this problem over the years. We will want to hear from experts in the field of the protection of water supplies and the treatment of water in the province, because there are new methods. I recall—it wasn't that long ago—a report that came out saying that some 20 or 30 municipalities of some considerable size did not have water filtration systems. North Bay was one of them, at the time; I was quite surprised by that. They did chlorinate the water, because you have to ensure you're killing the bacteria that can be a problem. However, there was not a filtration system that would catch a problem such as cryptosporidium, which has had an impact and made a number of people ill in some communities. So I want to see that happen, those new systems implemented. I think, partially as a result of one bill, the other bill and some public pressure, we will see those kinds of systems implemented. I wish we didn't have to. A lot of people said, "Wouldn't it be nice if we just drew our water from a spring and drink the water the way they used to in the old days?" Well, that's simply not the way we can do it today, particularly—and I see the Minister of Agriculture and Food here today—when we have much larger farming operations in the province, which have an impact on water supplies.

There are some who say that the people who are going to be most resistant to the Nutrient Management Act or most resistant to this kind of legislation are going to be members of the farming community. Wrong. These are people who themselves rely so very often on ground-water or well water, and not on the so-called sophisticated treatment systems that large urban areas have. So they have a vested interest in protecting the water supplies of the province. It is something we must do, something we must assist our rural municipalities with. I know the Minister of Agriculture and Food will be advocating within the government for substantial funding to assist those smaller communities that have to meet the justifiably onerous obligations that are found within this particular bill.

I also have a bit of concern, and I will wander a bit from this bill, but since we're in a time allocation situation, I guess I can do it.

Hon Helen Johns (Minister of Agriculture and Food): What else is new?

Mr Bradley: The Minister of Agriculture and Food says, "What else is new," but in this case the wandering will be a very short distance away.

It's what is happening to fixed-income and lower-income people in the province. The problem with theory of full cost accounting and of people paying exactly what it costs for all costs that are associated with providing drinking water and dealing with the sewage is that a lot of low-income and fixed-income people are confronted with—and you know what I'm going to say now—huge, spiralling increases in charges for power and for insurance premiums. People are finding, as they get their premium notices, that insurance premiums are going up. The last I looked, the cost of natural gas wasn't going downward; it was going upward. When they go to the pump to buy gasoline for their vehicle, that cost is up considerably if you look at two or three years ago and what it is today. All these basic costs that people have to meet are going up.

If you said the cost of cigarettes is going up or the cost of booze is going up or the cost of some other things that are not considered to be essentials of life is going up, some people would say, "Well, the cost is going up. That's a frill." But when you're dealing with these costs, and then someone says you're going to be hit with huge increases in your water bill, one says, "Let's have the provincial government as a funding partner in this regard. Let's have them help out; there's a larger tax base." Or even within municipalities, there may be some funds that could be derived from the tax base to assist in meeting this cost. Of course, we want conservation to be an important component, and we hope conservation will emerge with these two bills.

An interesting thing happens, though, that makes people a bit suspicious of this, and maybe a bit cynical; I've seen it happen from time to time. They'll say, "If only you reduce your consumption of water, your bill will go down." But then the unit cost tends to go up to maintain the operation of all the equipment. So you can reduce, say by 10%, the amount of water you're using, and the amount of sewage that you produce as a result, because the water is going down the drain. But on the other hand, the municipality may turn around and say, "We need these funds, by the way, so we're going to increase by 10% the cost per unit"—per gallon or per litre or whatever we use today. That tends to make people a bit suspicious and cynical and it's a bit worrisome.

I wish we could have had more time in the House for individual members to talk about this legislation.

Interjection.

Mr Bradley: No, I cannot do that.

Interjection.

The Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Bradley: But I do want to say that I hope in the committee hearings we're able to hear from a broad spectrum of people of Ontario to look at the ramifications of the bill, because I know that on the government benches there is not unanimity on this bill either. That's to be expected, with the large number of people there.

I look forward to what is coming. I will vote against it, as I do vote against every time allocation motion that comes before this House. But I do so knowing at least that there are going to be some public hearings, and I wish that we would see some considerable third reading debate as well.

The Deputy Speaker: Further debate?

Mr Marchese: Thank you, speaker. I took the tie off. It was getting too stuffy in here.

Mr David Caplan (Don Valley East): Kormos is having an effect on you.

Mr Marchese: It liberates you from time to time. Do you notice how free you feel, a "free at last" kind of thing?

I'm happy to have this opportunity to speak to the bill, but happier to speak to the closure part of this bill, reminding you that the Minister of the Environment spent literally half an hour to talk mostly on, "Wouldn't it be nice to be able to work together? Why don't we come together? Why can't we agree on stuff that we agree so that we can facilitate things and just move them along? Why is it that these things can't happen?"

He was very sincere, which is an unusual stance for Stockwell, the Minister of the Environment, because I do remember Chris when he was just about here in opposition. If you had heard him then, Speaker, and you weren't here at that time, you would say that he is a reformed man, that he has seen the light and he has changed and is urging the rest of the members to do the same. Why, when he was here, he wouldn't let anything pass. When he was here he would be ringing bells day in and day out. If someone would say to Chris, "Chris, would you mind if I just step out for a moment? I've got something to do. Please don't call for the bells," Chris Stockwell would be here, as soon as you stepped out those doors, to ring the bells. That was Chris then. Chris would use every opportunity to stall, to be an obstacle wherever possible to the then NDP government, because as he saw it, that was his job. His job was to be the opposition.

The member for St Catharines knows that our job as opposition members is to oppose. It's unusual to hear members from this assembly, and in particular the member from Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke, say that the political system is diseased, I believe—yes, I think that's what he said—is diseased, irremediably so, he argues—a frank discussion, a frank point of view that we're never going to be able to debate in this place. It's sad because it could be easier. We could make the parliamentary process a little easier. But you see, because so many of these Conservative members who are here—there are seven. Only one of them was here in the reign of the New Democrats and only he, Mr Turnbull, would remember the role they played in opposition: to obstruct the then NDP government. The sad thing is that when you get into government you forget, Monsieur Beaubien. The sad thing is that Mr Turnbull forgot the way he used to behave as an opposition member, because he's now in government and his job now, of course, is to speed things along efficiently as best you can. The sad thing is he forgot what he did then, which makes it very difficult for the opposition to do differently from the way they behaved at the time.

Mr Rae, our former Premier, recalls that he made some mistakes in opposition. He regretted the manner in which he behaved on a number of occasions. The sad thing is that we regret it when we get into government. Then we get into opposition and we do the same. Then they get into government and they do the same. It will be fascinating, should the Liberals be in government, to see some of these members, who could potentially become ministers, use—

Interjection: That's not where you're putting your money, is it?

Mr Marchese: No, that's not the point I'm making. Because some of the Liberals are new at it and they're haranguing you guys day in and day out—as we do, to be fair—they make it appear that should they get into government, they will solve all the problems. We know that many cannot be solved, but when they get into government, if they do, the opposition will get the quotes from Mr Agostino and so many others, and say, “But Dominic, you used to say this when you were in government. Now you appear to be doing the same. Why, Dominic?” The poor man hasn't been in government, is in opposition, and the cycle of government and opposition continues. That is why it's so difficult. Monsieur Beaubien, c'est très difficile, you know, to reform the system. It's sad. I've got to admit, I am saddened.

I do support the frank views from the member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke, who is urging change but doesn't envision any change. I think he's right. What we witnessed at the federal level just the other day—and yes, there are political reasons—where 50 Liberal members voted with the Alliance so they can nominate and select their own chairs of their committees is an incredible event. It is historical in nature.

Yes, it is dumb, because Martin is in competition with Chrétien and it's a sad, pitiful kind of display that one sees, but it doesn't matter. The point is, through that bickering and division between Chrétien and Monsieur Martin, we're getting some reform. My suspicion is that if Martin gets elected as Prime Minister or appointed Prime Minister by his own members, he will not make any more changes, other than the one we just witnessed the other day, which is a very useful, parliamentary reform where committee members will actually get to choose their chairperson. It is true that the governing members will always have the majority to elect whom they want, but they would be a little more empowered not to listen to the Prime Minister or, in this case, should we be doing it here, to the Premier. It's a beautiful, liberating thing. This kind of reform is good for the system, but we're not capable of it.

I have to remind some of the Conservative members that after I was out of cabinet and went into some committee meetings, I recall saying to some of my staff, “I'm in agreement with some of what the opposition is saying” with respect to some bill that we were debating—

Interjection.

Mr Marchese: Not in your time; in my time. One of the staff couldn't believe that I said I wanted to support an amendment supported by the opposition parties because it seemed to me reasonable. He was in shock. He was in shock that I would propose it. You see, we are all trained that when you are in government, you support your minister and your government at all costs. It's wrong. We become automatons.

I've witnessed these members from the Conservative Party in all the committee meetings vote in tandem, vote en bloc each and every time. New Democrats did it, Conservatives do it, Liberals did it, and it's sad. It's a pitiful display of sheepish behaviour that doesn't become parliamentarians at all, but we repeat the problem over and over again.

Yes, wouldn't it be nice to be able to say, “We support this bill,” the Safe Drinking Water Act, and speed it through as best as we can? It would be nice to be able to do that. But we are not accustomed, because of the history we share in this place, to facilitate the work of government. It is not our job to facilitate the work of government. Yes, we could, if we reformed ourselves in a way that where there's agreement things could speed up a little better, but sadly, it's just not possible. It is impossible and I'm afraid, like the member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke, that the job of reforming ourselves and our culture is, quite frankly, very complicated.

We could play this role. You see, I've got this letter here that our House leader, Peter Kormos, wrote to Stockwell:

“Further to this morning's House leaders' meeting, I have spoken to Ms Churley, NDP critic for the environment, about your proposed trade-off between quick passage for three government bills in exchange for committee hearings on Bill 175, An Act respecting the cost of water and waste water services, and the yet-to-be introduced clean water bill.

“Ms Churley and I agree that committee hearings on the two bills from your ministry should in no way be compromised by other items on your House leader's agenda. You not only assured Ms Churley that extensive public hearings would occur, but indeed, you made the same commitment to the entire environmental community. Interested stakeholders are demanding to be heard, and we want to ensure that they get that opportunity.

"We are committed to participating in the full committee process on these important legislative matters, and would be pleased to work out a reasonable schedule for both public hearings and clause-by-clause consideration of the bills.

"We look forward to working out the committee schedule at the earliest possible opportunity," says our House leader to the House leader of the Conservative Party.

So here you have the problem: Chris Stockwell, the Minister of the Environment, stands up here today and says, "The NDP is just opposed to what we're doing." Yet we have a letter here that I just read and an understanding that Mr Stockwell, the Minister of the Environment, was not interested in discussing committee time until we agreed to quick passage of three government bills. Do you see the game? So when the Minister of the Environment stands up and appears to be so sincere that one is tempted to say, "Good God, we should be working with the man. He's trying his best to get this through. We're all in agreement. Why don't we work with him?" but as I read the letter—

Hon Tina R. Molinari (Associate Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing): Why didn't you? You're right. You should.

Mr Marchese: But as I read the letter, Mlle Molinari, this letter I just read on the record said that Chris Stockwell had conditions attached to this discussion. He said that if we passed three other bills quickly, we then could deal with this other issue in a different way or more expeditiously or—

Hon Mrs Molinari: It sounds like a good plan.

Mr Marchese: But he didn't say that, you see. He bundled the discussion in a way that makes it very difficult for our party to agree. The point I'm making is that here we have the supposed sincerity of the Minister of the Environment making it appear to the public watching that he is trying desperately hard, in all sincerity, to get a three-party agreement to move this thing along, but one party disagrees, and what can he do when he's desperately trying to bring us together to pass this Safe Drinking Water Act that is so good, the best in the world, and why would anybody impede the process of speeding up this bill that is so good?

It is sad, I say to those of you watching this parliamentary channel, that the parliamentary process is complicated, if not diseased, not permitting us to work together from time to time on bills we can agree on. Dear listeners all, we are all responsible here. We are all at fault. We have all done it in government and out of government. I wish it were different and maybe some day you, the public, will demand it, and maybe some day we might get a different kind of voting system that will make it impossible to have majority governments that will do what they want to do because they have a majority. Often we argue, and some say and defend, that minority governments are the best thing that could happen to any province, any country, because in a minority government you are very careful how you behave as a government, because you desperately rely on another political party for your survival, and therefore are cautious and more responsible and fair in your presentation of bills.

I think people need to address those issues, need to look at that. Majority governments often do not respond well to the majority of people in this province and in this country.

People should reflect on that as they come close to elections in terms of who they want to represent their constituency, whether or not they want majority governments or whether or not, as New Democrats propose, we move to a different kind of proportional representation system that guarantees that no vote is ever wasted, that no matter where you are and whoever you vote for, that vote will count. If we select a proportional representation system where we can agree that a portion of the seats is allotted on the basis of how much popular support a political party gets, then no vote is ever wasted. Your vote will count. More and more of you are likely to participate and get involved in elections and vote because that vote will matter. A proportional representation system will almost guarantee that we will not have majority governments, and that's something most of you could argue for and defend and urge your political parties to move to.

These are the kinds of suggestions I wanted to make on this suffocation motion. That's what closure motions are: the desire to end debate on any discussion before us. I'm happy to know this will go to committee hearings where a number of people will be able to have their say, to identify areas of weakness of the bill, hopefully where government will listen and improvements will be made.

Mr Gerry Martiniuk (Cambridge): I'm pleased to take part in the time allocation motion during the second reading debate on the proposed Safe Drinking Water Act, introduced on October 29, 2002, by the Honourable Chris Stockwell, Ontario's Minister of the Environment.

The development of this proposed bill was guided by 50 recommendations put forward by part two of the report of the Walkerton inquiry. In his report, Commissioner O'Connor envisioned that a Safe Drinking Water Act would gather in one place all the legislation and regulations relating to the treatment and distribution of drinking water.

To quote Commissioner O'Connor, recommendation 67 states, "The provincial government should enact a Safe Drinking Water Act to deal with matters related to the treatment and distribution of drinking water." The proposed Safe Drinking Water Act brings these recommendations together in one proposed bill.

My comments today will focus on those merits of the bill so far not covered by other members. Let me begin with the purpose of the proposed Safe Drinking Water Act, which is twofold: (1) to recognize that the people of Ontario are entitled to expect their drinking water to be safe; (2) to provide for the protection of human health through the regulation of drinking water systems and drinking water testing.

Some of the standard provisions of the proposed Safe Drinking Water Act have been replicated or transferred from the Environmental Protection Act and the Ontario Water Resources Act. These provisions provide authority to establish standard appeals processes to deal with the new requirements around licensing and approvals, and authority to establish regulations and provide for fees.

But there are also a number of new provisions in the proposed act. Under the proposed act, the Minister of the Environment is required to submit an annual State of Ontario's Drinking Water report to the Legislature. It is the intent to include in this report the status of drinking water quality standards and the quality of the drinking water in Ontario; the quality of raw water supplies and a review of source protection initiatives; drinking water standards, including discussions of new and emerging information on the pathogens; the results—that is to say, the pass-failure rates—of inspections and accreditation audits; a summary of enforcement activities; and any other matter prescribed by regulation.

Another new provision is a clear statement regarding the Ministry of the Environment's responsibility as the lead ministry for drinking water policy. The proposed Safe Drinking Water Act will also take precedence, meaning that the prescribed drinking water quality standards within the proposed act will apply to all other acts, regulations or bylaws.

Another important element of the proposed act is its emphasis on ensuring the public's access to information. The proposed Safe Drinking Water Act calls for an annual report to the Legislature, an annual report by the chief inspector, an annual report by the accreditation bodies, and public access to the contents of the operational plan and the results of laboratory audits and operating authority audits.

The Ministry of the Environment will continue to find ways to keep the public informed about water quality, including the use of electronic systems such as the ministry's Web site, which currently includes up-to-date information on adverse water quality on a site-by-site basis across Ontario.

An extension of the proposed act's focus on public information are its provisions for notifying the public if and when adverse drinking water test results occur. The proposed act requires an operating authority, an owner and a laboratory to immediately report all adverse test results for drinking water to the Ministry of the Environment and the medical officer of health. Where an adverse test result is reported and the local medical officer of health determines that there is a health risk, the officer is responsible for issuing a "boil water" advisory which notifies the public of the problem. Failure to notify the public of an adverse test result is a serious offence under the proposed act and subject to heavy fines and jail terms.

If passed into law, the proposed Safe Drinking Water Act will set a benchmark and provide an even stronger foundation for safe drinking water. It is an integral part of this government's commitment to its clean water strategy.

Operation Clean Water is the most comprehensive strategy ever undertaken in Ontario to ensure that our drinking water is clean and safe. Launched in August 2000, it focuses province-wide efforts to improve water quality and delivery in Ontario. Over the next two years this government will invest more than half a billion dollars in clean, safe drinking water for the people of Ontario. This year alone, the government will provide $245 million, including investments to help municipalities upgrade their water systems to meet our tough new standards and make improvements to their waste water systems.

And while there is still work to be done, this government continues to make significant progress on several other goals of its clean water strategy. For example, earlier this fall the government began consultations with key stakeholders on watershed-based planning issues. Other clean water commitments include conducting groundwater studies to support the development of source water plans. These are just two examples, both of which also fall under the government's Smart Growth umbrella.

Smart Growth is the government's overreaching vision for promoting and planning for growth that we're expecting over the next 20 and 30 years. It's a vision for creating a strong economy, building vibrant communities and promoting a healthy environment. It's as relevant to rural areas and remote communities as it is to urban centres.

The proposed bill is a reflection of the extensive consultation process that began last August when the Premier and Minister of the Environment announced the government's commitment to work with stakeholders to shape the development of a Safe Drinking Water Act.

As members are aware, there was a 30-day public posting of the proposed components of the bill on the Environmental Bill of Rights registry. In addition, this government has recently held several public consultation sessions in London, Ottawa and Thunder Bay. As well, ongoing meetings are continuing between Ministry of the Environment staff and key stakeholders. Some 78 comments were received in response to the posting on the Environmental Bill of Rights registry. Those comments were given careful consideration as the government finalized this bill.

As I mentioned in my opening remarks, by bringing together 50 of Commissioner O'Connor's part two recommendations into one proposed bill, we have adopted a holistic approach, an approach that recognizes that the whole is greater than the sum of the individual parts.

The proposed bill before you today is a bill with clarity and a bill with clout. Most important, it is a demonstration of this government's unwavering commitment to ensure that Ontario residents have the safest, cleanest drinking water in the world.

The momentum is strong, and we are moving forward to complete full implementation of Commissioner O'Connor's recommendations. I urge all members to support this proposed bill.

Hon Carl DeFaria (Minister of Citizenship, minister responsible for seniors): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I ask this House to welcome a delegation from Azores, Portugal, led by Dr Victor Cruz, leader of the Social Democratic Party of the regional government of the Azores, and Mr Laurentino Esteves, an MP of the government of Portugal, plus members of the Casa dos Açores here in Toronto. I would ask the House to recognize their presence here.

The Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order, but we welcome you to our Legislature.

Mr Levac: On the same point of order, Mr Speaker: I'm absolutely convinced that the members on the other side would accept Tony Ruprecht's greetings to the delegation as well. Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Thank you. Further debate?

Mr Ernie Parsons (Prince Edward-Hastings): Here we go again: another time allocation bill. I hesitate in some ways to mention it, because it seems to produce all kinds of interest and shouting on the other side, but I think if I sat on the government side I wouldn't want someone to talk about time allocation either.

If again—and I'm going to report daily—it almost is a daily event to give a report card, I would remind the members who are here and perhaps weren't here yesterday that during the Davis-Miller era, three out of 292 bills were passed using time allocation. During the David Peterson minority government, one out of 129 bills had time allocation. During the majority government of David Peterson, three out of 183 bills had time allocation. Under the Harris-Eves era, we have now hit 100 bills exactly out of 226. So it's an anniversary of some sort that roughly 100 times in the past seven years we've had democracy suspended in order to get the bill forward.

Again, this is a bill that I think would have been an ideal one for more consultation with municipalities, but instead, time allocation provides an opportunity for the whiz kids in the backroom—the people whom nobody voted for but this is a great, interesting experiment for them—to have their way on getting a bill through. I fervently believe that all legislation should be drafted and done by individuals who have to knock on doors and be elected and be accountable to their citizens. Time allocation suspends the opportunity for the democracy to take place.

So we're now at exactly 100 time-allocated bills. No one on the government side of the House should be very proud of it.

Bill 195, the Safe Drinking Water Act, an act that took two years to come forward to address, quite frankly, the horrible situation that arose at Walkerton—Justice O'Connor made a number of key recommendations, some of which are included in this bill, some of which are not. I would note that he made it very clear. Judge O'Connor states, "Protecting our drinking water sources must be a key part of the system for ensuring the safety of Ontario's drinking water." Protection for water sources in here doesn't exist, and yet it's a significant issue. It does not make sense to me to have to put together a system to extract metals or to extract chemicals from a water system if we could have prevented them going into the ground. There is lots and lots of that happening.

The member for Sarnia shared with this Legislature earlier today the issue of the hazardous waste that's going into Sarnia. Now, the waste going into Sarnia is not a Sarnia issue. It is an Ontario issue and perhaps even a North American issue. That pollution that goes into that groundwater, particularly near a large body of water—when we allow the pollution to go into the ground, we don't know exactly where it will show up or exactly even what's going in, unfortunately. Our environmental laws have become a disgrace in Ontario.

We had a similar situation with the Richmond landfill site in my community, the Greater Napanee area but coming into Hastings county, where this government is trying to expedite getting the garbage into the ground. I sense, at times, that the government is a voice for industry rather than a voice for the people. There is something fundamentally wrong when a large company can come forward and say, "We want to bury hundreds of thousands of tonnes of garbage a year in this site," and the onus seems to be on the community that will be affected to prove it wrong. The company has all kinds of money to put forward their case and to hire all kinds of experts. The people who drink the water in the vicinity of that dump—and that dump, by the way, is near Lake Ontario. The vicinity of the dump is everything downstream through Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes. Whatever goes into the St Lawrence River profoundly affects it. But if it goes into the ground in Tyendinaga township or in the Mohawk-Bay of Quinte reserve or in Deseronto or in Napanee, it can't be removed easily. For people on well systems, there is no easy solution to doing it.

Here we have the people who are concerned about their drinking water and their children's and their grandchildren's drinking water, and they have to have yard sales and fundraisers to try to mount a defence and try to hire some experts to testify against a multi-million dollar company. The government has that responsibility. The government has the responsibility to diminish the amount of garbage going into the groundwater.

The recycling program in Ontario is not well supported by this provincial government; it was at one time, but it is not now. It is perceived by some people as cheaper to simply take the garbage and bury it. But that buried garbage is a ticking time bomb, and it is cheaper to not have to deal with it later. Deal with it now. In fact, I will point to Walkerton, where in order for the Ministry of Environment to save money, they cut water inspection, they cut people, they cut the tests. We see the damage that has been done to Walkerton purely from a property viewpoint is about $65 million. That doesn't count the tragedy of the deaths and the 2,000 people who now have permanent medical problems, but is strictly in terms of dollars: $65 million in devalued property, bringing in bottled water etc. It has been said by many that this government knows the cost of everything but the value of nothing. We have to protect groundwater at source.

There is also an argument made in this bill that all the direct water costs should go right to the individual user. There are economies of scale that come into that theory. When you've got a large urban area, there isn't a big difference in the cost whether you're going to serve 200,000 people or 400,000 people. You're going to have the same testing at the labs, and you're going to have the same number of people working in the plant that's doing the treatment and so forth. But in my community, which is typical of communities all over Ontario, we have hamlets and little villages and towns like Ameliasburg, Bayside, Wellington and Batawa, where there are maybe only 30 or 35 homes on a system. If they have to pay full cost, the system will not be able to operate. What will happen in those communities?

We don't make the user pay everything directly for hospitals, thank goodness, although I hesitate to mention it because the government will say, "Maybe that's the way we're moving." We have a universal health care system that we value. We had a universal electricity system, but things have severely deteriorated on that in the last few months.

There used to be an expression, "The lights are on but nobody's home." The expression now is, "The lights are off but somebody's home." People are turning off their lights and living in the dark because, as I'm sure the member for Brant will concur, they can't afford to turn the lights on. So the joke has become the reality in Ontario. We don't have universal electricity as we used to. Clean air: we don't require everyone to pay to clean up pollution.

If we've got a little hamlet like Ameliasburg and we've allowed a company 200 miles away to put garbage into a dump that got into the groundwater and filtered through—and this isn't the case with Ameliasburg—I don't believe it's fair that the residents in that little hamlet would have to pay to clean up water that the provincial government allowed to be polluted in a distant spot. We're all in this together. We're not a divided Ontario, from the viewpoint of Dalton McGuinty and the Liberal Party. We're all equal citizens in this together, and we will look after each other.

We also face the reality that not everyone in Ontario has an expense account and there are people who are struggling. I've mentioned in the past people on the Ontario disability support program who at the very peak receive about $11,600 a year, $7,000 below the poverty level. Is water going to become a luxury for them? That's unfathomable in this province. We need to realize and remember that we have a responsibility as a province to ensure that all our citizens have access to affordable, clean water.

Privatization is put forward as the solution to every problem. History over the last year or two has shown that's clearly not the solution to everything. Perhaps there's a role for privatization in these water plants, but ultimately I believe strongly, and the Ontario Liberals believe, that the municipality has to have the ultimate responsibility for it. As we're learning, if the municipality has the responsibility and the ratepayer has a concern, they can contact their councillor, their reeve, their mayor or someone involved in the operation of it and there's accountability for it from that municipal council.

No municipal council, school board or elected body likes to put up taxes. They do like to provide clean water, but they don't like to put up taxes. They know there will be questions and concerns to them if they increase taxes. On the other hand, when you have a private company owning, operating and totally responsible for a water system, their only accountability is to their shareholders. They have no concern about what the general public thinks or wants. If we want to think about what it would be like to have a private company owning and operating the water system, I would suggest that you think about what it would be like to have Enron operating our public water system in Ontario. We're going to see artificially created shortages; we're going to see shortcuts. The answer is, water is such a fundamental human need and right that we need to maintain the responsibility through municipal government.

There's also the other interesting aspect of privatization: if a private company owns a water system and all of the works associated with it, is there anything to prevent them from taking and selling the water out of country, out of province? Absolutely nothing. It will be the anything-for-a-buck water company. And there is a day coming when I believe that water will be more valuable than gasoline in our society.

Mr Levac: It already is.

Mr Parsons: It already is; that's right. Much as I don't like paying 70-some cents a litre for gasoline—and I'm not convinced it's worth 70 cents a litre—I do notice in the corner stores where a litre of water is $1.49. So water is more valuable, and as much as I'd hate to get along without gasoline, I could do it, but I can't get along without water. This is a fundamental resource that the Ontario Liberals do not believe should be totally in the control of a private company—and there's no assurance that it would be an Ontario company, or even a Canadian company.

We would like to see in this bill—I know we have time allocation, and I know they're not interested in really making any changes to it—but we strongly, strongly believe that public water has to remain in public hands. This bill doesn't do it.

It's interesting that in the draft the government left the responsibility for the water with the municipality. When the draft went around the province, and everyone said,

"You know, they're on the right track; this is a good thing. At least we're going to know that we maintained public control," but when the bill came to the Legislature, that was yanked out of it, gone, in this "private industry always does things better." We simply don't have the track record, whether it be WorldCom, Enron or any number of companies, to say that private industry necessarily does it better, whether it's health care, highways—again, Highway 407 that we sold off is now a joke, for the cost to drive it. It's very good for some private—

Mr Levac: Big profits.

Mr Parsons: Big profits for people in other provinces and in other countries, while the Ontario taxpayer is being ripped off.

If you sell the waterworks of a municipality, a private company can pay any price they want. They can pay four, five or 10 times what it's worth because they can simply recoup the money by putting on exorbitant prices for the water. And are you going to have a choice if you want that water to come out your tap or not? No. We're watching now, with electricity, where the companies are moving very, very quickly to cut off people's electricity; they're not giving them any latitude or discussion.

The part in here dealing with the Safe Drinking Water Act that they have included is, by and large, commendable. I wish I could support it, but I and the Ontario Liberals will not support time allocation that stifles the voice of the people in our community, the experts that are out on the streets.

Mr John Gerretsen (Kingston and the Islands): You're an expert, Ernie; you're an engineer.

Mr Parsons: I'm an individual who believes in democracy, and when democracy is being removed, as is being done regularly—maybe democracy isn't efficient. Probably the cheapest form of government is dictatorship—

Mr Levac: Benevolent dictatorship.

Mr Parsons: Benevolent dictatorship. That's not what we have, though. A dictatorship is fundamentally wrong. We need democracy.

The Deputy Speaker: Further debate?

Mr Tony Martin (Sault Ste Marie): I want to say to the members in the chamber here this afternoon, to the folks out there and members across the way that they want to be wary when they listen to the House leader and Minister of the Environment when he gets up in this place and says to them, "It's really very simple. All we have to do is pass this bill. Don't get in the way; let's make it happen. All of a sudden all the water across Ontario is going to be protected and we'll all be all right and we won't have to worry any more."

I remind everybody that this is the government that brought you Walkerton in the first place. This is the government that's delivering to you, as we speak here in this place, the hydro debacle. So when they get up on their high horse in this place and complain and criticize the opposition for simply doing their job, I would say to people, think twice about that, because it's never as simple as they would present it.

The first question, and probably the most important question, that the people of Ontario have to put to this government for the protection and provision of clean water is why we got ourselves into this mess in the first place, how we find ourselves here today having to deal with this kind of legislation.

If you remember back, it wasn't long into their mandate when the government of Ontario in 1995 began to cut services, began to cut personnel in government, because they didn't think government was necessary to protect the kinds of very vital resources we all depend on, such as water. We in Canada and Ontario took it for granted that our water would always be safe, that we could just walk into the kitchen and turn on the tap, put a glass under it, fill it up and have a drink and that it would be fine. In fact, we probably had grounds upon which to be thinking that, given the resources that were put in time after time by government after government at provincial and federal levels to make sure the water we had to drink, from the source to the plants that purified that water to the delivery of that water to our houses, was in fact the best that was possible given the technology of the day at that particular point in time.

Alas, in 1995 all that began to fall apart. The resources just weren't there any more. The government of the day decided that government had no business being involved in that business, that if they simply turned more of it over to the private sector and got rid of a lot of problematic bureaucrats who simply drove around in their trucks wasting gas and public money, we would all be better protected.

To suggest for a second that now, after Walkerton and after the downsizing we've seen in government services and the debacle we're experiencing under hydro, we somehow pass this bill today and tomorrow we're all safe again in fact belies the truth.

This government is sorely short of resources. The big question that communities are beginning to ask out there as they look at what's being presented to them by way of what they need to do to protect the water their citizens drink is, who's going to pay for it? I would suggest the government needs to be talking about that, needs to be clear and upfront about exactly who's going to be expected to pay for all of the infrastructure and the oversight that's going to be necessary so that all of us here in this place who support legislation to protect the water, clean drinking water, in this province—so that in fact it is indeed going to happen. The big question everybody out there needs to be asking this government is, where is the money and, ultimately, who's going to pay?

The Deputy Speaker: Mr Stockwell has moved government notice of motion number 61. Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion carry?

All those in favour, say "aye."

All those opposed, say "nay."

In my opinion, the ayes have it.

Call in the members. This will be a 10-minute bell.

The division bells rang from 1749 to 1759.

The Deputy Speaker: Please let me interrupt your conversations.

All those in favour will please rise one at a time and be recognized by the Clerk.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BUSINESS

LONG-TERM CARE

Mrs Lyn McLeod (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): I present the resolution that, in the opinion of this House, the Ernie Eves government should immediately establish minimum standards of care for nursing homes and homes for the aged, including the reintroduction of minimum hours of nursing care and the requirement for a minimum of at least one bath a week.

The Acting Speaker (Mr Michael A. Brown): The member has up to 10 minutes to make her presentation.

Mrs McLeod: This is, in all likelihood, the last opportunity I will have to bring forward private member's business to this House. I've chosen to use the opportunity to present this particular resolution because of a growing personal sense of outrage I have at the Harris-Eves government's, in my view, deliberate abandonment of our most vulnerable seniors. I know that in the course of the morning's debate we will hear members of the government say, "This government has made the largest investment in long-term care of any government in history," so I want to put that argument into the context of fact.

The fact is that this government's investment in long-term care is almost entirely to bring in new long-term-care beds. That's fine, but we have to understand that that investment in long-term-care beds was because one of the first actions of this same government was to engage in the shutting down of thousands—thousands—of acute care beds and to shut down fully 40% of the chronic care beds in this province. They wanted to put the chronic care patients into long-term-care beds, and they wanted to do that to save money, because in chronic care you get over $200 a day to care for patients, while in long-term care it's more like $100 a day.

This government seems to keep getting caught by surprise. To their surprise, they discovered there wasn't room in the long-term-care facilities for all these chronic care patients who were about to be displaced. There were waiting lists across the province; there were 18,000 people on waiting lists for long-term care. So this government did indeed belatedly recognize that they had to build some new beds. Six years later, some of those new beds are coming on-stream. We still have waiting lists for long-term care, we still have patients sitting in acute care beds, and we still have people being discharged from hospital without adequate home care.

In the meantime, when our long-term-care facilities did have a vacancy, they were taking patients with higher and higher levels of need for care. But this government did not transfer the chronic care dollars to the long-term-care facilities, so those long-term-care facilities or nursing homes or homes for the aged are caring for these much needier individuals with very minimal dollars. Very little of the new money this government will say it has invested in long-term care has gone to actually improve the care for people in our homes for the aged and nursing homes.

Along with the New Democratic Party, about two years ago, I think, we had a series of hearings across the province on long-term care. We heard story after story from anguished family members who came forward to tell us of their concerns about the lack of quality of life, in fact their fears for the very safety of their loved ones in our nursing homes and our homes for the aged. At one point—it was in Thunder Bay, my home riding—somebody who works in a nursing home, a staff person, came forward at the end of the hearings. She was in tears. She said, "I know how concerned you are. I know we're not doing what we should be able to do to provide care, but you've got to understand how few resources we have to work with."

The staff of our nursing homes and homes for the aged are as distressed as the families of the residents in those homes and as concerned not only for the safety of those residents but indeed for their own safety, as overworked, exhausted, stressed staff try to provide care for these very high need individuals.

The government's response to this was to cut the minimum number of hours of nursing care. There was a regulation that set a minimum; it said every individual should have 2.25 hours of nursing care. This government responded to the concerns for care by cutting out the minimums, because how else could they begin to meet the needs of these individuals with the dollars they were giving? They couldn't be held to account for the enforcement of the regulation and not have to put more money into it. Now we are last in this country—last in this country—in the numbers of hours of nursing care that individuals in nursing homes and homes for the aged receive. In fact, as I understand the independent study that was done, we are probably last in comparison to the United States and in comparison to European countries in the numbers of hours of nursing care that we provide our residents. We are last in our support for people with behavioural problems, last in our support for people who require rehabilitation.

When the people in the long-term-care facilities were driven to the point of desperation last spring and ran a very strong campaign to make us all aware of the needs in those homes, what was this government's next response? If you'll recall, in that campaign one of the issues was that residents get a minimum of one bath per week, and the minister, quite rightly, responded, "That's what's in the regulations. It's a minimum. That's what's required." But it became a flashpoint, so this government's response was to remove that regulation and to replace it with a regulation that simply says they have to give sufficient care to maintain personal hygiene.

The minister says, "We don't want numerical standards, because if you have a numerical standard, a minimum becomes a maximum." A minimum only becomes a maximum if the funding body, the government, only funds to the level of minimum care. If they provide more dollars, more care can be given; you don't get held to the minimums. But at least you need some basics, some basics for which this government can be held accountable.

The other way that you get minimums becoming maximums is if you ration care and set the maximums, which is what this government has done with home care, but that again is another story.

The minister says, "We want to give people the flexibility to meet the patients' needs. That's why we don't want numerical figures." You only have flexibility if you have enough money to meet the needs. The minister says, "We want to move to outcome measurement instead of numerical standards." How do you measure outcomes for quality of life of people in nursing homes and homes for the aged? You can't look at mortality rates; that's not an applicable figure for this particular population. So do you look at whether or not people are developing bedsores? Do you look at the outbreak of influenza? As an outcome, how would you look at the effect on an individual of the number of hours that somebody sits waiting to have somebody come and feed them? How do you measure the outcome on quality of life of the number of hours that somebody in a nursing home or home for the aged spends in isolation and in silence?

I've two stories that I want to tell in my last three minutes. One is the story of my mother; I've told it in this House before. My mother spent the last three months of her life in a home for the aged, and because it was a municipal home for the aged in my home riding of Thunder Bay it benefits from a 20% top-up; they have a little extra money. This home used that money to provide an occupational therapist for the Alzheimer's unit. That occupational therapist made the last three months of my mother's life the best quality of life that she had had for the last two years, because they found ways in which she could respond.

I believe that there should be minimum standards for bathing and there should be minimum standards of nursing care and we should go beyond those. I believe that we should have a standard that says there should be rehabilitation, there should be occupational therapists and that our seniors deserve no less than what will contribute to their quality of life.

My second story is one that is not as happy. It's the story of my mother-in-law. You have to know that my mother-in-law was a brilliant woman who got a university degree and a scholarship to go to the Sorbonne back in the 1920s when women weren't doing that. She devoted her life as a minister's wife to charitable work in our community. She remained feisty, bright and independent until she succumbed to Alzheimer's disease at the age of 82. My mother-in-law also spent the last months of her life in a nursing home. It didn't happen to have the 20% top-up, it didn't have an occupational therapist, it didn't have enough staff to actually feed the residents of that nursing home—at least, not unless they waited for a long time—and it certainly didn't have the staff to take them for walks or to talk to them. They did their best. The staff in that nursing home did their best. But the best they could do was to try to keep people safe and, indeed, to keep their diapers changed, because that's what maintaining personal hygiene really means in those settings.

I don't think it was enough for my mother-in-law, a person who gave and gave and gave. I don't think it was enough to say that her needs were being met because her personal hygiene was being looked after. I think if my mother-in-law had not been a victim of Alzheimer's and was in that nursing home seeing what was happening to the people around her—I don't think, I know that my mother-in-law would have been outraged, because it was that kind of outrage that she brought to injustice throughout her life. She deserved more. She would have believed that the people who shared that residence with her deserved more. She would have anguished for the staff trying to provide care.

I brought this resolution forward today because I wanted to express in this House what would have been my mother-in-law's outrage in this last opportunity I have to bring forward private member's business. I ask this government to finally take action in concern.

Ms Shelley Martel (Nickel Belt): It's a pleasure for me to participate in the debate this morning. I'll be supporting the resolution and, at the end of my remarks, will be making some suggestions about how it might have been strengthened, because I believe it could have been.

Let me begin by saying that it is a tragedy—a tragedy—that this government cares so little for the frail and elderly in Ontario long-term-care facilities that they can't even protect them by having in place minimum standards for nursing care and minimum standards for bathing. That is a fact. The government cares so little—so little—for the frail and the elderly in Ontario long-term-care facilities that they have done away with miniimum standards for nursing care and minimum standards for bathing.

You see, before this government was elected, under our government there was a minimum standard for nursing care. It was 2.25 hours of hands-on care per resident per day. One of the first things that Jim Wilson, who was then the Minister of Health, did was to do away with that minimum standard. I don't think residents asked for that minimum standard to be abandoned. I don't think families of residents in long-term-care facilities asked for that. I know the unions that represent people who work in nursing homes, like ONA, SEIU and CUPE, certainly didn't ask for the minimum standards to be done away with. I suspect that some of those for-profit long-term-care operators, especially the big corporations, had the government's ear on this one. They didn't want to be bound by any standards, because if they were not bound, maybe they could have less staff and more profit. That's what happened, and it is a shame that the government listened to that lobby instead of protecting families and the residents themselves who are in those facilities.

The real question is, has that lack of a standard had a negative impact on the care of the frail and the elderly? And the answer is, you bet it has—absolutely—and this government has the proof. You see, this government funded a study done by PricewaterhouseCoopers that was released in January 2001, and in that particular study PricewaterhouseCoopers compared the needs and the services provided to long-term-care residents in Ontario facilities to the needs and the services provided to residents in more than seven other jurisdictions: Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Maine, Michigan, Mississippi, South Dakota, Sweden, Finland and the Netherlands. The results of that work done by PricewaterhouseCoopers, independent of this government, independent of my political party, were shocking.

They discovered, for example, that residents in Ontario long-term-care facilities received less nursing and therapy services than similar jurisdictions with similar populations. Furthermore, Ontario long-term-care residents have some significant differences in terms of their level of depression, cognitive levels and behavioural problems, which indicates a higher need for service levels to meet higher care requirements.

The second shocking thing found was that the proportion of care provided by registered nurses in Ontario is less than in all other jurisdictions. In Ontario, registered nurses are now providing 2.04 hours of care per resident per day. That is less than the minimum standard that was in place. That shows you what happens when you abandon minimum standards. Then some of these homes worked to even lower common denominators.

What they also found was that, in terms of rehabilitation services, only 10% of residents who have the potential for rehabilitation actually receive that rehabilitation. Or with respect to behavioural therapy, despite the fact that 61% of the residents in Ontario long-term-care facilities present with behavioural issues—the highest of all the populations—they receive among the lowest levels of therapy: only slightly more than 10 minutes per person per day.

Is the question, then, do they receive less care because Ontario residents in long-term-care facilities have better health than the health of the other populations that were studied in other jurisdictions? The answer there is again no, because the rates of depression in Ontario long-term-care facilities were higher than anywhere else except in the Netherlands; Ontario had higher levels of residents having suffered strokes than Saskatchewan and Manitoba; Ontario had among the highest levels of residents with dementia and Alzheimer's disease. In fact, the authors of the study made this particular point with respect to those residents in their care. They said:

"The ... authors note that this finding has 'significant implications for the care and treatment of these individuals' for several reasons. Clearly ... in order to offer adequate care for people with dementias, there must be sufficient numbers of staff. And, in order to ensure safe, appropriate and quality care, staff must be specially trained so they will have the necessary expertise required to meet the needs of these residents. Failure to ensure these fundamentals may inevitably result in a diminished quality of life for residents, excessive acute care hospital" stays "and increased strain on staff in long-term-care facilities."

Why do I make this point? I make the point because this report, paid for by this government, released in the beginning of 2001, clearly shows that the absence of minimum standards of care does have a negative impact on the frail and the elderly living in Ontario long-term-care facilities. It impacts on their health directly. They are at the bottom—the bottom—of the heap in terms of receiving nursing care, rehabilitation etc., and it is wrong—absolutely wrong—that in the province of Ontario our residents in long-term-care facilities should be such a low priority for this government that they are at the bottom in terms of the care they receive in comparison to so many other jurisdictions. This government should be embarrassed about that fact and this government should be doing something about it, but they are not.

You would have thought that the government would have learned something from the PricewaterhouseCoopers report, learned that you need a minimum standard at the outset to at least ensure adequate care. What did this government do instead? On July 31 of this year, this government then did away with the minimum standard of bathing in the province of Ontario. That fact came to light quite by accident at the estimates committee when we dealt with the Ministry of Health on September 10. I was asking questions to the minister with respect to a number of the changes the government had announced on July 31 with respect to their 15% fee increase for residents in long-term-care facilities. One of the things the government had promised in that press release of July 31 was to "amend Ontario's bathing regulation to better meet ... individual needs."

So I asked the minister if the regulation had been passed. He said yes. I said, "Does that now mean three or four baths a week?" and Mr Clement said the following: "It was decided that that would create more problems than it would solve in terms of minimum standards, so we've actually thrown it back to the sector." Well, they sure have. They've abandoned completely the minimum requirement for bathing and left it to the sector to decide if and when a resident might actually get a bath.

It's interesting if you look at the old regulation, because the old regulation said the following: "The nursing staff shall ensure that residents who are confined to bed or who are incontinent have a complete bath daily or more frequently where necessary to maintain cleanliness and that ambulant residents have a complete bath at least once a week...."

"The nursing staff shall ensure that proper and sufficient care of each resident's body is provided to safeguard the resident's health and to maintain personal hygiene."

The government did away with that minimum standard, even though that standard was inadequate, and replaced it with the following:

"The nursing staff shall ensure that proper and sufficient care of each resident's body is provided daily to safeguard the resident's health and to maintain personal hygiene." The word "bath" doesn't even come into the equation. The outcome of this is really clear. When you did away with the minimum standards for nursing care, quality of care for residents went down. That was shown in PricewaterhouseCoopers, and there is no doubt that quality is going to further deteriorate because this government has now done away with the bathing standard.

I want to read a letter that was sent to me by a resident in St Thomas about this serious issue, because she really makes the important point. It was sent to the Honourable Dan Newman and reads as follows:

"I was astounded to read that prior to August 1, the Nursing Homes Act mandated a minimum of one daily bath for bedridden or incontinent residents. My husband is incontinent but only receives one bath a week which is insufficient, unsanitary, disgusting and obviously a violation of the old Nursing Homes Act." And it is, because he was supposed to receive a bath a day. "I have demanded improvements numerous times, repeatedly requesting a minimum of one additional bath per week, but to no avail. The typical response from management is that they'll do what they can when time permits, but they're understaffed and have lots of other things to do etc...."

"Now we're faced with new regulations that don't even assure my husband of one bath a week. If you think"—and this is to Minister Newman—"as you are quoted as saying, that: 'Obviously, if someone needs a bath every day, they're going to get it,' then you are sadly misinformed about the state of care in these facilities."

"The old regulations were scrapped because your ministry didn't want LTC facilities taking the 'one bath a week' standard as a maximum. Well, I assure you that even those lax standards are not being adhered to today, and the new standards will do absolutely nothing to improve the situation. Instead they will result in even fewer baths as they will allow individuals to interpret the regulations however they choose."

She is absolutely right—absolutely right—that this will mean even worse care in terms of bathing for residents in long-term-care facilities.

The other sad reality is that despite the announcement the government made on July 31 that they were going to put $100 million into nursing homes to improve the quality of care as some form of compensation for a 15% fee hike for these same residents, that money is not going to hire new nurses and new personal care aides.

I want to just quote the minister's letter to residents to put this into context. This went out July 31, and he said, "This investment will add an additional 2,400 nurses and personal care workers to the long-term-care sector, or approximately 3.9 nursing and personal care staff for each 100-bed facility."

Do you know what? On October 16, we raised the case of three for-profit nursing homes in Durham to find out how that money that was supposed to be spent on nurses and personal care aides had in fact been spent. Here's what happened. In one of those homes, a telephone receptionist was hired. In another of the for-profit homes, a part-time social worker and two part-time personal care aides were hired on contract till the end of this December. In the third for-profit home, there were and are no plans to hire new nursing staff at all; they're using all the money to buy diapers, probably so they can let those poor frail and elderly seniors sit even longer in soiled diapers, and that is absolutely wrong.

We raised this question. The minister said the following in response: "The $100 million in nursing and personal care that was announced on July 31 must be spent on nursing and personal care. That's why we made the decision. There's nothing else that money can be spent on; it must be spent on hiring additional nurses." He is completely out to lunch, because that's not what's happening.

We came back into this House and raised the case of Raincrest Home for the Aged in Dryden, where every single penny was spent on the operating deficit of that facility. We raised the issue of North Centennial Manor in Kapuskasing using half of the new funding to cover WSIB and long-term disability benefits. Not one new nurse is being hired. Lady Isabelle Nursing Home in Trout Creek is not spending a cent of that on staff. The Extendicare in Haliburton, Versacare in St Catharines and South Centennial Manor in Iroquois Falls are using all their money to cover their operating deficits; not one single penny on new staff. Extendicare in Sudbury is hiring one RPN and that's it.

This minister was not upfront and honest when he told residents that in terms of jacking up their fees by 15% they were going to at least get more care. That is not happening, and that was this government's fault, because they should have made sure that every single penny went to nurses and personal care aides. They're not doing it, and the quality of care for residents in our long-term-care facilities, which was already at the bottom of the heap in terms of the report that this government commissioned and that was made public, is going to get even worse. That's how much you folks care about residents in long-term-care facilities.

The sad reality is that if the government really wanted to protect the frail and elderly in long-term-care facilities, there are a couple of things the government could do. The first thing the government could do is regulate a minimum standard of care in long-term-care facilities. SEIU last year came forward with a proposal of 3.5 hours of hands-on care per resident per day in long-term-care facilities. New Democrats support that call, because there has to be a minimum standard and it has to be higher than what it was, because clearly the results of Price-waterhouseCoopers show how dramatically the care of Ontario residents has declined since this government cancelled that minimum standard.

Secondly, there has to be a regulation with respect to the minimum standard of bathing. If a resident needs a bath a day, a resident should have a bath a day, and that should be in regulation so that nursing homes have to provide that.

Finally, we need more inspectors in long-term-care facilities to ensure compliance. That is not happening now, and that is why nursing homes are able to get away with what they're able to get away with. This government should be hiring more compliance officers who go in unannounced to ensure that regulations are being met.

I say in conclusion that it is a tragedy, it's a shame, that this government cares so little for seniors that they have abandoned all standards of care, and that is why the quality of life for these residents in these facilities is so poor and so awful.

Mr Joseph N. Tascona (Barrie-Simcoe-Bradford): I'm very pleased to address the member from Thunder Bay-Atitokan's resolution that our government "should immediately establish minimum standards of care for nursing homes and homes for the aged, including the reintroduction of minimum hours of nursing care and the requirement for a minimum of at least one bath a week" for residents.

Let me say that the Ernie Eves government is committed to meeting the long-term-care needs of Ontario's growing and aging population, and we've taken strong action to address this challenge since we were first elected in 1995. I may add that in my riding of Barrie-Simcoe-Bradford we have had a significant increase in the number of long-term-beds. There's one project in particular, Victoria Village, which is a tremendous project. There were 132 long-term-care beds awarded to allow this project, which will be a seniors facility providing many services for our seniors population, to get off the ground. I might add that they're also going to have, as a part of that project, a facility that will allow for seniors to come in from the community to get their bathing requirements done. A part of this facility will offer that type of service, and that's a very significant feature of this project. Also, there have been beds that have gone to Grove Park Home—62—the IOOF and Woods Park home, throughout the city of Barrie, and also there have been beds granted down in Bradford-West Gwillimbury at the south end of my riding. So there has been significant investment in this area of long-term-care beds, and I'm very pleased that it's happening in my riding.

The fact is, cookie-cutter approaches to health care such as the member opposite is suggesting haven't worked in the past, they don't work today and they won't work in the future. Our government has not and will not engage in this approach, but this is exactly what the member from Thunder Bay-Atikokan's resolution would do: place a uniform standard over a diverse province where health care needs vary from region to region and citizen to citizen. This simply won't do, and the member from Thunder Bay-Atikokan should know that.

When it comes to imposing a minimum standard for bathing and nursing in long-term-care facilities, such a concept just wouldn't serve the best interests of residents. That's because Ontario funds more than 60,000 long-term-care beds, and each of those beds is occupied by an individual resident with individual needs. That's why our government supports the flexible approach of personal care plans for each and every long-term-care facility resident in Ontario. Personal care plans mean that the long-term-care facility residents in the province are assessed according to their individual requirements to ensure they receive the personal care that they need. This means even better care for residents and greater peace of mind for families.

As you know, our government changed the regulations concerning personal care in long-term-care facilities to ensure consistency across the board and the province. The new regulation for the Nursing Homes Act, the Homes for the Aged and Rest Homes Act and the Charitable Institutions Act specifies that nursing staff ensure that appropriate care of each resident is provided to safeguard residents' health and maintain personal hygiene. Compliance advisers are making sure this regulation is being followed.

Our government's commitment to even better personal care for residents of Ontario's long-term-care facilities certainly doesn't end there. That's because earlier this year my colleague the Honourable Dan Newman, Associate Minister of Health and Long-Term Care, announced a $198-million investment to improve the delivery of long-term-care services across Ontario. Of this, $100 million will go to enhance the delivery of long-term-care nursing and personal care services, as well as programming and support services. That is a significant investment and commitment to the personal needs of our seniors. I am proud to say in this House today that this is the single largest infusion of funds into nursing and personal care services for the long-term-care sector in the history of this province.

This investment didn't happen when the Liberals were in power, and it wasn't made by the NDP. It was our government that made this investment so that the health care professionals on the front lines, the people taking care of our parents and grandparents, will have the resources they need to provide even better long-term care in our province. By making the investments that need to be made today, rather than putting them off like the Liberals and NDP did, we can make sure that quality long-term-care services are there where and when they're needed, no matter where you live in Ontario.

Based on estimates from the nursing home sector, this unprecedented funding could see as many as 2,400 nurses and personal care workers added to the long-term-care sector. That represents 3.9 full-time equivalent staff per 100-bed facility. That means even better long-term-care services for the people of Ontario today, even better long-term care tomorrow and even better long-term care in the years to come.

Our government firmly believes that taxpayer dollars spent through the Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care should be spent on the actual health and long-term-care services that the people of Ontario need throughout their lives. That's why we made our unprecedented funding announcement, and that's why we changed the legislation to provide even better care for our most vulnerable citizens.

Mrs Marie Bountrogianni (Hamilton Mountain): I'm pleased to rise and support my colleague's resolution for minimum hours of nursing care and the requirement for a minimum of at least one bath per week. It's almost a shame that we need to make this resolution, that we've come to this in Ontario in 2002, isn't it?

Here's a little background from cards that we all receive. We all receive thousands of cards from residents on the long-term-care situation. I'll just paraphrase some of it. If you already have a friend or a family member in any of the over 525 long-term-care facilities across Ontario, you will understand why I'm asking for your help. If you don't, the following information will help you: over 60,000 Ontarians living in long-term-care facilities are older, frailer, sicker and require more care than ever before; 95% require assistance to get dressed; 94% require some assistance to eat; 63% suffer from dementia; 39% are aggressive; 56% have circulatory disease and 49% have a musculoskeletal disability.

Government funding has not kept pace with this increase in resident need. Current funding levels allow for four minutes to assist with getting up, washed, dressed and to the dining room, 10 minutes for assistance with eating, 15 minutes of programming per day and, until recently, one bath per week. Of course, even this was removed recently. These are seniors who have played by the rules, paid taxes all their lives, want to live their last years with dignity and comfort, and are being told no. They're very angry and very hurt. They're very upset, and they don't trust any of us now.

Another thing that is really problematic in our communities that affects long-term care, even for those residents who finally do get into these facilities—the physician shortage makes it impossible for many to be able to go into these facilities. It's a huge problem across the province. Part of that, of course, is the ridiculous funding for physicians to visit long-term-care facilities: $17. It's absolutely ridiculous. That is the kind of value we place on our doctors' services in long-term-care facilities. It's very difficult to find doctors, and people are suffering as a result.

This afternoon I will present thousands of cards to the Minister of Health from people who, because of the inadequate care in long-term-care facilities or because of long waiting lists to get into long-term-care facilities, are complaining because of the cutbacks to community care access centres. Their home care has been cut drastically. In my community, Jim Murray, the same hatchetman who cut home care is now cutting our education system, and it's very problematic. We have a lot of challenges in our community because of what this government has done.

I want to talk about some of the cards. They're all typed, but some people have added anecdotes that really touch us when we read them.

From Anna Liburdi: "People deserve and want to remain at home as long as possible because inadequate care is provided in most long-term-care facilities according to seniors. On behalf of my grandson, who will not be able to be kept at home if I get cut, I am protesting cuts to home care."

They went to a meeting and we talked about long-term care and home care. One lady said, "I attended; I heard; I don't like what I heard. You and your party"—talking of course about the government—"and CCACs should be charged with abandonment by the sick, disabled and elderly."

Another woman said, "How would you like to have to have a neighbour come into your home to dress you, clean you up after an accident etc? I do and it is horrid. My caseworker is overworked. I get one hour per week for a bath. The rest of the time I rely on strangers. I am not the only one. Wake up here. We have feelings; we are hurting."

"You are killing us. No care; no meals; no help at all. I hope I die before it gets any worse. At least I will be out of your way. We are dying."

These are handwritten. "People with disabilities living in their own homes, God bless them because you don't"—to the government. It's very sad, but we have to put this on the record.

Here's another one from Betsy Watson: "I hope my husband and I die soon. We were so proud to have good care at home for our handicaps etc. Now with your cuts we are in terrible shape. I hope you never have to endure the shame we do now."

These are linked. When you have waiting lists for long-term care, when you have inadequate care in long-term care, people are at home more. With cutbacks to home care, that is inadequate as well. We are hurting the most vulnerable in our society. We are hurting those who have built this province for us to enjoy, for our children. Now in the last years of their lives, we have abandoned them. Shame on the government.

Mr Garfield Dunlop (Simcoe North): It's a pleasure to rise this morning to make a few comments on Ms McLeod's motion. I'm pleased to join my colleagues to respond to the question from the member from Thunder Bay-Atikokan regarding a minimum standard for bathing and nursing in Ontario's long-term-care facilities.

With regard to the issue of a minimum standard for bathing and nursing in long-term-care facilities, the fact is that such an approach simply wouldn't serve the best interests of residents in Ontario's long-term-care facilities. That's because long-term-care facility residents are assessed according to their individual needs to ensure they receive the personal care they actually require in that particular home. Compliance advisers ensure the regulations are being followed as well.

As my colleague stated earlier, in July of this year the Ernie Eves government announced $100 million to enhance the delivery of nursing and personal care services in long-term-care facilities, as well as programming and support services. I'm proud to say that this announcement brought our long-term-care facility funding levels to an unprecedented $1.8 billion. This $1.8 billion represents an increase of more than 50% over the $1.15 billion that was being spent when our government took office in 1995.

We've been moving ahead with this initiative as part of our commitment to ensure that long-term-care facility services are not only of the highest quality but also readily accessible for current and future residents as well. The July announcement that my colleague the Honourable Dan Newman, Associate Minister of Health and Long-Term Care, made was part of our $198-million investment to improve the delivery of long-term-care facilities and greatly enhance long-term-care nursing and personal care services in long-term-care facilities across our province. Based on estimates from the nursing home sector, this funding could see as many as 2,400 nurses and personal care workers added to the long-term-care sector. That represents approximately 3.9 full-time equivalent staff per 100-bed facility. As my colleagues have stated earlier, that investment also represents the single largest infusion of money into nursing and personal care services in the long-term-care sector in the province's history.

There's no question that our government's commitment to address the needs and meet the challenges of Ontario's growing and aging population is clear and strong. That's evident because we're putting more money where it's needed most. That's also why we've initiated annual reviews of the long-term-care facilities and developed a province-wide tracking and reporting system to monitor the reviews.

An ongoing professional development and training strategy has been developed for ministry compliance advisers involved in the inspection of long-term-care facilities. That strategy focuses on best-care practices, competencies, multi-disciplinary team approaches and consistency in interpretation and application of long-term-care facility standards, regulations and legislation.

What's more, we are carrying through on our commitment to conduct a major review of the long-term-care facility compliance management program in partnership with the long-term-care sector. The review covers a number of initiatives that include reviewing standards, analyzing data trends, developing a risk-management framework, training to promote consistency among the compliance advisers and, finally, a review of the legislation and regulations. Once the review is completed, recommendations will be developed which will form the basis for a plan of action.

I want to join my colleagues today to emphasize in this House that our government, the Ernie Eves government, truly appreciates the work of Ontario's long-term-care professionals. And at the heart of long-term care are the nurses, whose skill and dedication makes all the difference to the well-being of the residents. Our government will continue to work with nurses and other professionals, with owners and operators of long-term-care facilities, and with other members of the long-term-care sector to ensure the highest level of service across the spectrum of long-term care in this province.

Our record has been very good to this date. In fact, if you're looking at the long-term-care facilities that we've built across the province, the 20,000 new beds that are currently being developed, along with 13,000 beds that are being developed to a class-A standard, I think it's safe to say that our government has done an excellent job in this area, considering the fact that in the previous 10 years before the government came to power no new long-term-care beds were opened in the province.

That's our record and our commitment, and I appreciate the opportunity today to say a few words and to respond to Mrs McLeod's resolution.

Ms Caroline Di Cocco (Sarnia-Lambton): It's with great pleasure that I rise to speak on Mrs McLeod's resolution, "That, in the opinion of this House, the Ernie Eves government should immediately establish minimum standards of care for nursing homes and homes for the aged."

I find that, in this day and age, to actually have to be in this House to ask for a resolution to establish minimum standards, is almost as if we're returning to the Dark Ages when it comes to our long-term-care standards. I agree with her comments, and I certainly know that she has a great in-depth understanding of this sector, that the Harris-Eves government has abandoned many aspects of our social services in this province.

I hear over and over again, as everyone hears, that this government's argument is they've put more money into long-term care. Well, they have put more money into long-term beds, but I want the public to understand something that has been stated before in this House, and that is, they first shut down I believe it's 40% of the chronic care beds. These patients of course had to be put someplace else, so of course they had to be put in long-term-care facilities. Therefore there was a need to put more money into those beds because otherwise these people would have nowhere to go. It's like they start a fire and then they want to get credit for putting it out. That's what their argument always is: "Oh, we're putting money into this." Well, they needed to because there were 18,000 patients, 18,000 people, who had to get into long-term-care beds.

Again, cutting minimum hours of standards for nursing care means that there is no accountability mechanism, so they don't have to answer as to why these hours are not being provided. Because when you continuously ration the dollars to the point that people cannot give the number of hours that are required for care—I have had a number of patients and a number of families come into my office distressed about the quantity of care that their loved ones receive. Why? It's not the caregivers' fault, because they do the best they can. It's the fact that the resources just aren't there to provide the care for these people who need more care.

If people were in hospital, in the chronic care beds, the quantity of care that they would have received, and the hands-on care, of course, would be substantially more. But you see, we are now in a time, because of this government's ideology, that it's all about saving money: "Where can we save money? Does it mean that we can provide one hour less care for people a day? Yes, we'll do that, because after all, these people are elderly." There's the sense that it is only the very well-to-do that seem to benefit from the policies that this government has ongoingly provided to this province.

I applaud my colleague for this resolution. I hope that the government members have the conscience and the social conscience to vote for this resolution because this resolution is needed and it's just in good conscience that the government members should vote for this resolution.

Mr John Gerretsen (Kingston and the Islands): I'm kind of surprised that a government member wouldn't stand up, because it's normally their rotation. But let me first start off all start off by telling you that over the last three or four months, as critic for long-term care for my party, I've had the opportunity to go into many, many long-term-care homes. I've always been impressed with the people that work at these places. Our hats should go off to them for the tremendous amount of work that they do. They're not the problem; the problem is the tremendous underfunding, and that's what it's all about. We in this province traditionally have not paid enough attention, we have not put enough resources into making sure that those people that need all the nursing help that they can get during the last years of their lives get the needs that they're entitled to. That's the real problem.

What's better evidence of that is the fact that the government's own study, the PricewaterhouseCoopers study that they funded of 10 similar jurisdictions to Ontario—they looked at states in the United States, they looked at other province, they looked at countries our size—by that I mean Ontario's size—in Europe. And what did they find out? I'll quote to you from the report: "In general, there is a greater gap between needed service and service provided in Ontario long-term-care facilities than in other jurisdictions for both nursing and other therapy services." We rank dead last—lower than Mississippi, lower than Louisiana—in the amount of care and in the amount of support we give our nursing homes so they can properly look after the elderly people there, who have contributed so much to this province.

That's really what this is all about. Even with the government's new investment on the operating side, for which I applaud them, we will still rank dead last. The decision we have to make in this province is, with the generally high standard of living we have, where we're rated one of the best countries in the world and we are the best province in the best country in the world, do we really think, in terms of the way we take care of our seniors, that it's good enough to rank dead last when it comes to nursing services and personal care services we provide for our seniors in the homes? That's what it's all about. Let us collectively set out a vision whereby we say that within the next five or 10 years we want to rank among the best jurisdictions in providing for our elderly in this province. That's what it's all about.

Yes, you're putting some money into new beds, and they are needed to some extent; there's a question as to what extent. But then what did the government do? When they got 50,000 petitions from individuals, people who were saying, "You've got to invest more money into nursing and personal care services," they took their own report and twisted it around and basically wanted to put a 15% increase on the people who live there by saying, "Well, you want us to invest more. Here it is. We're going to charge you more." Talk about all the cynical moves one can think of. That's what happened. Now, the government quickly backed away from that after awhile and said, "OK. Well, maybe we'll make a 15% increase over the next three years."

It's all about accountability. I don't want to stand here for a moment and say that the people who provide the daily nursing services and the daily personal care services in the homes aren't doing the best they can, but it's with greater acuity, the fact, according to this report, that there's a 39% higher acuity with our seniors. In other words, they need much greater care than they did five, six, seven years ago. In those days, people were more mobile. They're older now and they need more help in the homes.

What it all boils down to, and what this resolution basically speaks to, is, let us give these people some minimum level of help. Let's make sure that the standards aren't below at least one bath a week. Let us try to raise the amount of nursing and personal care we give to our elderly. I think we owe them that. That's what this is about. The change in regulations, which is all wonderful language saying, "We will hold the operators responsible; we will hold the personal care staff responsible," doesn't do anything. The people who have contributed so much in this province deserve better from us, and the best way we can do it is by making sure they get the best kind of personal care and nursing services possible. This resolution is one step in that direction.

Hon Doug Galt (Minister without Portfolio): I appreciate the opportunity to be able to make a few comments on the resolution brought forward by the member from Thunder Bay-Atikokan regarding standards for bathing and nursing in Ontario's long-term-care facilities.

Having just listened to the member from Kingston and the Islands, if I was scoring that on theatrics, I'd give him a 9 out of 10. If I was scoring it on content and change of direction, he'd get a 1 or a 2 out of 10.

Interjection.

Hon Mr Galt: Oh, I'd give him a little more than a zero. I'd give him a mark or two, because they keep changing direction. You never know where they're going to be next.

I'm very, very proud to be part of a government that has invested record amounts of money in our province's long-term-care sector and one that has improved long-term-care services throughout Ontario like never, never before. We've worked hard, with a clear vision on how to meet the needs of our growing and aging population. We've come a long, long way since we were first elected in 1995.

This stands in stark contrast to the party of the members opposite, which took virtually no action to meet Ontario's long-term-care needs when they were in office. From 1985 to 1995, zeroing in on that period, for 10 years not one single, solitary long-term-care bed was created in Ontario. What did they do? They cut many of the acute care beds, leaving wings of hospitals empty, not having the intestinal fortitude to actually close a wing, but cutting many acute care beds. Not one long-term-care bed was created in Ontario during that period.

Now I see them standing up, holier than thou, saying what they would do if they came to office. They're like a moving target: hard to hit. You never know where they'll be tomorrow; you only know right at the moment where they are, but it's constantly changing. When they were in government, they had the opportunity to govern, but what did they do? They called an election in less than three years, thinking they could jump ahead of a disastrous economy, which they had indeed created.

I just listened to the member from Kingston and the Islands talk about "the best possible care." That's the direction in which we're going. He referred to "lower than Mississippi," but he didn't refer to how that was measured. What was the measure? He did not go into that in any detail at all. He knows that if it was measured in any other way, Ontario would not be in that position.

I did like his comments about liking to be one of the best. I think that's indeed a great idea. But then he went on to talk about accountability. Our government has brought in more bills, more activities, more regulations on accountability, whether it's education or health. What has the official opposition been doing? What has the member from Kingston and the Islands been doing? They have voted against every bill we've brought in having to do with accountability. They're now talking about accountability, and I think that is just absolutely marvelous. I don't know what position they'll take tomorrow on accountability; they'll probably vote against it. But it was so refreshing to sit on this side of the House and hear somebody in the Liberal Party talking about accountability. It just warmed the cockles of my heart to hear them talk about accountability. It's just beautiful. I hope they keep talking about it, and I hope they do more than talk about it; I hope they'll actually vote, when we bring forward bills about accountability, and I hope they'll actually support them.

The Acting Speaker: Response?

Mrs McLeod: I do thank my colleagues from Nickel Belt, Hamilton Mountain, Sarnia-Lambton and Kingston and the Islands for their support on this resolution.

For the record, to the member from Northumberland, when the Liberals were in government, 50% of the people who were in long-term-care facilities needed residential care, not long-term care, and that's why we invested and created the integrated homemaker program and put half a billion dollars into setting up that homemaker program, the very same home care program that this government has completely eroded.

To the members from Barrie-Simcoe-Bradford and Simcoe North, I can only wish that you would throw away the briefing notes the minister has given you, get out into the facilities in your ridings and see what's actually going on. You used all the words the minister uses: "Standards don't work; they don't serve the best interests of the residents. We need to meet individual needs. We're going to have personal care plans." All of that would be wonderful. It's what we would all like. It is not what your government is funding. You are not funding minimum, basic levels of care. When you're challenged on that, you remove the regulations that would in some way have held you accountable.

Minimum standards are not adequate quality of care. I would never argue that for one moment. I would hope that a government that truly cared would go far beyond the minimum in providing enough resources to long-term-care facilities that we really could go beyond minimums, that we could really deal with personal care needs and personal care plans. That's what we should have. It's not what we have now. Minimum standards are at least a way of holding a government that does not care to a very basic minimum standard.

To this government's shame, not only have they withdrawn the minimum standards, but when a political lobby reached such intensity that they were forced to address in some minimal way the care needs of residents in long-term-care facilities, they had the sheer gall to say, "Yes, we'll do something, but we're going to make the seniors pay for it out of their own pockets." For shame.

The Acting Speaker: This completes the time allocated for debate on ballot item number 67. I will place the question to decide this matter at 12 noon.

REMOVAL OF OCCUPATIONAL BARRIERS ACT, 2002
LOI DE 2002 SUR L'ÉLIMINATION
DES OBSTACLES PROFESSIONNELS

Mr Ruprecht moved second reading of the following bill:

Bill 189, An Act to remove barriers to the practice of occupations, professions and trades in Ontario for persons with appropriate qualifications obtained outside Ontario / Projet de loi 189, Loi visant à éliminer les obstacles à l'exercice de professions et de métiers en Ontario par quiconque a obtenu ailleurs les qualités professionnelles appropriées.

The Acting Speaker (Mr Michael A. Brown): The member for Davenport has 10 minutes for his presentation.

Mr Tony Ruprecht (Davenport): I am pleased to introduce this private member's bill to this Legislature and to recommend its passage to every member. Here is why: our parents and grandparents came to Canada to find a better life. Because they were hard-working, they succeeded. Essentially, we all know that they had access to education, and later on, access to professions. But today this is not the case.

Many physicians, engineers, nurses, veterinarians and on and on are getting extra points outside Canada from our immigration department to come to this country because they have a profession, they speak the language and they're very hard-working individuals. Once they arrive on our shores, the reality is different. The doors to professional occupations, the doors to get a great life in this country—to be prepared, to work hard and make a go of things and start anew in a different place, probably with a different language, is tough—are being shut in their faces.

We all know the problems. Every one of you in the government knows the problems as well. Every one of us has been approached by people who have a great education and great possibilities to participate in this country's economic well-being and progress, but the doors are being shut.

Even Premier Harris recognized the problem. In 1995, he said, "We're going to act on access to trades and professions very swiftly."

Then I asked the question to Marilyn Mushinski, who is right here—and I'm very happy—because she was the former Minister of Citizenship. She even said, "Right now the system, according to the report that came out, has not been adequate." That's right from the Minister of Citizenship's mouth.

Then we move from Ms Mushinski over to Isabel Bassett. Isabel Bassett was also a fine Minister of Citizenship. Guess what Ms Bassett said? "The ministry commissioned a study by Price Waterhouse; in fact, the final report was ... submitted April 6, 1998. It concludes that the existing services do not have credibility and wide acceptance among employers."

She knows the problem. The Premier knows the problem. Every Minister of Citizenship knows the problem. Now of course the new Minister of Training, Colleges and Universities knows the problem. So what are we going to do about this? The new Minister of Citizenship knows the problem as well because he too is being approached. What is he going to do about this? We have a responsibility to those who have come to this country and who want to participate in the economic well-being.

The specific problem is simply this—and I will quote from various reports. Here is a report by the Ministry of Citizenship itself. It says, "We find barriers to be systemic, generally applicable to most occupations and rooted in the practices of self-governing bodies.... Few professions are free of discriminatory practices."

Second, the federal government in a new report, Not Just Numbers: A Canadian Framework for Future Immigration, March 1998, says, "Many" licensing bodies "have used their role as protectors of the health and safety of consumers as a guise"—guess what?—"to protect the interests of their members through exclusionary entrance requirements."

Finally, the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal came to this conclusion: "The government has given them"—the licensing bodies—"the power and they are using it to exclude." I can go on and on. This practice is "widespread and generalized evidence of practices, which are discriminatory." This is from Peter Cumming, the Ontario Court judge, law professor at Osgoode Hall.

It is clear: we need to act. You, as members of the government, have a special responsibility to vote for this bill today. You did me great pride three years ago. You said yes to the private member's resolution I proposed three years ago. This House voted unanimously except, of course, one person who has carriage of this bill, and that person was the very Minister of Training, Colleges and Universities who was supposed to know better. Did she show up to vote for it? No. Is she going to come today and vote for it? I would only hope so. Let this message go out loud and clear to her and to the government: I want you to come here. I want you to show your face. I want you to vote for it, because that would mean that this bill will get quick passage and there will be enough money set aside for it to be introduced to some body, either government or private, to check things out and to produce results.

We know the problem. What is the solution? The solution is the following, and I will propose it:

"(1) Individuals should have the opportunity to seek licensure or certification in professions and trades for which they have been trained." That's almost obvious.

"(2) Full information on the licensing/certification standards and appeal processes of licensing and occupational bodies should be available and accessible.

"(3) Any competency assessment or licensure/certification requirements should be based on criteria relevant to performing adequately in the profession or trade.

“(4) Candidates should be provided with written reasons for denial of an application or appeal for certification or licensure in a trade or profession.” In other words, we want this process to be as transparent as possible.

“(5) Individuals should have access to training opportunities when upgrade training would allow Ontario competency standards to be reached.”

Are we asking the impossible? Certainly not. Any society that prides itself on getting people from countries—Europe and, in fact, even from Third World countries. It’s an exchange. It’s a brain drain on their country because they would like to have a new future and a better way to create a new life in Canada. Yet what do they find? They find the doors are being closed.

We have various agencies that came up with solutions and recommendations. Today is the day when we are put to the test, and the test is very simple: do we really want people from outside of our province—whether it’s Manitoba, Quebec or British Columbia, and whether it is through Third World countries or outside the United States or outside our shores—to really come here and then end up as taxi drivers, when they are physicians, lawyers, nurses, engineers?

We have so many of them. In fact, we now have the government saying, “Let’s do something quickly,” because of the response and the very huge demand that is now being placed on the government to act. So the Minister of Health is finally saying, “Do you know what we’re going to do? We’re going to fast-track the system because we need 1,585 doctors in Ontario.” That’s the need. Many of our residents can’t get to a doctor. Many of our residents, especially outside of Toronto in the smaller towns and smaller centres of Ontario, have no doctors at all, and they have to make do.

We need 1,585 doctors. Do you know what the International Association of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario is telling us? They are saying, “We have over 2,000 doctors right here in Ontario waiting to get into the system, and there is no space.” What an option we have: we need so many doctors, they’re already here and yet there is no way for them to be fast-tracked. The Minister of Health is going to stand up and say, “We’re going to fast-track them.” Yes, but do you know how many? Seven hundred and nine recently applied to the fast-track system. Do you know how many were accepted? Forty-four. If we continue this, obviously the shortage of doctors will increase. There are 3,000 doctors who very quickly will reach age 65. The demand will be even greater.

Finally, Skills for Change, an organization looking into this matter, has made some very good recommendations. I can’t read them all now, but I simply say to this government, look at this bill, support this bill, because the need is great and we need your help.

Mr Garfield Dunlop (Simcoe North): It’s a pleasure today to speak to Bill 189, An Act to remove barriers to the practice of occupations, professions and trades in Ontario for persons with appropriate qualifications obtained outside Ontario. I’m pleased to have this opportunity to speak to Bill 189. I think it is fair to say that the strength of our economy owes a great deal to the skills, dedication and talents of people who have chosen Ontario as a place to live, work and raise a family. Of course that falls back many generations. Prior to Confederation, people emigrated, particularly from Great Britain, to make a life in Ontario. Right up to today, people are arriving, creating jobs, finding employment and helping to build the strongest province in our Confederation and of course the engine that drives the Canadian economy.

We know that Ontario is the prime destination for new Canadians and that about 60% of all immigrants to Canada choose our province. This is in part because of the opportunities and infrastructure available to them. We can look at any sector, from construction to manufacturing to services, and Ontario has benefited from the contributions that different cultures have brought here.

A few months ago, the Conference Board of Canada released a national report called Brain Gain: The Economic Benefits of Recognizing Learning and Learning Credentials in Canada. The study points out that an improved system for recognizing the learning of immigrants would offset the brain drain and benefit our economy.

The provincial government helped sponsor this study. Its results reflect our experiences in Ontario. Our government has always recognized the importance of helping the foreign-trained quickly enter our economy and put their skills and knowledge to work here in our province.

I know, for example, one of our government’s initiatives allows internationally trained journeypersons to write the certificate of qualification exam provided they have the experience and the required number of hours of training.

Our government has also developed a range of innovative tools to assist internationally trained tradespersons access their occupations. These include a skills-based test for automotive service technicians as an alternative to the written certificate of qualification test and projects that include occupation-specific language instruction.

In conjunction with a general guide for internationally trained tradespeople, we have published fact sheets for five trades: automotive service technician, hairstylist, industrial electrician, industrial millwright, construction and maintenance electrician. An additional three fact sheets are being pilot-tested for refrigeration and air conditioning mechanics, tool and die makers and general machinists. Of course we know that in all those areas we have a shortage, not only in our province but right across our country and indeed right across the continent.

Our government remains committed to helping skilled newcomers enter the labour force quickly and contribute to our strong economy. We continue to attract the world's best and brightest to Ontario by helping internationally trained professionals and tradespeople qualify for employment and gain access faster.

Our government has improved access to education and training opportunities for immigrants. We have posted fact sheets on the Internet so that potential immigrants will be aware of occupational and professional regulations in our province long before they actually arrive here. We continue to work with community partners, occupational regulatory bodies, employers, educational institutions and community agencies to reduce barriers so that immigrants can find suitable jobs.

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Training, Colleges and Universities, Mrs Mushinski, has talked to me about the important contribution her ministry makes, and this bill would limit opportunities for new Ontarians to attain similar achievements as their predecessors. Other provinces are looking to Ontario to see how they can help immigrants in their towns and cities, and I thank the Minister of Citizenship, the Honourable Carl DeFaria, for his strong work in his ministry in helping provide some of this work.

Our government has taken a leadership role and it has continued to lead the way in creating opportunities for new Canadians. I think that's shown very clearly in the fact that almost one million new jobs have been created here in Ontario since 1995. I know that each year the Ministry of Education provides school boards with funding for adult English as a second language, based on program enrolment. For 2001-02, school boards received more than $42 million for this program.

The newcomer settlement program of the Ministry of Citizenship provides nearly $4 million to 88 community agencies for settlement services for new immigrants, as well. The Ministry of Enterprise, Opportunity and Innovation has programs to help immigrant entrepreneurs and investors start businesses and create even more jobs here in our province. This government's approach has been inclusive, to engage the community, employers, workers, occupational and professional regulatory bodies, educators and trainers, all to help create solutions that work better for our province.

While we are consulting, listening and helping to find solutions with the support and input of the community, Bill 189 says the government has all the answers. While I agree with the intent of the bill, and will vote today to support this bill, I agree with my colleagues on this side of the House that further discussion at committee is very necessary.

I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Mr Ruprecht's bill this morning and look forward to further debate here.

Mr Alvin Curling (Scarborough-Rouge River): Let me, in my short time, hurriedly express my great appreciation to my colleague Tony Ruprecht for again bringing forward legislation that I had put forward and he had put forward at one time on the same matter. It becomes rather frustrating that this government will talk about it but do nothing. We've had so many ministers who have tried to do something and nothing has been done.

I heard the member over there state that we are moving toward many things like ESL programs. I want to brief him a little better on this. In addition to what we have here with foreign-trained professionals who are well trained and well skilled, who come to our country and our province, this is really a global phenomenon. Many countries today are competing to attract world talent and skills. In fact, just recently the august magazine the Economist—you're quite familiar with it—in their September 5, 2002, edition, had an intriguing study titled "Onward Bound" and asked, "Do developing countries gain or lose when their brightest talents go abroad?" It highlighted the pain that certain nations undergo when their pool of talent migrates to nations such as Canada.

I'm not here to talk about the pain that developing countries suffer when they lose—the brain drain. What we're talking about is the brain gain. They come here and we need to recognize and understand their contributions. Those contributions can be seen. Who can address those contributions? The regulatory bodies, as my colleague talks about in his bill. They need to recognize social and economic responsibilities by expediting the accreditation process and opening up the professional bodies—we know how tight and restricted they are—and he expresses that in his bill. Those regulatory bodies can advocate on behalf of the potential professional programs, such as ESL. The member talked about the ESL programs. They are a great and dire need, because some of these individuals really need that ESL program to assist them in that process. That would help them to support the system, and also by the government.

The member stated that it's governments who have all these wonderful things that they alone can deliver. No, we're talking about other organizations. Government, of course, needs to recognize their responsibilities, not only through positive, constructive, well-funded programs, but also to be a clearing house of information, a leader in institutional building and to be involved in advising potential immigrant applicants with honest expectations of the systems in Ontario and Canada; to play a more effective role in immigration policy, because when people do arrive here, they are not giving that kind of support to access and play a role in their potential.

The private sector, the businesses that benefit most from this professional talent, also need to take a leadership role and become part of the solution with standardized acceptance of accreditation and recognition of foreign degrees and experience, and a willingness to remove visible and latent barriers that exist. By embracing such objectives and working together, all three groups will realize the benefits and potential benefits of foreign-trained professionals.

There's an economic benefit, of course: The under-utilized skills benefit economic growth and fill the current and potential skills shortages. The current cost of non-recognition of immigrant credentials, which is estimated at $2 billion, would be addressed. These are people working who are being under-utilized, people who are professionally skilled. The province, the government itself, is not playing a very active role in that.

The social benefits are extremely important. It builds strong family values; it establishes a sound foundation and demonstrates an example for the children; it brings pride and respectability to the family. No fathers or mothers who are quite professionally skilled are at home, very under-utilized. They're encouraging their children that they, themselves, should be seeking education. Some of them would wonder, "What for, Mom? What for, Dad? You are not being utilized with the wonderful skills that you have." It's the government's responsibility. The social benefits are being undermined here. It allows the family to refocus the strong benefits of education and skills.

I'd hope that this government will endorse and embrace this policy, this legislation, and vote for it.

Mr Michael Prue (Beaches-East York): This nation has prided itself, probably since the time of Clifford Sifton, as being a nation of immigrants. In fact, Canada has welcomed per capita probably more people from other countries than any other nation on earth.

The big immigration years are not the ones we're seeing now. In fact, the big immigration years were during the population and settling of the west with the hundreds of thousands of people who were recruited in the Ukraine, from northern and eastern Europe, to populate the provinces, what were then the Northwest Territories. But we in Canada have not kept up with that noble tradition. Even though we continue to this day to take some 200,000 immigrants in Canada per year, those numbers do not reflect anywhere near the numbers that were taken when Canada's population was much smaller.

The number of immigrants coming into Canada has never come close to the 1% that most social observers say can safely and quickly be absorbed into the larger Canadian population. In fact, we should be doing more to help immigrants come to this country than we have done. I say that as a person who worked in the immigration department myself for some 21 years. In those 21 years, I saw people come from all over the world to make Canada their home: people who often came with very little more than a gleam in their eye and a hope for their children; people who prospered; people who were able to make significant contributions.

There have been many changes, though, even in my lifetime, even within the lifetime of people in this room. And how the immigration system has changed. Not only has it changed with respect to where the people are coming from—they are no longer primarily coming from Europe and the United States, the two previous source countries going back to the 1960s and 1970s, but they are now literally coming from every one of the 180 nations of this world. They are coming here speaking many languages; they are coming here with many creeds and religions.

Those immigration patterns have changed in other ways too. They've changed in the way that Canada recruits people. Now we have what is called a point system grid that allows people to come to this country. In the past, it was easy for people who could be sponsored or nominated by relatives to come here with virtually no problem, provided they had a blood relative. But today the primary sources of immigration are those who can apply and make the required number of points under the systems of either Canada or Quebec. The federal reliance on the family class has shifted remarkably in the last number of years. There is now a whole new emphasis on skills and abilities. One has to have the skills and abilities and the number of points in order to simply pass and be allowed forward. But the government of Ontario has not shifted with that whole new emphasis on skills and abilities. We act as a government in this province no different from the governments in the 1950s and 1960s who simply saw an incoming mass of people who were sponsored by relatives, the relatives who would look after them, find them jobs in the construction trade or on the farms or wherever they were destined. That has not changed.

Quite literally, the immigrants who are coming to this country, particularly to this province, are frustrated, because their skills and abilities for which they were chosen on the new grid systems are not being recognized. Literally as well, although you see the numbers of some 200,000 to 225,000 immigrating to this country every year, you do not see those who are emigrating. You do not see the ones who have given up in frustration and have gone back to their former countries, or who have gone on to a third country, like the United States or Great Britain, where their skills and abilities are being recognized. We talk about taking the best and the brightest. We do not use them. Literally tens of thousands of people leave in frustration after months and sometimes years of being unrecognized. We are all the poorer for it.

We are going to support this bill, but we support it not as an end but as a stop-gap measure. It allows for accreditation of immigrants; it allows for written reasons if those persons are refused accreditation; it allows for accrediting agencies to ensure that training will be given to new immigrants and people so that they can be allowed to compete in the Canadian market; and it allows an appeal process.

The major failure of this bill, if there is a failure, I think is twofold. The first is that it puts back on to the shoulders of the new Ontarian, the new immigrant to this country, that they must go to the courts to seek redress. That is an expensive process for anyone. That is an expensive process to someone who is established here, but it is doubly and almost impossibly expensive to someone who has come here, sometimes without the necessary monies—not everyone comes to this country rich—to then have to go out and hire and a lawyer. It must be shameful, if the person was a lawyer before, having to go out and hire another lawyer to go to court because they are not properly accredited, to spend all of that money and time, particularly to sometimes wait a year or two years in a backlogged court system, to get redress. We do not think that putting people through the court system, as this bill suggests, is a good thing. Something else needs to be done.

That takes me to the second, and that is a bill that was before this House back in 1999 by Tony Silipo, who was then a member of this House. He was suggesting a credentials assessment agency that could handle this kind of grievance rather than sending it through the courts. We think this bill would have been better with a credentials assessment agency. If the bill is passed today and is sent to committee, that is precisely the kind of amendment we would attempt to put to strengthen the bill in the short term.

But in the long term this government, the government of this province, has to do far more. The government has to be a player, and we are not a player, in this worldwide movement of people. We talk about needing doctors, we talk about needing engineers, we talk about needing nurse practitioners, but Ontario does nothing to get them.

As far back as 1867, Mr Speaker, the province of Ontario has had authority to do something about this. With your permission, I would just like to read something that, with the new Constitution and the Charter of Rights, people have forgotten about, and that is the British North America Act, which is still extant and which gives the provinces all the authority they need to do exactly what should be done.

Section 95 deals with agriculture and immigration, and it reads as follows:

"In each province the Legislature may make laws in relation to agriculture in the province, and to immigration into the province; and it is hereby declared that the Parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to agriculture in all or any of the provinces, and to immigration into all or any of the provinces; and any law of the Legislature of a province relative to agriculture or to immigration shall have effect in and for the province as long and as far only as it is not repugnant to any act of the Parliament of Canada."

What that means is that Ontario can do something similar to what Quebec has done. They have developed their own grid system. They have their own immigration officers who are abroad and who are in the province of Quebec to assist new immigrants, to choose new immigrants, to assess new immigrants, to assess credentials. I would suggest that we go no further than to our sister province of Quebec to see a province that actually recruits and recognizes people they choose and bring in.

We do not do that. Ontario should be there. Granted, it may be a little bit expensive, but Ontario would have a golden opportunity to go out into the field and choose people we need. We could choose the 1,500 doctors we need. We could choose the nurse practitioners and the engineers. We could choose the people who are in demand in this province. And we could recognize their credentials before they arrive here, not when they arrive here, not a year after they arrive here, not when they've given up in frustration and gone home, but while they are waiting to get their papers, their immigrant visa, to come to Canada.

Surely that makes much more sense, to say, "Ontario wants you and when you come with that doctor's certificate you will be recognized," or, "When you come with your certificate you will be required to do an additional year in school, and do you understand that will be the requirement?" People will then be able to make a rational choice whether they want to come to Ontario or to Quebec or to British Columbia. But certainly in Ontario, which takes more than half of all the immigrants to this country, we should be the leaders; we should be choosing the people and we should be helping those people to understand what it is to immigrate to this province.

It takes most immigrants about a year in the process from the day they apply for an immigrant visa until that visa is given to them. In some parts of the world, unfortunately, it may take two or three, in some it is less than a year, but a year is a fairly standard average. In that year, while medicals are being done, while stage B is being done, which is criminality and terrorists, while we're looking at all that stuff and all those tests are being done, this is an opportunity for the government of Ontario. If we do what is allowed in the Constitution of this country, it is an opportunity for us to assess the credentials of those very same people who are coming here. It is an opportunity for us to say, "Yes, your credentials are valid," or, "You will be required to do some additional study, which you can start while you're there." The time is not going to be wasted for these very valuable new citizens.

We have to give them that reasonable expectation. It is absolutely false and wrong on our part as a government to invite people into this country and then not recognize them and force them either into jobs they don't want—to uproot them from countries and they come with false expectations. It is our responsibility. It is our responsibility to be realistic, and part of that goes to this government's responsibility to help to choose the immigrants.

Of all the provinces and territories in Canada, it is only Ontario that has not signed the immigration accord, and that is why we get less money for things like helping new immigrants. We get less money than the province of Quebec per capita, because they have signed the accord and because they have a grid system. We get less money than Manitoba on a per capita basis, less money than Prince Edward Island on a per capita basis.

We need to be players. It is not enough simply to pass this bill. It is up to the government or any new government after the next election to seize the opportunity for our citizens. We need to help those citizens, but we also need to help Ontario. It is incumbent upon us, all members of this House, to do that which will help the economy of this province. The economy of this province is reliant upon new people coming into Ontario. As this province ages, as the people get older, as the baby boomers work their way through the system, as I am doing now here today, as we work our way through the system, increasingly we will require immigration to this province to maintain the standards that we have set. There are not enough children to even replace the boomers today, and we are going to increasingly have to rely on people from other countries who see this country and this province for the truly magnificent opportunity it is. We will need them. They will need us. We need to work together.

It is an honour to stand here today and to speak about this bill. We in the New Democratic Party will be supporting this bill here in the Legislature today, but we put all of you and ourselves as well on notice that more needs to be done. We need to be a player, we need to be a part, we need to help, and we are intent on doing that so that the people who are here in this gallery today—and I see many upstairs in here—will know that their credentials are recognized, that we welcome them as new Canadians, that we welcome them into the fabric of this society, that they have an important role to play with us and for us, and that this bill will be a part of it and in the future we'll do much more.

Interjection.

The Acting Speaker: We'd just like to remind those in the galleries that we really appreciate your being here with us this morning, but we cannot have any participation, and that includes applause and other such displays of—how should we say it?

Interjection: Emotion.

The Acting Speaker: Emotion—yes, that's a good one.

Ms Marilyn Mushinski (Scarborough Centre): I'm particularly pleased to have this opportunity to join this debate on Bill 189, not just because as an immigrant or a member of the Scarborough community for the last 35 years, but also as a member of this government, I believe that ensuring Ontario has a highly skilled workforce that's needed to attract jobs and investment is an absolute top priority for our government.

We know, for example, that access to jobs for internationally trained immigrants is a key to a strong economy. I don't think there's any question that this province has gone from being one of the worst economies seven years ago to now, seven years later, being the first economy and the best economy. We absolutely understand that a highly skilled workforce that is diverse contributes greatly to that.

We are working to ensure recognition of prior education, skills and training to help skilled newcomers enter the labour force quickly and contribute to the economy. An important part of this goal is to ensure that Ontario attracts the world's best and brightest. We want the world to see our province as the prime destination point for people looking for opportunity. Certainly that was one of the reasons why I immigrated to this great land over 35 years ago.

Our goal is to build partnerships to make Ontario the best place to live, work and raise a family, as you've already heard from my colleague Mr Dunlop. The government cannot accomplish this goal alone; we know that. It's important that we work together and gather the best advice and input from external agencies—some of whose representatives I know are here today—and organizations that have first-hand knowledge of their industries. I would suggest that in my own riding of Scarborough Centre we have those industries, Berg Chilling, for example, which truly understand that their workforce must represent and reflect the community they serve.

Our approach to achieving this goal is to continue to develop long-term partnerships that will promote the recognition of the qualifications of internationally trained professionals and tradespeople and ensure their participation in our economy as quickly as possible. However, we must also maintain high standards of quality and safety—this should not be understated—promoted by occupational regulatory bodies that Ontarians have come to expect and deserve.

There's no easy solution to this situation. No one group or organization can have all the answers to help people who have learned in different educational systems or trained under different regulatory regimes match their skills to Ontario needs. There can be no one-size-fits-all solution. We also recognize that no one organization can do it alone.

That's why we have built strong partnerships, based on respect and understanding, with occupational regulatory bodies, educational institutions, employers, community agencies serving immigrants, other government agencies and other governments as well. This approach has resulted in significant achievements to help the internationally trained quickly put their skills and training to work in Ontario.

Our government has allocated $15.5 million to support innovative bridge training projects to help the internationally trained learn what they need to know to be licensed to work in industries that are facing strategic skills shortages. We help internationally trained professionals apply their skills and knowledge in Ontario as quickly as possible. We know that this approach is working. Bridge training has already been launched for nurses and pharmacists in Ontario.

I would like to go on, but I know I have a couple of other colleagues who wish to address this. So I'll stop now, other than to say that in principle we support Mr Ruprecht's bill. But we need to get more new Ontarians into the economy, into jobs for which they have international training, and we need a more fulsome discussion in order to achieve that.

Mr Dalton McGuinty (Leader of the Opposition): It gives me a great deal of pleasure to participate in this debate. I want to begin by congratulating my colleague Tony Ruprecht for the initiative he has taken in introducing this bill. You should know that this is hardly a one-off from Mr Ruprecht. Earlier, he had introduced a resolution which received all-party support.

I take it from the government members' comments just a few moments ago that there is support for this bill, and I am very, very pleased to hear that.

Fundamentally, what we're talking about here is something that goes to the core of certainly what we choose to stand for as Liberals: opportunity. In fact, there are three aspects of opportunity here. First of all, there is the opportunity for individuals who have been trained in other parts of the world to come here and to work at their highest level of training. We think that is a very worthwhile pursuit on the part of our province and our collective within this Legislature. We are facing—and this has been out there for quite some time now—some serious labour shortages in a variety of sectors. There are some 900,000 Ontarians today who can't get access, for example, to a family doctor.

We have a shared sense of responsibility here to ensure that all those new Canadians coming here—who have been trained, by the way, at the expense of taxpayers living in other jurisdictions. We are so focused sometimes on the brain drain that we do so at the expense of our perspective in terms of looking at the brain gain followed by the brain waste. We've got all kinds of people who have come here from different parts of the world who received training at the expense of taxpayers in other jurisdictions. This is a gift, and we're not capitalizing on this. We're not leveraging this tremendous asset.

With respect to our responsibility when it comes to opportunity for the individuals involved, it's important that they be able to work at their highest level and get that sense of satisfaction that comes when you put your head down on the pillow at night, knowing that you're making a contribution to your economy, you're a productive member of society and you're able to raise your family. I think that's important for new Canadians to be able to do.

With respect to opportunity for Ontarians, and families in particular, I just made reference to the fact that there are so many Ontarians, so many families who can't get a family doctor. We are depriving them of the opportunity to get a family doctor or some other kind of skilled worker and professional. We owe it to Ontario families to ensure that these people, our new Canadians, are being admitted to our trades and professions at the earliest possible opportunity.

The third aspect of opportunity here that is often overlooked is that this represents a wonderful opportunity to further strengthen our economy. In the knowledge economy, the most valuable commodity is the skilled worker. We have skilled workers arriving on our shores and we are not doing everything that we should be doing to capitalize on that potential economic productivity. So what we're talking about here is a win-win-win. It's a win for the new Canadians, to ensure that they can work at their highest capacity; it's a win for Ontario families, who can access the services that would be offered by these new Canadians; and it's a win for our economy, because these skills add significantly to our level of productivity.

We've had kind of an unwritten rule, and it's time to move beyond this. The unwritten rule was: "Come to Canada. It is a land of opportunity and you will enjoy success here solely on the basis of hard work." But what we really said between the lines was: "The kids are going to find opportunity and you, the adults, are going to have to sit this one out." Well, in a just-in-time world we can't afford to do that any more. We need everybody at their best right away.

I have a son in first-year biology. He's thinking of becoming a doctor. Wonderful. I hope he makes it. But we're going to have to wait some 12 to 14 years for him. We can't wait 12 or 14 years for young people who are in first-year university today. On the other hand, we can get some of our skilled professionals—if I can stick with medicine, for instance—up to Ontario standards in, I don't know, some six to 18 months. So again, it's important that we recognize that things have changed. We owe it not only to our new Canadians but we owe it to ourselves to bring them up to speed as quickly as we can.

I urge government members to support this bill. I get the sense that they're about to do that. I want to conclude once again by thanking my caucus colleague Tony Ruprecht for his initiative and foresight in this matter.

Mr Joseph N. Tascona (Barrie-Simcoe-Bradford): I am very pleased to be able to speak on Bill 189 with respect to the practice of occupations, professions and trades in Ontario. Certainly people who are qualified to be in these professions should be there. That goes without saying. Certainly I think this government has done a lot of work in this area in terms of creating more opportunities, having an economy in place that provides these opportunities.

That's what Ontario is about. It's the engine of this country in terms of getting those jobs out there. That's why there are opportunities. Let's recognize what's been done to create these opportunities. The bottom line is, we have to get people in those positions.

In 2001, almost 11,000 newcomers said they intended to work in the engineering profession. Our government has assumed a leadership role and for the first time in Canada is supporting a bridge training project, a project that has been designed for internationally trained engineers that will provide paid work experience, a key prerequisite for a professional licensing. Once implemented, this program will help about 150 internationally trained engineers each year. There are more programs and more consultation going on with respect to this issue.

I'm going to yield my time right now to the Minister of Citizenship. It's such an important issue and I think he's done a great job in this area. I fully support the bill, but we have to make sure it fits the needs of this province.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): As my leader, Dalton McGuinty, did, I also wanted to compliment my colleague Tony Ruprecht, who's been absolutely relentless on this issue.

I just say that our economy, as my leader pointed out, depends on our ability to attract people to move from other countries to Ontario. Two years ago, the Ministry of Finance did a study that not many people are aware of that showed in three different "scenarios," as they called them, that without immigration our population in Ontario declines. We won't need to build any more houses because we'll have enough houses. Without immigration—

Interjection.

Mr Phillips: Mr Guzzo may choose to criticize in front of these people, but I'm just saying that the Ministry of Finance study shows that without immigration our population will decline and our economy will suffer dramatically. We need to have immigrants coming to this province and we need to continue to have skilled immigrants wanting to move to Ontario.

I remember meeting with the Speaker of the Michigan state legislature, who said their economic office role used to be to attract business to come to Michigan. Three years ago, they changed the role from attracting business to attracting workers to come to Michigan. That's the single biggest inhibitor of economic growth in the state of Michigan. I said to the Speaker, "We're very fortunate here in Ontario. We're able to attract talented people from around the world to come to Ontario."

But that won't continue unless we take steps. I happen to think we need to take steps and make some investment in the areas of settlement services and English as a second language so people feel at home and welcome here. Believe me, if we don't do that, our economy will suffer dramatically. But this particular one of making sure people who have acquired their skills and talents in other countries are able to use them here in Ontario is a cornerstone.

Eleven years ago, a major study was done on this, pointing out all the barriers, and virtually nothing's happened in 11 years. I sat with a person from Kitchener who has a self-help group involving 51 foreign-trained physicians who cannot practise in Kitchener. The member will know Kitchener has a doctor shortage, and 51 foreign-trained physicians live in Kitchener and cannot practise. So 11 years after this huge study was done showing all of the barriers, we still find very little action has taken place, and it's wrong. We're making a huge mistake.

I often talk to the consular corps here, consul generals from around the world, and they will tell you that talented people are hesitating to come to Canada and Ontario because when they get here—and they know their friends have come here—they're not able to practise the experience and talent they've got because we have these, in many cases, artificial barriers.

We can talk all we want about the tiny steps we've taken, but the proof is in what's happened to all of these people who still can't practise, whether it be doctors—51 foreign-trained physicians in Kitchener alone. We just absolutely have to take substantial steps. I argue it on the basis of economics, as my leader did. I happen to be our finance critic, so that's the area my leader asked me to comment on. Our economy depends fundamentally on our ability to continue to attract people from around the world to want to come to Canada and Ontario.

Without this step, believe me, other countries are now aggressively searching out talented people to move there. I talked to the Consul General of India who tells me that computer people in India are being attracted to California in large numbers. We have to make sure those people think, believe and know that Ontario is a place where they are at home and welcome. I compliment my relentless friend Dr Tony Ruprecht who has fought this issue for years and years, and I support his bill.

Hon Carl DeFaria (Minister of Citizenship, minister responsible for seniors): I have about a minute to speak on this. I want to welcome my friends who are here in the gallery, people I have worked with in the diverse communities of Ontario for many years. I want to tell you today that even though Bill 189 is too late and too flawed, I will be supporting this bill in principle because our government in fact has been acting on this issue.

The reason the bill is too late is that the Liberal government was here in 1985-87 and did nothing about this issue. The NDP government was here in 1990-95 and did nothing about this issue. There were foreign-trained professionals in Ontario in 1987 and in 1990-95, and those people did nothing while in government. It's flawed because section 2 would, for example, force the Ontario government to allow a lawyer who is licensed in Timbuktu to practise in Ontario automatically. Even though the legal system may be excellent in Timbuktu, it may not be—

The Acting Speaker: Thank you. Response.

Mr Ruprecht: I would like to thank my colleagues for their support, and I also want to thank the government benches for their support. But I'm astounded, and do you know why? We've heard these promises before. We've had the Minister of Training, Colleges and Universities, we've had every Minister of Citizenship from Ms Mushinski to Isabel Bassett, and now this minister comes up and says to us, "This bill is too late. Oh my God, this bill is too late." Where have you been, Minister? This is not too late.

What are you going to say to Dr Golubka, who is here right now. He's been here three years. Is this bill too late for him? He has practised in the Ukraine for 15 years. Is this bill too late? What about Dr Martinez, a veterinarian? He came from Israel. He practised there and in Europe. Is this bill too late for him? How about Ms Biese, who is here as a physiotherapist from Germany? She's been here for three years and can't practise. Is this bill too late for her? How about Ifad Karim, an engineer with 18 years' experience, in Canada six years and unable to practise. Is this bill too late for him?

It's too late for you if you don't get up and do something about it. So you know what I would recommend? If you are unable to do anything, move aside and let a McGuinty government take over and do something about it. That's what you should be doing. It's too late for you, my friend.

It's quite obvious what is happening here. You can see already that they want to support this bill but want to hide their faces at the same time and do nothing about it. They wish this bill would die, but this bill is not going to die; it's never going to die. Do you know why? Because more immigrants are coming; more immigrants are pushing the door down. You're holding the door shut and I'm asking you, open the door now, and if you can't do it, move aside and let a McGuinty government take over so we will do what we promised to do. In fact, our leader has said that if, in one year after we take over, this isn't done there will be hell to pay. We made that promise, we'll keep that promise and we're asking you to step aside.

The Acting Speaker: This completes the time allocated for debate.

LONG-TERM CARE

The Acting Speaker (Mr Michael A. Brown): I will now deal with ballot item 67. Mrs McLeod has moved private member's notice of motion 18.

Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion carry?

All in favour will say "aye."

All opposed will say "nay."

In my opinion, the nays have it.

We will vote after dealing with ballot item number 68.

REMOVAL OF OCCUPATIONAL BARRIERS ACT, 2002

LOI DE 2002 SUR L'ÉLIMINATION DES OBSTACLES PROFESSIONNELS

The Acting Speaker (Mr Michael A. Brown): Mr Ruprecht has moved second reading of Bill 189.

Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion carry? Carried.

Applause.

Mr Tony Ruprecht (Davenport): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: All these congratulatory comments of course are accepted, but at the same time I'd like to move that we place this bill before the public accounts committee.

The Acting Speaker: Mr Ruprecht has asked that this bill be referred to the public accounts committee. Agreed? Agreed.

LONG-TERM CARE

The Acting Speaker (Mr Michael A. Brown): We'll now deal with ballot item number 67. Call in the members. This will be a five-minute bell.

The division bells rang from 1201 to 1206.

The Acting Speaker: Would all those in favour please stand and remain standing until your name is called?

MEMBERS' STATEMENTS

MENTAL HEALTH SERVICES

Mrs Sandra Pupatello (Windsor West): Today I am very pleased to produce a series that was created by the Windsor Star, our local newspaper. It is a series about mental health. What I'll be doing with this series, which they kindly reproduced because of the significant demand, is distribute it to every member in this House. Moreover, we'll be sending a copy of this series to every agency that deals with mental health issues in Ontario. The series was produced by Veronique Mandal, assisted by Marty Beneteau. It is a tremendous record of the issues in mental health that individuals and families must deal with.

I just want to give you a little bit of information about it. It was a six-month investigation. It dealt with several issues in the mental health area including: "Fortresses of Fear"—as they were described; "the Killing of Percy Demers"—a wonderful doctor who died in our area; "Whose Life is it Anyway?"; "The Insanity Defence"; "The Doctor is Out"; "Mapping the Brain"; and, finally, "Hope for the Future". There were seven parts to this. If people would just take the time to read, it would be a tremendous education for all of us, even those who may not follow this issue every day. It will be helpful to governments of all levels to understand the significance of this disease creates and the impact it has on our families in this province.

Thank you for the opportunity. Please, members in this House, look forward to receiving your copy of this. Please call us. Visit our Web page, if you can't get a series or a copy. Please contact pupatello.on.ca or daltonmcguinty.com to access any of us, and we'll certainly see that we get you the series.

JERMAIN AND KEVIN EBANKS

Ms Marilyn Mushinski (Scarborough Centre): I rise today to speak of the deep sense of personal sadness I felt when attending the funeral of Jermain Ebanks and Kevin Ebanks in my riding of Scarborough Centre this past Tuesday. This is the kind of event that an MPP wishes she did not ever have to attend, but I wanted to be there to show my solidarity with the Ebanks family and the larger community. We are all shocked at the terrible news of the violent deaths of two young members of the Scarborough community. Jermain was only 17; his brother Kevin was 21. Both had their lives ahead of them. Both as an MPP and as a mother, I want to reiterate publicly my personal condolences to Mr and Mrs Ebanks. I recognize that words can never express the sorrow we all feel at this enormous loss, but we must bear in mind that despite this tragedy we live, for the most part, in a caring and loving community. A genuine sense of community and solidarity was present at the funeral. People attended to pay their respects, support the family and call for an end to violence in our city.

At this point I understand that the culprits have yet to be apprehended. I would like to speak to the larger community and ask that anyone with information come forward to the authorities.

HYDRO RATES

Mr Mario Sergio (York West): I want to address my remarks directly to the Premier, because everybody saw it coming except the government. The storm, unfortunately, did not miss us. Skyrocketing hydro bills are affecting everyone: seniors, farmers, small, medium and large businesses, tenants—many tenants are being hit twice, very hard.

Let me give you some correspondence that I have received from seniors in my particular area. These are seniors who are living on one pension, in a small house. Their last bill was $378, up from $199. They want to know from me, they want to know from you, Premier, from your government, how they are going to manage this exorbitant bill on a monthly basis. They are not the only ones. There are so many others who come to us with the same situation. We have businesses. I have a couple, a husband and wife, who have a small business. They have a small restaurant. From $800 to $2,300—they want to know from me, how many more spaghetti plates they have to sell to make up the increase from this government. So they are asking for a solution, some action, and they want action now.

Mr Peter Kormos (Niagara Centre): A small business, Dominic's Resto-Bar, down in the very north end of Thorold, is a well-established, successful and very popular restaurant with patrons from across the Niagara region. In fact, they employ 45 staff. But Heather Fasullo, who owns Dominic's Resto-Bar tells me that her hydro bill for the last two months was $6,400, up from $2,400 last year—a $4,000 increase. She explains to me with great regret that the only way she can contain that cost is by laying off staff. She can't raise the prices of food; the market simply isn't there. In fact, if staff layoffs won't suffice, she's even contemplating shutting down that business.

Dominic's Resto-Bar and other small businesses like it don't need a rebate that will help them for but one month. What about the other 11 months of the year? They don't need a freeze on rates that are already sky-high and unaffordable. Dominic's Resto-Bar and other small businesses like it, like individual residential payers across Niagara and this province, need a restoration of regulated public hydro, the very sort of policy that New Democrats have been fighting for in their opposition to the Tory-Liberal agenda of privatizing and deregulating hydro with its sky-high hydro rates.

VETERANS

Mr AL McDonald (Nipissing): Today I rise before the House to pay respect to all the brave men and women who made the ultimate sacrifice in an effort to secure our independence. They lived, they loved and they lost.

I am standing here today to say thank you to all the veterans who are with us today and to the soldiers who were lost in the wars of years gone by. We have not forgotten. Today I wish to reflect on and remember the efforts of those who fought for our freedom.

I look around the House today, and I see many a red poppy on the suits of the MPPs of this great province of Ontario. I can only imagine what the author of Flanders Fields, Mr John McCrae, must have seen when he decided to write that poem.

As the son of a lieutenant colonel, he saw first-hand the brutality that war brought upon those fighting. He, himself, lost many a good friend and fellow soldier to war. Mr McCrae never wanted this terrible hardship to be forgotten. Canadians have participated in major wars. Let us not forget our valiant efforts in battle at Vimy Ridge and Dieppe.

Furthermore, Canadian women played a vital role during the Second World War, with over 45,000 contributing directly to the war effort.

My dad served in the military for 25 years, and my grandfather served in World War II as a motorcycle dispatcher. Thank you to all who risked their lives so we might live in a country of freedom and opportunity. I am proud to be a Canadian.

HYDRO RATES

Mr Michael Gravelle (Thunder Bay-Superior North): If there was any doubt in Premier Eves's mind as to whether soaring hydro costs are hurting people in my riding, let me clear up that confusion today. Hydro bills, which are double what they were this time last year, are leaving many people, particularly those on fixed incomes, with increasingly desperate choices to make.

Perhaps the saddest story came from a widowed constituent who told my office that with her rent and her hydro bill she had nothing left to buy food for the rest of the month. This is unacceptable. The government must step in.

Then we have the impact this is having on our vital public services. In the first six months of this fiscal year, Thunder Bay Regional Hospital has already paid an amount equal to their total bill last year. Will Mr Eves pay for those increased costs or will hospital services have to suffer?

The bill for the Thunder Bay Catholic school board has almost doubled. Lakehead University's projections are that their bill will increase by $600,000. What about the many small businesses in my riding struggling to stay open under these increased costs?

In the municipality of Greenstone, the costs for their daycare went up by 44% for September. Roy Sinclair, the CAO of Greenstone, told me earlier this week that their new hydro bill had just arrived and, frankly, he was too scared to open it.

Premier, your energy policy is an unmitigated disaster. The people of Ontario, including my constituents, are now paying for the mess you've gotten us into. Use the record profits from OPG for a rebate now and eliminate the GST on your debt retirement charge—we should never have been paying it.

I encourage all my constituents to sign the petition we are presently circulating, a petition which is available in all municipal offices throughout my riding. Premier Eves and this government cannot be allowed to wait any longer to provide relief to those desperately in need of help. It is our job to make sure he gets that message.

TAKE OUR KIDS TO WORK DAY

Mr Bart Maves (Niagara Falls): Yesterday students from my riding and from ridings all across the province took part in the Learning Partnership's Take Our Kids To Work Day job-shadowing experience.

I had the wonderful opportunity of visiting with 20 grade 9 students from Kernahan Park high school yesterday who participated in a tour of the new provincial casino site currently under construction in Niagara Falls.

Students were taken around the perimeter of the casino site and were informed of the many construction skilled trades opportunities that were created with the announcement of the new casino. It is an $800-million project, equivalent to the construction of three Air Canada Centres.

Although, for safety reasons, students were not permitted to visit the site directly, on the top floor of the Hilton hotel overlooking the construction site, students were provided with an overview of the different aspects of construction underway.

When speaking to these students yesterday, I stressed how important and valuable construction trade skills and skills in the tourism industry are to today's labour market, especially in Niagara. There are many exciting careers to be experienced in skilled trades, and I believe yesterday's event provided students with some options to consider for their plans for the future.

Many thanks to their teacher Larry Downes from Kernahan Park high school, as well as Barry Reynolds, general superintendent for PCL, the builders of the new casino, and Judy Reid from the business education council for their involvement in yesterday's excellent and worthwhile event.

MINISTER OF NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT AND MINES

Mr Rick Bartolucci (Sudbury): The Minister of Northern Development and Mines has committed another blunder. This time he has insulted all northerners by calling them fat. Let me quote from the Manitoulin Recorder: "Mr Wilson said that after all the dinners and functions he had attended in the past seven months he was also beginning to look like a northerner as well. 'I have gained 20 pounds,' he said."

For a member of this Legislature to suggest all northerners are overweight is unbelievable. From the supposed minister for northern Ontario, such an insult is unforgivable. This type of regional stereotyping or whatever you want to call it is just plain wrong in this day and age.

Minister Wilson should know better. Public servants in the north and across the province are already ill at ease with this hot-headed minister, who said only a few weeks ago that he would fire all employees of his ministry who are not card-carrying Tories. We question the judgment and the ability of this minister.

The fact is that Minister Wilson has failed the north. He has done nothing to address the inequity of the northern health travel grant. He has done nothing to stop the carnage along Highway 69. He has done nothing to protect jobs at the ONTC.

Worst of all, Jim Wilson, as former energy minister, along with Ernie Eves, has completely bungled Hydro, leading to skyrocketing bills. Another apology is not in order from this minister. His resignation is.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Mr Raminder Gill (Bramalea-Gore-Malton-Springdale): I rise today to pay tribute to the Canadian war veterans who fought so bravely and gave so much to preserve our freedoms.

Remembrance Day, celebrated on the 11th hour of the 11th day of the 11th month, is of special significance whether we are immigrants or 10th-generation Canadians.

Canada and the world we know today would not be possible without the courage, valour and sacrifice of our veterans. The two world wars truly shaped Canada, yet today too few students and adults are being taught about our proud military history. A poll conducted this past April found that 57% of Canadians could identify In Flanders Fields as Canada's most famous war poem, but only one third, or 36%, could identify Vimy Ridge as the battle that captured a key ridge on the western front.

Teaching Canadian history must include in-depth analysis of our military's role in the great wars. The sacrifices made should not be forgotten or simply brushed aside. On Remembrance Day, all Canadians pause to reflect and we remember those young soldiers numbering in the tens of thousands who never returned home. On behalf of the veterans in my riding, I would like to urge all parents and students to join in our local Remembrance Day services this Sunday in the Malton Arena. In Brampton, Remembrance Day services will be held on both Sunday and Monday at Brampton city hall.

On Remembrance Day, let us all personally remember and thank those who gave so much to preserve the freedoms we all enjoy today.

VISITORS

Mr Dave Levac (Brant): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I'd like to acknowledge in the west gallery today, led by Patrick Fry-Smith, vice-president of Local 201, Hamilton Central Ambulance Communications Centre, all of the members who have joined us today to educate the members of this House and others about the concerns they have about dispatch in Hamilton. REPORTS BY COMMITTEES

STANDING COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr John Gerretsen (Kingston and the Islands): I beg leave to present the report on the Ontario innovation trust fund from the standing committee on public accounts and move the adoption of its recommendations. I'm handing it to Matthew here.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Does the member wish to make a brief statement?

Mr Gerretsen: There are three recommendations in the report that specifically state that any act respecting the accountability of public sector organizations should apply to the Ontario innovation trust fund and that the Provincial Auditor should be appointed as the trust auditor. The last recommendation states that should the government continue with the creation of trusts, it should ensure that the proper accountability mechanisms to the Legislature form part of the trust agreement and that the accounting should meet PSAB accounting rules. I might note that there's a dissenting opinion which specifically states that the innovation trust should also be subject to the PSAB rules of public accounting.

With that, I move adoption of the report and adjournment of the debate.

The Speaker: Mr Gerretsen has moved adjournment of the debate. Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion carry? Carried.

WIFE ASSAULT PREVENTION MONTH

Hon Dianne Cunningham (Minister of Training, Colleges and Universities, minister responsible for women's issues): November is Wife Assault Prevention Month in Ontario. Wife Assault Prevention Month is an opportunity to remind all of us that wife assault is a crime and that we must work together to stop the violence.

Our government is committed to helping end domestic violence. It is a commitment that is ongoing and unequivocal. We've made good progress in many areas. We are proud of the accomplishments of our agencies and committed individuals across nine ministries and thousands of committees who work together to prevent wife assault.

On September 5, 2002, we announced $21.4 million, to be spent over three years, as another important step forward in the government's strategy to address domestic violence. This brings our commitment for this year to $160 million. Funding to combat violence against women has increased by 70% since 1995.

As minister, I'm continuing to meet with provincial associations, experts and local agencies to get their best advice on the most effective way to implement specific domestic violence measures. What works? Where can we make improvements? What are your local priorities? We remain convinced that our continuing collaboration and our commitment to protection and prosecution, support for victims, prevention and education will help stop domestic violence.

While our government continues to improve supports and services for the victims of domestic violence, ministries, agencies and lawmakers alone cannot solve this problem. It is a challenge that we must all think of and tackle as a community. Because ending domestic violence is everyone's responsibility, this year we are highlighting the valuable role every Ontarian can play.

We are fortunate that there are Ontarians who are taking the initiative and making a difference when and where they can. We have three special guests with us today who are making their own contribution in different ways, and I would like to tell you their stories.

Ontario Provincial Police Sergeant David Rektor has worked as a volunteer, providing couples with valuable information about domestic violence at marriage preparation courses. In addition to his unique police perspective, he has what he calls a "real world" personal perspective, having lived through a relative's experience with abuse. By working with young couples, Sergeant Rektor is helping to stop domestic violence before it starts.

Rifka Khalilieh, representing the Body Shop Canada: since 1994, the Body Shop has promoted the STOP Violence Against Women campaign. I think most of us have noticed it and been part of it. Each year, they sponsor a series of events involving local dignitaries at every Body Shop location. With the help of customers and campaign partners, the Body Shop Canada has raised more than $1 million for violence prevention and recovery programs. I'll introduce them all at the end.

Mona Walrond is a teacher who joined a team at the Elementary Teachers' Federation of Ontario to create Anti-Violence Against Women. This resource educates women teachers about what constitutes violence, how to identify potential abusers, understand the impact on children and benefit from community resources.

I would like to ask Sergeant Rektor, Rifka Khalilieh and Mona Walrond to please stand and be recognized and thanked by the members of this Legislative Assembly. It's our pleasure and our honour, of course, to be able to bring individuals like our three guests today to this Legislative Assembly and to thank them so much for their initiative and their role modelling in their own communities and throughout this great province.

I know that women and children of our province should not have to fear for their safety or their lives. I encourage all Ontarians to play a part in making every home and every community across our great province safe places for all of our families. Wife Assault Prevention Month is a reminder that we have more to do together.

These three great citizens are to be commended. They have our pride and our honour.

Mrs Marie Bountrogianni (Hamilton Mountain): On behalf of the Liberal caucus and my leader, Dalton McGuinty, we also thank our special guests for their efforts in addressing domestic violence, and to all the people across this province who are battling this tragedy, we thank you.

Despite all our efforts in this country and province to address the tragedy of wife assault, the number of men accused of killing their wife or ex-wife rose by 33%, with most of the increase occurring in Ontario.

Sadly, nearly one quarter of women who have experienced wife assault never told anyone about the abuse. Some 75% of women who experience wife assault do not go to the police.

It is estimated that 80% of children of abused mothers have directly witnessed the abuse. I can tell you, as a child psychologist, that this leaves scars that are very difficult to erase. Serious behavioural problems are 17 times higher for boys and 10 times higher for girls who have witnessed abuse.

Without access to affordable housing, without access to immediate counselling and support, many women feel there is no choice but to stay within an abusive household.

I want to speak about the important role of second-stage housing and how that plays an important role in preventing such tragedies. We have 27 such housing programs across the province. Shelters can only house women and children for up to six to eight weeks.

Second-stage housing provides what is really important after that initial shock, and that is consistent, secure and safe housing for a year or longer. It is very important to have this consistency when you're counselling women and children. In fact, if you have counselling dollars without this consistent housing, the counselling is ineffective. Kids need to feel physically safe first before they can trust another adult.

Before 1995 the province funded second-stage housing, along with very important counselling services. In 1995 the provincial funding was completely cut and downloaded to municipalities. Fundraising and special project monies are what keep most of these programs alive. Four of them are alive through federal support.

Earlier this week, representatives and former residents from Phoenix second-stage housing in Hamilton and from the Nekanaan second-stage housing in the city of York came to Queen's Park with a message, and that was, "Please reinstate provincial funding to second-stage housing."

A very brave young woman, Tanya, relayed her story this week. It's a success story. God knows, we've relayed enough tragedies in here and will continue to do so—it is our responsibility—but it is important to show that good programming can do a lot to turn a person's life around. Tanya says:

"One year ago I left an extremely abusive relationship. I ended up at Inasmuch House,"—a shelter—"like many other women in my situation, looking for a way out. As my eighth week was approaching I still had not found an apartment, between work, my daughter, and trying to figure out why I could not let go of him. When my counsellor approached me ... " and she approached Phoenix Place second-stage housing.

"When I first moved to Phoenix Place I remember feeling scared, confused, lost and lonely, on top of my hysteria and confusion of the abuse. I hated Phoenix Place for what it represented. I really did not want to be here but I had to be here to make things better for my daughter and I....

"Now that it is time to leave my perspective of Phoenix Place has changed. I am no longer scared, confused or lonely and most of all I am no longer being abused. I also no longer hate Phoenix Place for what it represents." She sees it now as "a place where my daughter and I were able to heal, to learn to be ourselves and most of all move forward and that is what we have done. I wish to thank the staff and coordinators of Phoenix Place...."

Tanya wants this second chance for every woman across the province who may need it. In 2001, Phoenix Place in Hamilton had 69 women and 77 children apply for housing. Unfortunately, they were only able to house eight women and five children. Since its opening, some 513 women with 567 children have requested housing. Only 60 women and their children were housed.

The irony here is that we end up at the municipal level housing these women and children at expensive hotels, at a far greater rate than we would if we had enough second-stage housing.

I think the most important part of second-stage housing for the children is that secure, consistent house where they know they are safe, where eventually they will trust a counsellor and trust that they will be safe in their future.

On behalf of the women and children at risk across this province, I plead with you, Minister, to consider reinstating funding to second-stage housing. I know I speak for all of us on this side of the House and probably for most of us on the other side of the House when I ask you to do so.

Ms Marilyn Churley (Toronto-Danforth): Bonita Blunt, a 39-year-old mother of two children, was found dead on Sunday of multiple stab wounds and a slashed throat. Her estranged husband has been charged with first-degree murder. This is another woman to add to the long, sad list of women murdered by their spouses or ex-spouses in this province. On behalf of the New Democratic Party, and I'm sure all members in this House, our hearts go out to the family of Bonita Blunt today.

The biggest security threat to Ontario today is the terror women experience at the hands of their spouses or ex-spouses. What is this government doing to protect these women? I just received a press release that shows the government is actually planning to close one of Thunder Bay's shelters for abused women, a decision Thunder Bay's police chief says is so wrong-headed that it defies logic. The chief cited "an ever-increasing demand for beds at the shelter." Thunder Bay city council—I don't know if you know about this, Minister, but you should look into it—passed a resolution opposing the shelter closing. I understand there has been some discussion of putting some beds in some of the other shelters, squeezing them in there. Please look into that, as you, I'm sure, would agree that this is extremely wrong-headed.

I also want to talk about the victims' justice fund. Advocates are telling us and telling you that you've used most of the money for the bricks and mortar instead of victim counselling. Advocates are asking, if there is any money left, where is the accountability and is it going to be used for the actual housing or counselling for these victims? It isn't being used for that right now.

The Conservatives set up a fatality review committee, and that's good. I'm glad you're doing that. What we want to ask is, where is the money and what are you doing for the women living in danger? When is this government going to respond to the Hadley inquest? When is the government going to bring back second-stage housing in this province? It would go a long way to helping women and children, which it used to do, in transition when they're fleeing violent situations?

As you know, a Statistics Canada report on homicide rates in Canada revealed that, in one year, spousal homicides across Canada jumped to 69 from 52, with virtually all of that increase taking place in Ontario. That is a 25% increase. It's an unacceptable number. This woman I mentioned today, Bonita Blunt, is now added to those numbers.

You have been warned by women on the front lines. We bring this up time and time again. The coalition of 165 groups came to Queen's Park to warn the Conservatives of what they called a crisis now in domestic abuse. They wanted all-party support for the provincial government to fund emergency measures to address this terrible violence against women.

You've been warned by the Provincial Auditor. One year ago, he reported women and children were being turned away from overcrowded women's shelters in eight out of nine Ontario regions. In the year 2000, 1,000 women and children had been turned away from a single women's shelter and forced to go to a homeless shelter. There are lengthy waiting lists for these key services.

Two inquests into spousal homicides provided you with the blueprint for action. It should be immediately implemented.

I know you have focused on policing and the courts, but as you well know, that is not the only solution to domestic violence.

Finally, I want you to table in this House all of the information that shows your government has actually increased funding for violence against women to 70%. I know that isn't accurate and I would like you to table that documentation.

Finally, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, I too want to thank and congratulate the people who are here today, for their services and contributions to eradicating violence against women in this province, and indeed all the front-line workers who are working so hard to stop this violence.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Hon Carl DeFaria (Minister of Citizenship, minister responsible for seniors): I'd like to make a statement on Remembrance Day. On Monday, November 11, at 11 am, Canadians will pause for a moment of silence. We will pause to honour the thousands of Canadians, men and women, who risked their lives and all those who lost their lives to defend freedom and democracy.

In times of war and on peacekeeping missions around the world, our troops have served Canada with courage and resolve. Canadians have risked and given their lives so that future generations could enjoy the blessings of peace and democracy. Those of us who have known only peacetime cannot begin to imagine the terror and horror of war, but our veterans do. During this remembrance week, we pay homage to those who fell. We also honour our veterans who faced danger and survived to carry on.

Our government's commitment to preserving this vital part of our history is real. Today, the Ontario government announced two initiatives: a $1-million contribution to the construction of the Juno Beach Centre, situated on the Normandy coast. As our Premier has stated, "This centre will be a place where generations of families can come to learn, remember and reflect." As well, our government has committed to create a war memorial, a cenotaph on the grounds of Queen's Park. In making these announcements, our Premier has noted, "These two memorials will help preserve the stories of men and women who showed us what courage, service and greatness is."

Our veterans' experience is a living legacy, a vital part of our national consciousness. They are keeping our history alive. That is why the Ontario government continues to support the outstanding work of the Dominion Institute and the Memory Project. Through the Memory Project, veterans share their wartime and peacekeeping experiences with Ontario students. Since the project was launched in 1999, more than 550 veterans have joined the speakers bureau. Their stories have been shared with more than 45,000 high school students and with immigrants who are learning English as a second language. This work is crucial. Through it, our young people experience the realities of war not found in textbooks, and newcomers to Canada gain a deeper knowledge of their adopted homeland and the meaning of citizenship.

During the First World War, a Canadian doctor, John McCrae, wrote the poem "In Flanders Fields" while on the battlefield. That poem's stark image of red poppies growing between the soldiers' graves became an enduring symbol of remembrance, the same symbol we wear today.

Canadians are keenly aware that our safety and security are not to be taken for granted. In the year following September 11, 2001, Canada committed 3,000 personnel to support the international coalition against terrorism. Just like their counterparts before them, they are putting themselves in danger to defend freedom and democracy, the values that are core to our way of life. Perhaps that is why you will see even more people wearing poppies this year.

On the 11th day of the 11th month, Canadians, now more than ever, will pause to remember and be thankful to the Canadian men and women, past and present, who served our country with brave resolve. They deserve our deepest gratitude. We'll never forget that they put their lives on the line to fight for freedom. I urge all members to take part in the Remembrance Week ceremonies taking place in our respective communities.

Mr James J. Bradley (St Catharines): In a legislative body which by its very nature is partisan and often confrontational, there is an occasion when partisanship is set aside and consensus is easily reached. That occasion is the last sessional day before Remembrance Day, when members of the Legislative Assembly pause together to remember those Canadians who made the supreme sacrifice, the sacrifice of their lives, in a war fought to defend freedom and democracy.

Over the years there have been moving tributes paid to those whose memory we honour as a nation on November 11—tributes delivered with eloquence, passion and emotion by those who served in our armed forces in times of war. Far better than we who did not experience military service on a personal basis, some members of the Legislative Assembly, themselves veterans of conflicts around the world, shared with us and with those who have access to the deliberations of this House the horrors of war and the immense sacrifices made by those who fought in defence of our way of life.

What is often forgotten as we march alongside veterans of the wars is that so many of these men and women were very young when they entered the service of their country in the war effort overseas and far too many did not return home to their loved ones or have the opportunity to live lives filled with all the experiences that are available to those of us who are beneficiaries of their sacrifice.

One of the most moving moments at cenotaphs across our country is the laying of the wreath by the Silver Cross mother, who has seen her loved one or loved ones depart for wars in foreign lands and not return. One wonders what memories pass through their minds as they move, often haltingly and almost always with assistance, toward the war memorial in their community to lay this wreath which carries so much significance.

War is all too often glorified and, indeed, mischaracterized in popular movies. The depiction of events bears little resemblance to the realities of the battlefield, for in reality our veterans will tell us that the days were grim, the conflict so very often hard and the damage inflicted, both on the body and on the mind, often irreparable.

While it is the dead we honour at Remembrance Day services, our thoughts are also with those who returned from action sometimes scarred both physically and psychologically by the ravages of war. The tears that appear in the eyes of veterans whose memories recall all too vividly the loss of friends, the destruction of homes and the ugly wounds of conflict are understood by all of us.

As the lines of marching veterans thin from age, infirmity and death, we who remain must assume a special obligation to remember. In his poem "In Flanders Fields," John McCrae refers to the passing of the torch to those who succeed our fallen comrades. Most assuredly we must all, young and old, take up the challenge of those who made the supreme sacrifice on our behalf.

While the focus on remembrance and reflection is, as it should be, on November 11, it is essential that we who enjoy the benefits of democracy for which our veterans fought and died honour them throughout the year. The Royal Canadian Legion and other veterans' organizations across our land need our support more than ever to maintain their efforts to preserve Remembrance Day as an occasion for all Canadians to remember the sacrifices made in World War I, World War II, the Korean War and other conflicts in which our armed forces have been involved. They need our support as well to ensure our veterans are treated with dignity, respect, generosity and compassion in their senior years as battle scars on the body and mind begin to take their toll on their lives.

It is said that in communities in the Netherlands, France and other countries where Canadians liberated people from their oppressors, to this very day the children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren of those who had the yoke of occupation lifted by our Canadian forces remember and pay tribute to our fellow Canadians for the sacrifices made so very long ago.

When we see members of the Royal Canadian Legion, when we see those who served so that we might enjoy the democratic freedoms that are ours today, when we see these individuals often shivering in the cold winds of November, poppy box in hand, let us stop to say thank you and let us join in two minutes of silent remembrance on November 11. Those who are no longer with us and those who return from war should expect no less from all of us.

Mr Peter Kormos (Niagara Centre): I'm honoured to be able to speak on behalf of the New Democratic Party caucus in this tribute to Canadian women and men who, over the course of a century-plus, have made the supreme sacrifice.

This coming weekend, every one of this New Democratic Party caucus, like every other member of the Legislature, will be joining their communities at war memorials and cenotaphs indeed across this province.

Howard Hampton will be travelling up to Kenora-Rainy River where he will be visiting small town after small town in that huge riding as he participates in this tribute to courageous, brave and idealistic Canadian women and men. As we visit those cenotaphs and war memorials, especially in those small towns—be it the communities that Howard Hampton, Shelley Martel or Tony Martin will visit in the north, or like Port Robinson or Pelham last weekend for me down in Niagara region—and we see the lists of the fallen, it seems somehow that it was small-town Ontario, small-town Canada and rural Ontario that gave disproportionately when it was called upon to deliver up their young men and women to fight in the First World War, the Second World War and, yes, the Korean War—to call it anything other than a war is to do a great disservice to those veterans of the war in Korea—and, yes, Canadians who served in the war in Vietnam and who, for the largest part since then, have served with incredible self-restraint on behalf of this country as it participates in international peacekeeping exercises.

As we reflect upon those who have served over the course of so many years, let's understand that our Second World War vets now are approaching their eighth decade. They're well into their late 70s and early 80s, the youngest of them. Our Korean War veterans are approaching their 70s. That means that the responsibility for recalling those great sacrifices, be it in small-town Ontario or at the great cenotaph in front of old city hall here in Toronto, falls increasingly on to the shoulders of not just their children but indeed their grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Let's recall the heroic role of Canadians. Let's recall as well that, at the time of World War II, this was a country of but nine provinces and a population of approximately 10 million people. Yet Canadians distinguished themselves certainly in the First World War. Many have commented that the Canadian identity was forged in some of the great battles where Canadians provided leadership in the First World War and that the Canadian role in the liberation of Europe, the defeat of fascism and Naziism, has become a hallmark characteristic of the Canadian character as a nation.

We celebrate not only those who served in the armed forces but those as well who served in the merchant marine. We must recall as well, although they weren't members of a state-sanctioned, organized and authorized force, those idealistic young Canadians who fought as part of the Mackenzie-Papineau brigade—the MacPaps—who went to Spain to confront fascism in its seminal stages and laid their lives down there too.

The sacrifices are historic, but they're also current. Why, it's within the very recent past, well within the painful memories of so many family members and friends, that two young Ontario men—my colleague Marilyn Churley attended one of their funerals; he was one of her constituents—were killed, regrettably and tragically, by friendly fire.

We salute these brave Canadians. We accept the responsibility to perpetuate their memory, to recall their courage, to recall their sacrifice and to commit ourselves to never having to send young people to war again.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Would all of the members and our friends in the gallery please rise for a moment of silence.

The House observed a moment's silence.

The Speaker: I thank all of the members.

ORAL QUESTIONS

HYDRO DEREGULATION

Mr Michael Bryant (St Paul's): My question is for the Minister of Energy. Two weeks ago today, one of your predecessors, Mr Wilson, gave a speech in Espanola at the Pinewood Motor Inn. It was recorded in the Manitoulin Recorder. In that speech, he predicted a spring election, and he was asked why. This is what he said, Minister, "I don't think he"—the Premier—"wants to go to the polls when electricity rates go up again next summer." Is this this government's cynical electrical election strategy?

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, minister responsible for francophone affairs): No.

Mr Bryant: Well, this indictment of the minister certainly throws a wet blanket on your big announcement tomorrow, doesn't it? Whatever credibility and hope you might have had in trying to provide rate relief is starting to look a lot more like a quick-fix Band-Aid, isn't it? And this from the same energy minister who designed the electricity competition marketplace. That is hydro-pocrisy at its highest, isn't it?

My question to you is, will you admit that whatever you announce tomorrow in your incredibly needed rate relief package, as long as Ernie Eves is the Premier, electricity prices will continue to rise?

Hon Mr Baird: I think what this province needs is rhetoric relief from the member opposite.

Mr Bryant: The non-confidence votes from this government continue to pile up. First, former Minister—

Interjections.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Don't be yelling, "Question." It's hard for the members. They don't know if I'm yelling it or you're yelling it. We do both sides, and it's unfair to do that. Please don't do that.

I apologize. You may start over.

Mr Bryant: Minister, the votes of non-confidence from cabinet members and caucus continue to pile up. You have former Minister Jackson. You have a sitting parliamentary assistant, Mr Mazzilli. You have a sitting cabinet minister, Mr Clark. You now have the former energy minister, Mr Wilson. All of them have expressed a lack of confidence in your energy policy.

So my question to you is, if your cabinet members and your caucus do not have confidence in your electricity policy, how on earth could Ontario voters have any confidence in you?

Hon David H. Tsubouchi (Chair of the Management Board of Cabinet, Minister of Culture): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: The member should refer to the members by their ridings or by their positions.

The Speaker: I'm sure the member knows that and will do that in the future.

Hon Mr Baird: It's easy for people in the Liberal Party to have confidence in their party's policy, because if they don't like it they can just use the one they espoused yesterday.

I would indicate to the member opposite, as I have earlier in this place, that the Premier is concerned and I'm concerned about the effect that families, farmers and small business people face when they look at their electricity bill on their kitchen table and their concern for the future. The Premier has asked me to look at the issue of rate relief and the issue of what we might do to address the legitimate concerns that working families in the province have, and I'll be doing that and reporting to the people of Ontario in short order.

The Speaker: New question.

Mr Bryant: Again to the Minister of Energy, late-breaking news today: the Independent Market Operator came out with its decision in response to the application made by local utilities for "immediate and urgent adverse financial impacts on local distribution companies."

They turned to the IMO for relief because of a botched marketplace, and the IMO has rendered its decision, and it is to turn down the application of the local distributors. That means that local utilities, many of them wholly owned by municipalities, might have their assets seized by lenders because they are on the verge of bankruptcy. What are you going to do to fix your botched electricity marketplace?

Hon Mr Baird: We've certainly been actively working with the Electricity Distributors Association. I met with the IMO and others to discuss what can be a reasonable position with respect to their getting payment and the differential between when they collect bills. I think the announcement we'll make in short order will help address that.

It is passing strange—I look at the utility in my own home constituency of Ottawa-Carleton. If they're having financial trouble, maybe they should look to their shareholder, which this year is taking $28 million out of the system, before the member opposite rises with his rhetoric.

Mr Bryant: It's not rhetoric; it's a decision from the IMO. It has turned down an effort by the local distributors to get some assistance, because you built a marketplace that isn't working. You built a marketplace when you were told again and again that price spikes would leave them on the edge of financial ruin. The answer from the government before the market opened in May was, "No, no, no, there won't be any price spikes. Don't worry."

What happened is that you built a shiny red convertible without a top and you sent it into the Arctic tundra, and now consumers and distributors are finding it a mite uncomfortable.

This is a serious matter. These utilities are saying they are on the verge of bankruptcy, and the IMO is giving them no relief. It is only the government that designed the market that is going to be able to fix this problem.

Are you going to include in your announcement tomorrow relief for this very critical problem, which has the marketplace on its knees?

Hon Mr Baird: As I mentioned to the member opposite, we've been looking at solutions with the Independent Market Operator. Do generators need to be paid in the short order that they're paid now? My answer would be no. Can the local distribution companies and their shareholders take part of the responsibility? I think the answer is yes. Can we facilitate and help in that role? I think the answer is clearly yes, and we're working toward that objective.

I do find it passing strange when we look at some of the local distribution companies. Take Toronto Hydro. You have the shareholder there, who took tens and tens of millions of dollars out of the company, who this year will take out $60 million in addition to that as profit. The shareholder who takes out this money doesn't want to help them with any financial relief, and somehow it's this government's responsibility? I don't think so.

Mr Bryant: You raised Toronto, Minister. More bad news and another wet blanket on your electricity policy: it was revealed in published reports that a greater Toronto hockey league official predicted that hockey registration fees for the minor leagues could jump by more than 100 bucks per player next year. Not only are you boarding Toronto consumers with high prices, not only are you slashing them with a bonus hydro bill, but now you are hitting them where it really hurts: in the hockey rink, attacking our national sport. I say to you, a match penalty for government misconduct and incompetence.

What do you say to Ontario families who have to say to their sons and daughters, "Sorry, kids, you can't play hockey this year; the hydro bills are too high"?

Hon Mr Baird: If fearmongering were against the rules, the member opposite would be in the penalty box. We're looking at the whole issue with respect to providing rate relief for the hot months that we've seen, as was envisaged when we started electricity reform. We're also looking at what stability we might provide, and we'll be able to report back to the people of Ontario in short order.

In the member opposite's constituency, they've been paying stable rates for electricity at 4.3 cents. I do underline that as well.

The Speaker: New question.

Mr Howard Hampton (Kenora-Rainy River): My question is for the Minister of Energy. Minister, deregulation has meant skyrocketing hydro bills for homeowners, small businesses, farmers, schools, hospitals—the list is almost endless. But you still don't seem to get it. Media reports suggest that you will offer people a $45 rebate cheque and some technical changes. If that's all you have to offer, Minister, let me give you some advice: you'll be run out of town.

Minister, why are you offering a dim-bulb suggestion when we need a megawatt solution?

Hon Mr Baird: I would say very directly to the leader of the third party, this Legislative Assembly provides him with a few million dollars for research, and he should spend more than 50 cents on the Toronto Star to do his research for question period.

Mr Hampton: The fact remains, Minister, that you and the Liberals still think you can make hydro deregulation and privatization work. You and the Liberals still believe that if you offer some rebates just before the run into an election campaign, you can fool people.

New Democrats know that if you look across North America, deregulated, privatized hydro isn't working very well anywhere. That is certainly the case in the United States. So why are you and the Liberals offering a pathetic bribe when hydro consumers know they'll get zapped again and again if you don't cancel hydro deregulation?

Hon Mr Baird: I'm more than pleased to be accountable for those of us on this side of the House in question period, but don't ask me to be accountable for the policies of the Liberal Party—

Interjection: Or lack thereof.

Hon Mr Baird:—or lack thereof. Trying to pin down the Liberals on a policy position is like stapling Jell-O to the wall.

I will say to the member opposite, I do admire the fact that he has been consistent in his policies, his values and his beliefs with respect to electricity and with respect to deregulation and opening a competitive marketplace in the province of Ontario. The Premier of Ontario strongly shares the concerns that working families, that farmers, that small business operators have in the province, not just with the bills that are on their kitchen table but as well with respect to what the future holds. He's asking me to report to him and to my cabinet colleagues and to the people of Ontario on this issue, and we will, in very short order, because we appreciate that concern.

Mr Hampton: Minister, let me give you an example of what's really happening out there. Leonardo Capone of Hamilton is out more than $400 on his hydro bill. What will your pathetic little rebate do for him—buy him some candles and a flashlight? You and the Liberals continue to believe that if you just throw some rebate money around, what has become a financial catastrophe across this province can be made to disappear.

Minister, don't listen to the Liberals. Don't listen to the private sector hydro lobbyists out there. Cancel deregulation now. Do the right thing.

Hon Mr Baird: I certainly share the concerns that the gentleman he raises has with respect to his electricity costs. We will be reporting in short order.

The member opposite is riding around the province in his bus, encouraging public power at cost, but we haven't had public power at cost.

I'll tell him another story. It's about the baby born in the province of Ontario this morning who has a $3,000 bill with respect to Ontario Hydro's massive debt. I'll tell you another story: about the family in his own constituency who's having to pay off $10,000 of debt that he and previous governments racked up. Where is the social justice in the province of Ontario in racking up debts in the names of our children and our children's children? There is no social justice in that.

The Speaker: New question.

Mr Hampton: Minister, yesterday the Premier suggested that the Ontario Energy Board had directed local utilities not to cut people's hydro off. He was wrong about that, just like your government was wrong about hydro deregulation and privatization in the first place. But today, a woman who watched the Premier sent us a fax. She's a mother from Burlington. Her daughter, who has MS and who has to look after two small children, had her gas cut off. The reason? Because she had to use the money that would have covered the gas to pay the skyrocketing hydro bill.

I say to you, Minister, when it is four and five below at night, no one should have their gas or their hydro cut off. It is time to pass my private member's bill No Freezing in the Dark. Will you agree today to pass it?

Hon Mr Baird: In the province of Ontario, with respect to natural gas, when the member opposite was in government, there were no changes brought about to that. However, I do recognize and acknowledge that the high electricity prices that some have faced have caused real concern to many in Ontario. With respect to social assistance recipients, there are vehicles at their disposal to be able to receive some emergency assistance. I understand that is being looked into. I know the utility in question, in this geographic area, would look at that issue, and I understand they are doing so.

I do commend the member opposite. He raised this issue last Thursday in the House. I spoke to my Premier on Tuesday and directed Hydro One not to cut people's electricity off in the fall. It was interesting, I say to the leader of the third party, to see the Leader of the Opposition becoming a Howard-come-lately to the issue just yesterday.

Mr Hampton: Minister, I'm going to send you the letter that this woman sent us, and I want you to have a look at it.

What is revealing is that yesterday the Premier stood up and tried to tell people that this wouldn't happen, that this couldn't happen. And this speaks to the larger issue: you and the Premier go around the province suggesting that all this is going to be fixed with a rebate and maybe a directive here, but the people of the province know that is not the case.

Yes, you need to pass my private member's bill so that between October 1 and May 1 no one will have their gas or hydro cut off. But you also need to go a step further and deal with the long-term problem. Cancel hydro deregulation and privatization because it only makes the situation worse. Will you do that?

Hon Mr Baird: The short answer to the question is no.

With respect to the other issue, having electricity cut off, I share the concern that the member opposite has brought to the House. A lot of folks across the province of Ontario are experiencing higher-than-anticipated electricity costs, and they're concerned about what the colder months will bring.

I'm from Ottawa in eastern Ontario, where we went through the ice storm, where we had literally hundreds of thousands of people in eastern Ontario without electricity. The reality is, there can be some incredibly serious consequences to that. The Premier has directed me to the local distribution company, with which we are the shareholder in the province of Ontario; that we don't think, given the circumstances of this year, it's responsible as a corporate citizen. I would expect that the interests of people come before the interests of profit and shareholders with respect to electricity, at this difficult time with rising electricity rates.

HYDRO RATES

Mr Dominic Agostino (Hamilton East): My question is to the Minister of Energy. I'm going to give you some examples of some of the impact that the Harris-Eves mismanagement of hydro has had on some of our public institutions.

The Toronto Transit Commission had to budget an additional $7.3 million because of a new contract they signed to deal with their hydro. The Toronto District School Board has to find an additional $2.5 million in their budget to deal with increased hydro. The Ottawa-Carleton District School Board has to find an additional $900,000 in their budget to deal with increased hydro costs. The Hamilton-Wentworth District School Board has to find an additional $700,000 to deal with their budget. Hamilton Health Sciences Corp has to find an additional $2.2 million. The list goes on and on.

Clearly, this is the result of the mismanagement of hydro. Will you today commit to reimburse the money for these institutions so they can balance their budgets and not have to make further cuts?

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, minister responsible for francophone affairs): Some in the province of Ontario entered into fixed-rate contracts and these institutions, of which the honourable member speaks, were on the spot market. Whether it's school boards or hospitals, by and large these are large financially sophisticated institutions. We could also speak of homes for those people with developmental disabilities and shelters for battered women. We could speak of other social service agencies that are perhaps in even greater need. I think it's important for those on spot market prices. When we look at relief with respect to the electricity bills people have received, we mustn't forget their needs and we mustn't forget that as we look forward to the future.

Mr Agostino: I understand what the minister's saying. The pain is to everyone in this province. You've spread the pain. Every institution is suffering. We know that. The reality is, you've got school boards that are facing deficits. This means more teacher layoffs, less classroom supplies, less textbooks. You've got hospitals facing deficits, which means less nurses, less MRIs, less surgeries. The reality, as a result of the incompetence of your government in dealing with this hydro file and this hydro situation, is that school boards and hospitals are already in deficit.

Understand, Minister, you've told them to balance their budgets. This is money they did not budget for. This money is beyond what they had budgeted. That means each one of these institutions we're talking about must now make further cuts. There's only one place it can come from—front-line services and programs, teachers, nurses, health care, surgeries, textbooks, computers. That is the reality.

I ask you again, will you commit today to reimburse and refund these public institutions the additional non-budgeted money they're forced to pay because of your government's mismanagement so they don't have to make further cuts to their programs?

Hon Mr Baird: We're certainly mindful in the review that we're going forward with of the needs of the public sector and the broader public sector with respect to electricity prices. We're very mindful of that.

INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM FUNDING

Mr John O'Toole (Durham): My question is to the Minister of Finance. I remain concerned about Ontario's investment in public infrastructure. In fact, we're hearing that our existing infrastructure will not be able to sustain existing population growth. For instance, in the riding of Durham, and in fact Durham region, population growth is in excess of 15%. I appreciate the investments under SuperBuild in such things as the library in Clarington, the second ice pad in Port Perry and the University of Ontario Institute of Technology, Ontario's newest university, as well as Lakeridge Health Bowmanville. There are challenges ahead and I wonder if you could address this in your response to me today.

Hon Janet Ecker (Minister of Finance): I'd like to thank the member for Durham for an excellent question. We recognize quite clearly that part of a strategy for growth, prosperity and economic growth in our province has to include investments in our public infrastructure, in our highways, roads, bridges, post-secondary institutions and so much more. That's why, through SuperBuild, the government agency that oversees and coordinates these investments, Ontario and our partners have invested more than $13 billion in 3,000 projects. By the end of the year 2004, Ontario and our partners will have invested $20 billion in capital improvements, the largest investment of its kind in the province's history and a very important support for economic prosperity.

Mr O'Toole: Thank you very much for your commitment to this very worthwhile investment in Ontario's future.

These investments aren't just for Durham, as you've outlined. But I represent the riding of Durham and I've heard from Clarington council of their concerns. That's why I'm addressing them today. Minister, I'm asking for your help with respect to specific projects within Durham because that's the area I represent, but I know you're making the same commitment for all of Ontario. I'm also concerned at the lack of federal presence in some of these projects.

Hon Mrs Ecker: Again, I'd like to thank the member from Durham because these strategic investments have impacted all the way across the province, not only Durham region, but I'm pleased as a member from Durham region to talk about the investments we have made there: for example, the $60-million investment in establishing the new University of Ontario Institute of Technology in Durham region that the Durham MPPs have worked so hard to do.

The Liberal finance critic loves to make fun of Highway 407, and yet if it wasn't for the partnership we put in place, we wouldn't have the 407 in the Durham region. The Liberals didn't care to do it. This government made it happen for consumers and commuters in our region. We also have money for the transit fleet renewal in Oshawa, Pickering and Ajax; money for the Don Beer arena in Pickering, for example; the restructuring of the Whitby hospital site from Lakebridge Health—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): The minister's time is up.

HYDRO RATES

Mr Steve Peters (Elgin-Middlesex-London): My question is for the Minister of Agriculture. I have in my hand a letter written by Hydro One Networks. In this letter it states, "We have been directed by the Ontario Energy Board to recover an additional $12.9M in low voltage costs from our retail customers using the distribution system." This letter says it's beginning October 1; in other words, another retroactive charge. "Customers will see an increase in their delivery charges...." Farms are going to be dinged for an addition $8.19 a month or another $100 a year. You're supposed to be the voice for agriculture in this province, and at the cabinet table. Where were you during these public hearings when the OEB allowed this to happen?

Hydro One is your company. The OEB is your watchdog. The announcement in the brochure states that the open market promises to deliver many new benefits. Madam Minister, I'd like to know what kind of new benefit this is you're putting on the backs of the farmers of this province. Why are you continuing to pick the pockets of farmers in Ontario?

Hon Helen Johns (Minister of Agriculture and Food): I refer this to the Minister of Energy.

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, minister responsible for francophone affairs): The Minister of Agriculture is an incredibly strong voice for farmers in this government. She got her bill through. Despite the fighting and the delay tactics of the Liberals, she finally got her bill through. Half of the Liberals had left the room when she did it. I am sure in ridings like Prince Edward county and Tweed and Napanee the area farmers are going to be asking questions about where those Liberal members were.

With respect to the question the member has asked, I believe the Ontario Energy Board can be more responsive to rural Ontario. That's why we're conducting an entire overhaul and review of the agency.

Mr Peters: I'm going back to the Minister of Agriculture, because her silence tells it all right now. What kind of voice is that for agriculture, when she passes and sloughs it off to the Minister of Energy?

Minister, you should know what's happening on the farms. Do you know what electricity bills are looking like for Ontario farms right now? Last week I brought to the attention of this House a number of farm bills and the difficulties farmers are facing. Bills on many farms have doubled in this province. We're not talking about hundreds of dollars; we're talking about thousands and thousands of dollars. You should know that farmers have been hit by two years of drought, and you turn your back on the farmers of Ontario right now. You know commodity prices are down and we're reeling from high electricity prices, and now you're zinging the farmers again when it comes to the distribution of hydro in this province.

Do you know what farmers are telling me, Minister? Your transition cheques, the transition cheques you're so proud of right now, are going right back into government coffers because they've received those transition cheques and they're out spending those transition cheques to pay their hydro bills. The $8 a month is an additional tax, on the backs of farmers. Minister, don't be silent. Why don't you stand up and stop this? Stand up and tell us why—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): I'm afraid the member's time is up. Minister of Energy.

Hon Mr Baird: The Minister of Agriculture visited my constituency this past August and she heard about the concerns that people in the rural part of Ottawa had with the redistribution of wards that Brendan McGuinty and Bob Chiarelli were ramming down their throats, and she certainly brought that concern to the minister of rural affairs. When this issue was brought up in the Ontario Legislature, the Liberal members on that side screamed that there were no rural areas in Ottawa. What there are not a lot of, in rural parts of Ottawa, are rural Liberals. That sort of attitude is why we won't see many in the future, in my judgment.

We're concerned about the rural ratepayers. Whenever I have spoken about working families and small businesses, I have made it a point in this place to underline the needs of farm operators in the—

TEACHERS' STRIKE

Mr Joseph N. Tascona (Barrie-Simcoe-Bradford): My question is for the Minister of Education. As you well know, the union took the secondary teachers in the Simcoe Muskoka district school board out on strike earlier this week, affecting 7,000 students and their families. I've heard from many of these families who are concerned that this strike will threaten the entire school year for many students. Can you tell me what actions will be taken to protect the school year and not jeopardize students' chances for success?

Hon Elizabeth Witmer (Deputy Premier, Minister of Education): I'd like to respond to the question from the member from Barrie-Simcoe-Bradford. I would agree that it is truly regrettable when there are disputes between school boards and their employees. I would certainly urge both sides to resolve the dispute as quickly as possible.

Having said that, I know that many of the teachers, of course having utmost regard and consideration for the students, prior to the strike assigned homework to students in order that they could continue with their studies at home. I would also like to say to the member that there is a body in place that is carefully monitoring the situation, and that is the Education Relations Commission, in order to ensure this strike does not jeopardize the school year for these students.

Mr Tascona: Many students and parents are anxious for a resolution because they don't want to see the school year lost. Can you please tell me how this government determines when it is necessary to take action to restore stability in the students' school year?

Hon Mrs Witmer: I really appreciate the concern that has been expressed for the students by the member from Barrie-Simcoe-Bradford. I would say that the following options are available: (1) parties can resume mediated talks; (2) parties can reach a joint agreement to voluntary binding arbitration; and (3) I talked about the Education Relations Commission, and they actually have a mandate to advise the Lieutenant Governor in Council when they think the school year is in jeopardy. When the Lieutenant Governor receives that advice, the government has generally received all-party consent for speedy back-to-work legislation. Traditionally, the ERC has offered advice around the three-week period, so I can tell the member that there is careful monitoring of the school year to make sure the students' year is not in jeopardy.

HYDRO RATES

Mr David Christopherson (Hamilton West): My question is for the Minister of Community, Family and Children's Services. On November 4, in answer to a question regarding individuals on the Ontario disability support program having to make a choice between paying their hydro bill and buying food, you said the following: "We have provisions in place to deal with extraordinary costs, including costs to keep electricity running."

I have 45 individuals on a list in my constituency office who are receiving ODSP and who are about to have their hydro cut off. What I would like to know is, since the front-line workers, in Hamilton at least, haven't heard about your new program, I'd like you to stand in your place and read out the phone number that people on the disability program are supposed to call so their hydro doesn't get cut off. What's that phone number, Minister?

Hon Brenda Elliott (Minister of Community, Family and Children's Services): That question is to be answered by the Minister of Energy.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Minister of Energy.

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, minister responsible for francophone affairs): For those on fixed incomes with disabilities, the concerns they have around the hydro bill that's on their kitchen table are legitimate concerns. Their fear and concern for the future is something we're looking at.

Mr Christopherson: Brenda said they'd take care of it. Who do they call?

Hon Mr Baird: If the member opposite would like to listen to the answer, he might hear something.

The member opposite said they're facing cut-off. It is a cold month. We have frigid temperatures in November. I'll tell you that this government, with the concerns about electricity, where we're the shareholder—I have directed at the Premier's direction that our firm, Hydro One, is not to make disconnections during this cold weather. If the member opposite is looking for a phone number where people can call, they should phone the shareholder at the city of Hamilton and say that they should do the corporately responsible thing: put people before profits and before shareholder interests.

The Speaker: Supplementary?

Mr Tony Martin (Sault Ste Marie): This question was obviously for the Minister of Community, Family and Children's Services. She should stop hiding. She was the one who made the comment originally. We're urging all 192,000 people on ODSP in this province to phone your Queen's Park office, Minister. Let me give that number. It's 416-325-5225. We want them to know about your offer to pay their sky-high deregulated hydro bills and ensure that none of them get cut off. That number again is 416-325-5225.

People living on ODSP are already living below the poverty level. They certainly can't cover any new expenses. Will you confirm today that you will cover the full cost of your higher hydro bills, increased for 192,000 people receiving ODSP? Then will you ditch deregulation for a non-profit electricity system that doesn't rip people off? While you're at it, will you raise ODSP rates to a livable level?

Hon Mr Baird: The member opposite's leader, some three weeks ago, asked me if I would support his private member's bill on this issue. It took his leader two weeks to get it to me. I hope he would allow me at least one week to respond to that. If it took him two weeks to write it, give me at least a week to consider it, do our homework and be able to respond.

We share the concerns of those on fixed incomes, particularly those with disabilities on the Ontario disability support program. Certainly that is high on our list of concerns and in our discussions with respect to the electricity issue and rate relief. But this government can be very proud of the work we've done for disabilities. We have an unprecedented increase in the budget for people with developmental disabilities, with which this minister, Brenda Elliott, has continued to follow through, building on the successes that I and Janet Ecker had. That's in addition to new programs for autism, increases in a range of services and supports—

The Speaker: I'm afraid the minister's time is up.

LONG-TERM CARE

Mr John Gerretsen (Kingston and the Islands): My question is to the Minister of Health and Long-Term Care. Your government has a consistent record of refusing to fund even minimum levels of care for our most vulnerable seniors. You rationed home care by establishing hours of service that an individual could receive, even though their needs may be much greater than that. In homes for the aged and nursing homes, you withdrew regulations providing a minimum number of hours of nursing care, and you even withdrew the regulation providing for a minimum of one bath per week.

This morning in the House, by a majority vote supported by some of your government backbenchers, the following motion was passed: "That ... the government should immediately establish minimum standards of care for nursing homes and homes for the aged, including the re-introduction of minimum hours of nursing care and the requirement for a minimum of at least one bath a week." That's the democratic will of the 103 people who are elected. When are you going to live up to that democratic will and the resolution that was passed here this morning? When are you going to put these minimum standards in effect so that our seniors who live in homes can live out their remaining days in dignity and self-respect?

Hon Tony Clement (Minister of Health and Long-Term Care): I refer the question to the associate minister.

Hon Dan Newman (Associate Minister of Health and Long-Term Care): The resolution today wasn't whether long-term care is a priority for this government, because long-term care is indeed a priority for this government. We've demonstrated that. It wasn't a resolution on whether members as private members care passionately about long-term care, because all members of this Legislative Assembly care about long-term care and about the 61,000 residents in the long-term-care facilities in this province.

Members voted today as private members during private members' hour on a resolution brought forward by the Liberal Party. Today's vote was a resolution by the Dalton McGuinty Liberals to turn the clock back on the residents of Ontario's long-term-care facilities. The new regulations that have been brought forward by the Ernie Eves government require that each and every resident in Ontario's long-term-care facilities be assessed with a personal care plan to meet their differing nursing and personal care needs across the province. The resolution today would turn the clock back on those 61,000 people.

Mr Gerretsen: Let me say, it's passing strange that the Minister of Health and Long-Term Care, who in estimates stated that he was the minister and it was his budget and he was going to be solely responsible for answering the questions, wouldn't answer the question just now.

You well know that the study you funded which came out last year, the PricewaterhouseCoopers study of 10 jurisdictions similar to Ontario in Europe, Canada and the United States, clearly shows that we in Ontario, as a government, spend less money on nursing care, personal care and therapy care than any other jurisdiction. Whereas we should be leading the parade, we're at the back of the parade. That's no way to treat our seniors.

Today, a private member's resolution was brought forward, not by the Liberal Party but by the member from Thunder Bay-Atikokan. The will of this House is: re-establish minimum standards of care for our seniors. That's the elected will of this House as expressed by this resolution. When are you going to implement the will of the House, and that is to re-establish the minimum standards so that there can be some guarantees—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): The member's time is up.

Hon Mr Newman: The resolution that was brought forward today talked about municipal homes for the aged and it talked about nursing homes. They forgot the 9,015 who live in charitable homes in this province. They left over 9,000 people out of the resolution.

Let's hear what Karen Sullivan, the executive director of the Ontario Long Term Care Association, has to say about this. She says in her letter to me today:

"I am writing to express our concern over the motion passed in the Legislature this morning calling for minimum standards of care in long-term-care homes.

"In Ontario today we have over 60,000 residents seeking care in over 500 long-term-care homes. Each resident has a different level of need and the combination of needs is different in each home. The current funding system attempts to match resources to an actual measurement of those resident care needs. Adopting a minimum standards approach would remove measured resident need as the basis for care funding and move us even further away from the reality of a resident-focused system.”

HEALTHY LIVING

Mr Raminder Gill (Bramalea-Gore-Malton-Springdale): My question is also to the Minister of Health and Long-Term Care. Minister, in my great riding of Bramalea-Gore-Malton-Springdale, and all across Ontario, the number one concern I hear from residents is the future of health care. My constituents, like all Ontarians, want the best health care system in the world. I know that the Ernie Eves government is meeting their demands and I'm proud of the government's record on health care. Not only do my great constituents want to know what we are doing at Queen's Park, but they also are interested in finding out how they can help the health care system.

There's an old saying that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. I think the best way in which we will assist our health care system is by living a healthy lifestyle. Minister, please tell this House what our government is doing to assist all Ontarians in living a healthy lifestyle that will benefit not only the health care system but, more important to my constituents, themselves.

Hon Tony Clement (Minister of Health and Long-Term Care): I would like to thank the honourable member for Bramalea-Gore-Malton-Springdale and take the occasion to advise the House on another component of the Ernie Eves government's plan for wellness, officially launched last week: HealthyOntario.com. HealthyOntario.com is a consumer health Web portal that provides easy, one-stop access to information on hundreds of health conditions, hundreds of drugs, hundreds of services. It is our government's goal that HealthyOntario.com be the first choice Web site for Ontarians, where they can go for information to find trusted health information and services and for advice for healthier living.

You should know that Ontarians rely on the Internet as their source of choice for health information after their doctor. Ontarians from across our province have told us they want their government to place more emphasis on giving them the tools they need to stay healthy. Through the introduction of HealthyOntario.com, we are meeting that challenge.

Mr Gill: Thank you, Minister, for your response. As you may be aware, my wife works in the health care field. One of the things she is always promoting is a healthy lifestyle. I know she is in favour of any tools that will help her practice, help her patients live better and longer. I'm sure she'll be delighted with this latest initiative from the Ernie Eves government.

Minister, we politicians, as well as members of the press gallery, are sometimes guilty of being too busy to exercise and eat properly. I was wondering if HealthyOntario.com contains information on how we can address this problem. Also, could the Minister of Health shed more light on what more one can find on HealthyOntario.com?

Hon Mr Clement: Let me start by saying that HealthyOntario.com is not a difficult site on which to find information. You don't have to be Web-savvy. We've made it easy to find the information one is searching for by providing a search engine and an alphabetical listing of all topics. I would like to inform this House that certainly there are sections on healthy diets and exercise programs.

What else can they find on HealthyOntario.com? They can find listings for hospitals and doctors in their area. They can find information about diseases, viruses and symptoms. They can find information about how to quit smoking, which would benefit certain members of this House, and the benefits that result from butting out.

On October 29, the day we launched HealthyOntario.com, there were over 90,000 hits on the site that day alone. So I urge everyone within listening distance of me to check out HealthyOntario.com. It is fun, it is informative, and it will promote healthy living and make health care work for you—HealthyOntario.com.

DÉRÈGLEMENTATION DE L'ÉLECTRICITÉ

Mr Jean-Marc Lalonde (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): My question is for the Minister of Energy. This past week I heard from some of the nursing homes in my riding. They tell me they will not be able to pay their bills if your government continues to sit by and do nothing on this hydro fiasco.

The last hydro bill of the St Joseph Nursing Home in Rockland showed an increase of over $3,000. The September bill of the Centre Roger-Séguin in Clarence showed an increase of $3,500. And listen to this one: the July hydro bill for Maxville Manor was $8,700, and their September bill was over $15,200, an increase of over $6,500.

Minister, these nursing homes cannot afford these increases. Our seniors need your help. I ask you to ensure that our seniors do not freeze this winter. Will these nursing homes have to start dipping into the daily $4.49 food allowance of their residents to pay for your government's hydro fiasco? Tell me, Minister, will your answer to our seniors be, “Heat or eat? Le chauffage ou les trois repas?”

L'hon John R. Baird (ministre des Services sociaux et communautaires, ministre délégué aux Affaires francophones) : Je suis très conscient des besoins de la communauté, des agences et des personnes qui donnent les services aux personnes âgées dans notre province.

J'espère que le député de Glengarry-Prescott-Russell parlera du travail que le gouvernement est en train de faire et les réponses que nous sommes en train de donner au peuple de l'Ontario. J'espère qu'il parlera de la rebate qui était mise en place pour aider les groupes dont il parle. J'espère qu'il parlera de la priorité que le premier ministre, Ernie Eves, et moi donnons à cette politique très importante.

Mr Lalonde: Minister, that is not enough.

Here are a few more hydro problems. The July bill of Marché St Albert was $482. They just received their October bill, which you promised would be lower, and it was $1,381. M. Malouf in Rockland has a small pizzeria. His July bill was $939, and his September bill was $1,873. These two small businesses, along with many others, are threatening to close because of your government's hydro fiasco.

Here are other cases. Many of those who are on a fixed payment plan have just received their final bill. M^{me} Longtin of St Isidore, an 85-year-old lady, was crying on the phone. Her budget payment was $106 per month and her final bill was $513, an increase of $372. A single lady bought a house last year in Bourget and kept the same fixed payment as the previous family of six. Guess what, Minister? Her final bill this year was $1,074.

Minister, your government created this mess and every day you promise to fix it. I ask you, when can they expect the good news? Tell me today what you plan to do for them and when they can expect this hydro fiasco—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Minister.

L'hon M. Baird: Aussitôt que possible.

EARLY YEARS CHALLENGE FUND

Mr Wayne Wettlaufer (Kitchener Centre): I feel like I should be asking this question of the Minister of Energy, but I'm really asking it of the Minister of Community, Family and Children's Services. Minister, as you're aware, I have a large immigrant population in my riding. We receive probably the third-largest number, in terms of actual numbers, of immigrants from around the world, behind only Vancouver and Toronto. Many of these immigrants are young. Many of them have young families, young children. As a government, we announced the Early Years challenge fund several years back. You were going to make another announcement yesterday or the day before, and I'm not sure if you did or not.

Interjections.

Mr Wettlaufer: I was a little busy. I didn't get to hear it.

Anyway, Minister, I'd like to know, for the benefit of these young families in my riding, what we can do to help them apply for the projects. What do they need?

Hon Brenda Elliott (Minister of Community, Family and Children's Services): I thank my colleague from Kitchener Centre for the question. I know that children's interests are very much his interests.

Yes, indeed, we did go out the door and announce the second round of the challenge fund, which is a program that supports community efforts to do more for children and families in Ontario. This is one of the programs that came from the Early Years Study. It's an opportunity to do more programs that come directly from the community's needs. Our vision is that communities are able to provide care for children in special programs that are unique. This is the second round of proposals, as I said.

For organizations that wish to apply, we would encourage them to contact their local community, family and children's services regional office. They will get the details there. If they wish, they may visit the ministry Web site at www.gov.on.ca/CSS. There's an application form there. We would invite all those interested to apply.

Mr Wettlaufer: Minister, the families are going to want to apply for some money to help the local children. A number of the organizations will be there to do so. I know there have been some organizations in my riding that have already received something. I know that success breeds success. My riding is often touted as one to be proud of because we have been very self-sufficient, but nevertheless there are those who need help.

I would like to be able to share some information with those organizations that need help, who will be able to look to those organizations that have been successful in receiving funding. Could you give us a list of those that have received funding and been successful so that I could share that with the other organizations that are making applications?

Hon Mrs Elliott: The success of this particular program has been that it's been a combination of efforts, of organizations, governments and local businesses working together. The deadline for application is January 15.

To my colleague from Kitchener Centre, he might like to know that there are some very successful projects underway. For instance, the Catholic Family Counselling Centre is developing a program to increase children's success in school and help them integrate with their peers, particularly in a multicultural community. The House of Friendship of Kitchener operates a community centre that provides parenting programs with an outreach component for low-income families and new Canadians. Lutherwood Community Opportunities Development Association supports families with a home visiting program. The Centre for Research and Education in Human Services creates a system of data interpretation from the Early Years projects across Ontario, which gives us information about particular areas of interest that we as a government need to turn our attention to.

HYDRO RATES

Ms Shelley Martel (Nickel Belt): I have a question to the Minister of Energy. This spring the NDP warned you that private, for-profit power was going to drive up electricity rates, and the former energy minister called that a fantasy. I want to give you some examples of what's happening in my riding.

Benoit St Amour of Val Therese paid $75.05 for hydro last year in October. His bill this October is $408.13, a 543% increase.

Bill Henderson of Levack has seen his September bill rise 36.3% in comparison to his September bill last year.

He says, "Think of the impact this will have on home power costs, the education and the health sectors, not to mention our business community and the subsequent stress on the economy and job stability."

Cindy Bond of Capreol has seen her family's September hydro bill rise 62% in comparison to last September's bill.

High hydro bills are not a fantasy for these families. Admit your mistake. When are you going to cancel hydro deregulation and privatization?

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, minister responsible for francophone affairs): We're concerned about the reality that many people face right across the province with respect to their concern about their current hydro bill and the outlook for the future. The Premier has asked me to look into it, and we'll be reporting back in short order.

The member opposite is a charter member of the hydro hotheads club. I have here the hydro hotheads card. It says they support reliable and affordable public power at cost. We haven't seen public power at cost in decades in Ontario. What we've seen is public power at cost plus $38 billion. Now, I know $38 billion isn't a lot to the member opposite and her band of socialist friends. When they were in government, they increased debt more than that in five years.

I say to the member opposite that there is no social justice to that family in her constituency by borrowing $3,000 for every child in Ontario or $10,000 for every—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Order. I'm afraid the minister's time is up. Supplementary.

Mr Peter Kormos (Niagara Centre): I say to the minister, you're darned right you've never seen public power at the cost you're charging for your private, deregulated hydroelectricity here in Ontario. Howard Hampton warned you about deregulation and privatization, and he's telling you now that your rebate program ain't going to cut it. You'd have to send out rebate cheques once a month to even make a dent in the huge new costs.

Clova Corbin, a single mom up in Richmond Hill: her electricity costs have more than tripled, from 100 bucks to 320 bucks. Mary Ward, a mom with two kids on a fixed income: her rate has nearly doubled, from 140 bucks to $278.

Minister, save us all from your privatization-deregulation misery. Don't just rebate, don't just cap; cancel. Cancel your for-profit, deregulated hydro scheme and adopt the NDP plan for non-profit, public power today—www.publicpower.ca. Will you do that?

Hon Mr Baird: In a very real sense, I want to underline the concern that Premier Ernie Eves has, that I have, and that our entire cabinet and caucus have with respect to the high hydro rates people in Ontario are facing. The Premier has asked me to report back in short order, and I've certainly committed to do that.

The member opposite is another charter member of the hydro hotheads club. Some would say he's the hottest of them all. I wasn't sure what a hothead was, so I got out a few dictionaries. The first dictionary I checked said it's "a quick-tempered or impetuous person." The next one said, "a violent person; a hasty or impetuous person," as in "the rant of a hothead." The next one said that a hothead is "a belligerent grouch." But the last one was "a reckless, impetuous, irresponsible person." The member opposite is in the right club.

AMBULANCE SERVICES

Mr James J. Bradley (St Catharines): I have a question for the Minister of Health. Today ambulance dispatchers came to Queen's Park from all over the province of Ontario. They're describing a very serious problem that confronts all of Ontario, and I can be specific and say the Hamilton-Brantford-Simcoe-Niagara region, and that is the problem with ambulance dispatch service. The problem that has been identified by an independent outside agency is, first of all, that you have a large turnover of staff due to the fact that they are very much underpaid and that there's so much stress because there are too few staff; second, that the equipment they use is antiquated, outdated and not appropriate for use at the dispatch centre; and the third is that the training provided by the Ministry of Health is inadequate. Minister, will you now assure this House that you will act on all recommendations of that particular independent agency and that you will solve all the problems associated with this problem?

Hon Tony Clement (Minister of Health and Long-Term Care): I'd be happy to inform this House once again that on August 20, 2002, this government announced $32.5 million toward enhancing emergency health services; $29.2 million of that would help maintain and improve ambulance response times and $3.3 million was going toward enhancing ambulance dispatch centres. This means 66 new dispatch positions across the province, more rapid and efficient responses to ambulance requests and much-needed renovations of ambulance dispatch centres. That'll be implemented over the fall and winter so the honourable member can keep tabs on that situation.

I can tell you that we are also scheduling some major operational and technological improvements for all CACCs, and this plan of action had the following quote from the Niagara region public safety officer: "It's good that they're putting money and trying to fix dispatch problems"—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): I'm afraid the minister's time is up. Supplementary?

Mr Bradley: All the assurances that you are giving are not stopping the fact that there are people who are actually dying because the dispatch is not appropriate for people who are trying to get the services of ambulances. This is not the fault of the dispatchers, because the dispatchers are in a situation where they're very much overworked. Sometimes there's one person on when there are supposed to be four persons on. They're using, as we say, the most antiquated equipment, which is not satisfactory in that office.

In the regional municipality of Niagara, they are so desperate that they have said they're prepared to take over the service, as Toronto has taken over the ambulance service, and they're prepared to operate it if you will provide the funding. Will you now acquiesce to the requests of the people of Niagara that this service be repatriated to Niagara, given to the regional municipality of Niagara, along with the necessary funding to make it a service that will ensure that there are no more people dying because ambulances are not getting to them on time, and are not having their health deteriorate for the same reason?

Hon Mr Clement: I respectfully take issue with the honourable member when he states in his comments that deaths can be attributed to this situation. That is a serious allegation and, as he knows, there are coroners who would be in a better position to decide that issue rather than he or I in the House.

I can tell you specifically with regard to the Niagara and Hamilton CACC that, in the meantime, as we wait for the regional government to put together their best suggestions to us, all open positions have been filled at the Niagara and Hamilton CACC, a communications training officer and technical officer has been added to the dispatch centre, we've developed a more effective training and quality assurance program, and the Niagara emergency medical staff are training new CACC employees for familiarization with Niagara region. That, combined with the recent negotiated settlement with OPSEU employees, which provides for a substantial wage increase for these dispatchers, I think is a plan well worth celebrating.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): We could begin petitions, if I could quickly give a ruling.

Yesterday, the Member for Mississauga Centre introduced Bill 207, An Act to amend the Retail Sales Tax Act to provide an exemption from tax for amateur youth sports.

After the bill received first reading, the House leader for the official opposition, the member for Windsor-St Clair, rose on a point of order to question the orderliness of the bill with respect to standing order 56, which states, "Any bill, resolution, motion or address, the passage of which would impose a tax or specifically direct the allocation of public funds, shall not be passed by the House unless recommended by a message from the Lieutenant Governor, and shall be proposed only by a minister of the Crown."

I undertook to review the bill and have since done so.

The simple purpose of the bill is to provide for an alleviation of the provincial sales tax that would normally be payable upon the purchase of a specified class of tangible personal property. This is conceptually similar to the tax credit proposed by the member for Etobicoke

North—then Etobicoke-Rexdale—in his Bill 24 of the second session of the 36th Parliament, which Speaker Stockwell ruled on in 1998.

In that instance, it was found that, although the proposal, if passed, would impose a burden on the consolidated revenue fund, this would only occur indirectly. I find the same in the current case and therefore find Bill 207 to be in order.

PETITIONS

LONG-TERM CARE

Mr John Gerretsen (Kingston and the Islands):

This is a petition that has been signed by people from Port Colborne, Fergus, Orangeville, St Marys, Sarnia, Petrolia, London, King City, Forest and Newmarket. It deals with the long-term-care situation. It's addressed to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario.

"Whereas the Eves government has increased the fees paid by seniors, the most vulnerable living in long-term-care" facilities "by 15% over three years, or $3.02 per diem in the first year and $2 in the second year and $2 in the third year effective September 1, 2002; and

"Whereas this increase will cost seniors and our most vulnerable more than $200 a month after three years; and

"Whereas this increase is above the rent increase guidelines for tenants in the province of Ontario for 2002; and

"Whereas, according to the government's own funded study, Ontario will still rank last amongst comparable jurisdictions in the amount of time provided to a resident for nursing and personal care; and

"Whereas the long-term-care funding partnership has been based on government accepting the responsibility to fund the care and services that residents need; and

"Whereas the government needs to increase long-term-care operating funding by $750 million over the next three years to raise the level of service for Ontario's long-term-care residents to those in Saskatchewan in 1999; and

"Whereas this province has been built by seniors who should be able to live out their lives with dignity, respect and in comfort in this province;

"We, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario as follows:

"Demand that Premier Eves reduce the 15% increase over three years in accommodation costs to no more than the cost-of-living increase annually and that the provincial government provide adequate funding for nursing and personal care to a level that is at least at the average standard for nursing and personal care in those 10 jurisdictions included in the government's own study."

I agree with the petition, have signed it accordingly and hand it to Matthew.

CUSTODIAL CARE

Mr Peter Kormos (Niagara Centre): The petition is to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario. I'm pleased that the minister is here to hear it directly.

"The regional council of Niagara have presented to the social services minister the following recommended changes to the legislation:

"(1) That the province of Ontario amend the Child and Family Services Act to recognize custodial care by extended family members as a legitimate intervention and that the related funding to support these care arrangements be made available;

"(2) That the temporary care allowance rate pursuant to the Ontario Works Act be altered to reflect established rates for similar care by foster parents;

"(3) That the regional municipality of Niagara along with the Niagara Family and Children's Services train their respective staff on the program options available to extended family members wishing to care for children;

"(4) That the region of Niagara along with Family and Children's Services advocate for the recommended changes with the Ministry of Community and Social Services as well as relevant associations, such as the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies;

"(5) That other consolidated municipal services managers be informed of this issue through circulation of this committee report;

"(6) That the province of Ontario be encouraged to consider a legislative change to permit open adoptions;

"(7) That the regional chair correspond with the Minister of Community and Social Services to advise the minister of these recommendations;

"We, the undersigned support these recommended changes to the legislation."

I've affixed my signature as well, and page Kalaneet Malik will deliver this to the Clerk's table.

HYDRO RATES

Mr Cameron Jackson (Burlington): I'd like to present a petition to the Parliament of Ontario which reads as follows:

"Whereas the province has stated its commitment to ensuring affordable hydro rates for the citizens of Ontario;

"Whereas the province's recent move to deregulate hydro rates and place them within the competitive context of the open market has resulted in significant increases in hydro rates, including retroactive ones, for Ontarians;

"Whereas some local utilities are projecting future costs and pegging it for consumers, resulting in unnecessarily high hydro rates;

"Whereas these hydro rate increases, above and beyond what citizens have paid before deregulation, present a great burden to many young families, seniors and those on fixed incomes;

"Whereas the province still owns Ontario Power Generation that produces most of electricity and it has stated that a review of hydro rates and its regulating agency, the Ontario Energy Board, is necessary;

"We, the undersigned, petition the Parliament of Ontario as follows:

"That the province be directed to immediately freeze hydro rates to last year's levels immediately during its current review of the Ontario Energy Board's mandate, that the province work with the federal government to eliminate the GST on Hydro One's debt retirement charges, and that the province ensure stronger consumer protection for all citizens of Ontario against such hydro rate increases."

It has my signature attached to it, and I'm very pleased to ask Hon-Hey, our page, to deliver it to the Clerk's desk.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): I'm afraid that, pursuant to standing order 30(b), I'm now required to call orders of the day, it being 4 o'clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

KEEPING THE PROMISE
FOR A STRONG ECONOMY ACT
(BUDGET MEASURES), 2002LOI DE 2002 SUR LE RESPECT
DE L'ENGAGEMENT D'ASSURER
UNE ÉCONOMIE SAINTE
(MESURES BUDGÉTAIRES)

Hon Mrs Ecker moved second reading of the following bill:

Bill 198, An Act to implement Budget measures and other initiatives of the Government / Projet de loi 198, Loi mettant en oeuvre certaines mesures budgétaires et d'autres initiatives du gouvernement.

Hon Janet Ecker (Minister of Finance): I'll be sharing my time with the member for Simcoe North and the member for Nipissing.

I'd like to outline for the members of the House some of the key measures in Bill 198, the Keeping the Promise for a Strong Economy Act. If passed, this bill will put into place a number of key commitments that were made in our 2002 budget in June, commitments that will support this government's agenda for continued growth and prosperity. These commitments include measures to improve investor confidence; to protect consumers in the auto insurance field; to reduce red tape; to support the province's cities, towns and rural areas; and to improve the effectiveness of many other statutes. In short, the measures in this bill are designed collectively to continue to meet our goals and agenda for continued growth and prosperity.

I'd like to start with the investor confidence piece that's in the legislation, because as we said in the budget in June, this government is committed to keeping our securities laws, the laws that govern people's investments, up to date and accurate so that our capital markets can remain competitive and strong. We understand that strong capital markets are very much part of a strong economy. People in Ontario have seen the fallout from the accounting scandals in the United States and that has caused them to have concerns about what may be happening in Canadian markets. That's why, on the one hand, while we have very good, strong markets in this country, we also recognize that simply patting ourselves on the back because Enron hasn't happened here doesn't mean we can be complacent. It doesn't mean we cannot respond to the expert advice and opinions we've been given in this field.

That's why we're going forward with what we believe is a balanced, made-in-Ontario package, if you will, one that reflects the situations here in this province, what our business community is like. We think this package of reforms in this legislation will actually support investor confidence in our markets.

Part of the advice we received that formed this legislation was from the five-year review committee, very ably chaired by Mr Purdy Crawford, I might say, the first comprehensive review of the Ontario Securities Act. We received many constructive recommendations to improve the regulatory framework. Much of what is in there has shaped what is in this legislation, as well as other consultations.

If passed, the bill will institute tougher penalties for securities infractions and set higher standards for public companies in order to protect public confidence and to maintain the competitiveness of our markets. We're raising maximum court fines, for example, from $1 million to $5 million. We're increasing prison terms for those guilty of fraudulent practice in our markets, from two years to five years less a day, for these kinds of infractions. We're also allowing profits that may have been gained through this kind of behaviour to be returned to investors.

Other amendments in the legislation will include a consistent increase in fines for illegal insider trading. The Ontario Securities Commission will have the ability to set rules for audit committees for their functions and responsibilities so we can have strong, independent, accountable audit committees in our businesses. The legislation will expressly prohibit market manipulation, making misleading or untrue statements, to be clear that these activities are not tolerated in this province.

The Ontario Securities Commission will be able to review the information that public companies provide to investors. That authority is clearly laid out in the legislation. It will give investors the ability to sue, expand their right to sue if they have been the victim of fraudulent activities, misrepresentation.

This legislation, if passed by the House, will provide the securities commission with rule-making power to require that CEOs and CFOs can be accountable for certifying the financial statements of their companies.

I'd like to say, because I know there has been some potential misunderstanding about the securities commission's authority in terms of rule-making, that one of things I think is important is that the rule-making process, first of all, allow a very detailed and nuanced approach that can be taken to dealing with these issues, which I think is appropriate in this area. Sometimes legislation can be a bit of a blunt instrument in dealing with complex issues. It also requires the securities commission to consult, to go out to the sector, to investors, to dealers, to consumers, to all of the different groups that represent our securities sector, to consult with them about what makes the most sense. At the end of the day—

Mr John Gerretsen (Kingston and the Islands): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I know that the minister is presenting a very important bill with which we may not all agree, but surely to goodness there ought to be a quorum present of at least government members to listen to the finance minister of this province.

The Acting Speaker (Mr David Christopherson): Would the clerks' table please check for a quorum.

Clerk Assistant (Ms Deborah Deller): Quorum is not present, Speaker.

The Acting Speaker ordered the bells rung.

Clerk Assistant: Quorum is now present, Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: The Minister of Finance may continue.

Hon Mrs Ecker: I'd like to complete the thought that the Ontario Securities Commission, as I said earlier, must consult in making rules, which I think is a very, very good process to go through. It then comes to the government. The government has the opportunity to approve this, to say that this is the appropriate set of rules, and if we have some concerns, they can be addressed. So I think that provides a good check and balance in the system.

We also understand, I think, that rules that need to be put in place in Ontario must be sensitive to the needs of the capital markets as we find them in our country and our province, and recognize that for Ontario most of our businesses are small and medium-sized businesses. That means that rules should well differ from what might occur, for example, in the United States.

That touches on some of the highlights of the investor confidence piece, which we think is very, very important for people who are concerned about their retirement savings, who want to make sure that they have the right information to make good investment decisions and that those investments are well regulated.

There is another area of consumer protection that this legislation proposes to deal with, and that, as I mentioned earlier today and as we talked about in the June budget, deals with the pressures on auto insurance premiums. Because of rising health care costs, higher insurance claims, higher vehicle repair costs and reduced investment income, we're seeing some serious pressure in the auto insurance premium area, not only in Ontario but, quite frankly, around the world. The budget indicated our intention to introduce reforms that would help deal with this.

The proposed changes are based on the consultations that occurred in the last several months. I asked a committee of our caucus—Ted Chudleigh, who's the MPP for Halton and my parliamentary assistant, a very good man. My colleague mentioned is here off to my left; not often is he to my left. Also, he was joined by another very able colleague of mine, Rob Sampson from Mississauga Centre, and Wayne Wettlaufer from Kitchener Centre. All three of these individuals have a great deal of experience and expertise and have worked quite diligently with the auto insurance sector over the last several months.

What has been quite interesting is that in their work there has been an incredible—I would say consensus. Not everybody agreed on every point, but it was an incredible working relationship for all the groups, whether we were talking about lawyers, health care providers, consumers or insurance representatives, to try to come up with a package of changes that would work to the benefit of consumers and a strong, competitive auto insurance industry. So based on the recommendations that have come forward, this legislation reflects those.

Some of the highlights: we would expand the rights of seriously injured accident victims who are not at fault, particularly children, to sue at-fault drivers for health care expenses in excess of no-fault insurance benefits. The legislation would provide for a framework of treatment guidelines that would help, especially for those individuals who might have less serious injuries, to make sure that they can have earlier access to proper medical and rehabilitation care without getting caught in endless disputes around assessments or other disputes that may occur. The legislation proposes to institute regulations that would govern the conduct of paid representatives in the dispute resolution system, because we have had feedback and input that there have been some difficulties in this area. This legislation proposes to deal with that.

It would expand the disclosure requirements for insurance agents so that consumers will have a clearer idea about which companies insurance agents represent, sometimes a very important piece of information for a consumer. It helps to ensure that uninsured vehicles can get off the road more effectively, that we can prevent that from occurring, by requiring insurers to provide information on insurance status to the Ministry of Transportation.

We think these reforms will strengthen the auto insurance system in Ontario and benefit the consumers who depend on it. We look forward to continuing to work with all of the representatives in this sector, not only on implementing the legislation, should the will of this House be that it pass, but also to work on some of the regulations that would be required under this legislation. We hope that in that spirit of working together we can continue to resolve these issues in a very speedy fashion. I would like to thank my three colleagues—Rob, Wayne and Ted—who have spent so much time on this. It has been very helpful for this government. They have indeed done a superb job. I hope their constituents recognize that.

The other issue that we talk about in this legislation addresses the issue, of course, of some aspects of pension reform. There are many, many issues in pension reform that I know from employees' perspectives and from employers' perspectives need to be addressed. This piece of legislation just deals with one particular aspect of that. The government felt, after the consultations that we held on this—for example, we had had a consultation paper that went out last summer. We talked about the need to move forward on this in the year 2000. There was a consultation paper out last year. There was work done and submissions based on that had occurred among, again, employers and employees. All representatives had presented to the ministry their recommendations about how to deal with this—

Mr Peter Kormos (Niagara Centre): Point of order.

The Acting Speaker: Would the minister please take her seat.

Mr Kormos: I don't believe there's a quorum, sir.

The Acting Speaker: I'll have the clerks check for a quorum.

Clerk at the Table (Mr Todd Decker): A quorum is not present, Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Call in the members. This will be up to a five-minute bell.

The Acting Speaker ordered the bells rung.

Clerk at the Table: A quorum is now present, Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: The Minister of Finance may continue.

Hon Mrs Ecker: To finish my comments, I'd just like to say that on the pension issue we're moving to protect the pension benefits of all current and former employees by protecting the long-term viability of pension plans and their surpluses. I think it's important to stress that nothing in this legislation affects the earned benefits of pension plan members or retirees, and the purpose of the legislation is to provide more flexibility in how employees, employers and plan members negotiate surplus-sharing agreements, which had been severely restricted by recent court cases. That is one of the reasons we're moving forward on this.

There are many, many other items in this legislation giving municipalities the opportunity to invest in their infrastructure through opportunity bonds and low-cost bonds, and giving those municipalities that have been struggling to get investment, new jobs and new businesses in their community the opportunity and some assistance through tax-free incentive zones. That is also in this legislation. Continuing to move forward with our plan to have reduced and more competitive taxes in Ontario is also included in this legislation.

We believe it is something that is important for this province to move forward on our agenda of growth and prosperity, and we certainly hope the members of this House would see fit to pass this legislation. I know that in the ensuing debate my caucus colleagues will go on at great length about some of the other issues that are in this legislation.

The Acting Speaker: I see the member from Simcoe North standing. I gather you're going to continue the leadoff speech for the government. Is that your intent?

Mr Garfield Dunlop (Simcoe North): Yes, Mr Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Very well. You now have the floor.

Mr Dunlop: It's an honour for me to rise today to take part in the debate on Bill 198, the Keeping the Promise for a Strong Economy Act (Budget Measures), 2002. I'd like to congratulate our honourable Minister of Finance for bringing forth this piece of legislation and as well for her hard work as an MPP in our caucus. I've had the privilege in the past of sitting as Minister Ecker's parliamentary assistant, and it's certainly one of the highlights of my political career to be able to work with Minister Ecker. When the opportunity came for Minister Ecker to become the Minister of Finance and to have the option of delivering the fourth consecutive balanced budget in a row for the province of Ontario, I was very, very happy for her; and of course she has done that.

As you know, this important piece of legislation that we're bringing forth today would implement a number of commitments announced by our government in the 2002 budget. I'd like to go back for a few moments and talk a little bit about our budget for 2002.

As I said earlier, as a new member of this House, I've been fortunate because every year I've been here, when a budget was brought forward, it's been a balanced budget. Our budget this year is the fourth one in a row and we are extremely pleased. I see my friend Mr Gill nodding his head here. It's something we are very concerned about. As Progressive Conservatives, we know the importance of balanced budgets. We know the importance of job creation. With investor confidence at an all-time low in many political jurisdictions around the world, we know how important it is for governments of all political stripes, no matter where they are, to try their best to actually deliver balanced budgets.

I'd like to speak a little bit on some of the highlights of the budget and then go into a little bit about the reforms under Bill 198 that deal with Ontario's auto insurance system. First of all, going back to the budget, I was fortunate that Minister Ecker was able to use my office for some of the rollout of the budget this year. When she did some of her press conferences and meetings with the media immediately after the budget, she used my office for a lot of that, and I was pleased to be part of that.

The first budget of our new Premier, Ernie Eves, is sensible, prudent and clearly focused on keeping Ontario prosperous and strong, and, at the same time, trying to maintain the services that are most important to the citizens of our great province. Since 1995, we have worked hard here on this side of the House on behalf of Ontario families to build a strong foundation of prosperity, jobs and economic growth in the province. Recent events have tested the strength of that foundation. We are pleased that, as a result of the 2002 budget, Ontario does remain strong to this day.

The announcement last month of the new jobs in our country was so important. In the month of September, 32,000 new jobs, or 80% of the jobs created in the whole country, were created right here in the province of Ontario. We look forward to the day—and we hope it's in the very near future—when we can actually say a million new jobs have been created since our government came to power in 1995. I think that will be a day for all Ontarians to be extremely proud of.

In the last year or so, as an aftermath of September 11, 13 months later, the United States, our largest trading partner, experienced a sharp economic slowdown. Ontario exports fell in that year and we encountered a slight recession, similar to the one in 1991. Added to this hardship, Ontario and all provinces continue to be shortchanged by the federal health and social transfers. They've actually failed to keep up with rapidly rising health care costs, the expansion of post-secondary education and the need to protect vulnerable people in our society.

We're very enthusiastic and looking forward to the announcement of Mr Romanow's commission, when he'll bring forward, hopefully, the recommendations relating to health care later on either this month or in December. We hope that will lead to an extremely productive first ministers' conference as we head toward the spring of next year. I believe there's something scheduled for January or February for the first ministers. Health care is a national priority. Again, we're dealing with the budget and the rollout from that budget. While the number of senior citizens is growing like never before in our province, the ever-expanding job of caring for our parents and grandparents through home care falls solely on the shoulders of the provinces. We're hoping, again, as we go toward the Romanow report, we'll see some recommendations in there for some help from our counterparts in Ottawa.

While Ontario is the economic engine of Canada, Ontario workers and employers continue to be unfairly overtaxed through excessive employment insurance premiums. That's a known fact. Especially here in Ontario. Our workers are penalized and we basically pay the employment insurance for a number of the other provinces in this country.

After September 11, this government took swift action to protect our hard-fought gains by accelerating tax cuts. That happened last year. Today our decisive action is beginning to pay dividends. Ontario is now poised again, even today, to lead growth as we move forward to a brighter future that is upon us. We have kept Ontario strong and we remain committed to the priority programs that matter most to real Ontario families. Those, of course, are health care, education and the environment.

We will continue to find efficiencies elsewhere in government spending as we head toward the future in many areas.

One of the key commitments of Bill 198 is the commitment concerning reforms to Ontario's auto insurance system. These reforms are designed to strengthen the province's auto insurance system and provide greater protection for our consumers.

At this time, it is my pleasure to provide some details about our government's next steps in our continuing efforts to improve the auto insurance system here in Ontario. As some of you may know, our government has a long-standing commitment to protecting consumers. Auto insurance is one area in which we have focused on consumer protection.

Since our election in 1995, we have moved forward with important reforms to improve the auto insurance system. In 1996, for example, my colleague Rob Sampson introduced Bill 59, the Automobile Insurance Rate Stability Act. Insurance rates for drivers, which had been increasing annually by double digits, declined substantially after that act came into force on November 1, 1996. Most jurisdictions experienced, and are continuing to experience, much higher rate increases than the province of Ontario. In Ontario, rates declined 12.5% between 1996 and 1999. Ontario rates have only recently returned to 1996 levels and are now only 6.9% higher than when Bill 59 was introduced by us in 1996.

That was an important piece of legislation and part of our commitment to the people of our province. That commitment continues to this day. We have continued to look for improvements, for new measures to strengthen our system. We have made commitments to improve the system by attempting to moderate cost and ensuring fairness in the system.

For example, we are phasing out the retail sales tax on auto insurance premiums, which was 5% when we came to power. That tax is currently at just 2% and will be completely eliminated by April 2004. We have made changes to the regulations to eliminate what we would call double dipping, where claimants receive both Canada pension plan disability benefits and auto insurance benefits. Some claimants were receiving more money for being injured than they had been before they were actually injured. The system is now fair for injured claimants as well as for all vehicle owners who pay their insurance premiums.

We have streamlined the process for settling a claim. We clarified and simplified requirements so consumers can make informed decisions on settlement offers and insurers can save administrative costs. As a result of our efforts, the Financial Services Commission of Ontario, FSCO, now has a more improved, more efficient rate filing system that saves administrative costs for insurers. Insurers must still obtain approval from FSCO to increase their rates.

Finally, we have continued with consultations led by my colleagues Ted Chudleigh, who is here with us today, Rob Sampson and Wayne Wettlaufer, on how best to improve the auto insurance system. They have held consultations and received submissions from many, many interested parties across our province, including consumer groups, insurers, brokers, health care providers and the legal community. These consultations have gone well and were completed in October 2002, just a few weeks back. In the 2002 budget in June, we announced our commitment to move forward with reforms once consultations have actually been completed. We are now ready to implement reforms based on input from both consumers and the auto insurance industry.

With the measures included in Bill 198, we are now implementing an action plan that focuses on three key areas. The first area is increasing support for innocent victims whereby we will improve the delivery of treatment and people's rights to sue for benefits. In protecting consumers we want to ensure that consumers get credible information and that their interests are in fact protected. Finally, we are taking steps to ensure that the industry is competitive so consumers have real choice available to them. I'm sure you all agree that these are very, very important objectives.

These reforms are necessary because there are serious challenges facing the industry these days. Throughout North America, and across the world for that matter, insurance premiums are rising. In Ontario, rising premiums are due to factors such as rising health care costs not covered by OHIP and increasing expensive vehicle repair costs. I don't think most people are aware of just what the impact was on insurance companies and the insurance industry as a result of September 11, 2001. I just had a case the other day—I've had a couple recently, of small companies that have come forward and they're having a real problem getting insurance. They're actually asking me to look into whatever I can find or additional names that they could use to try to get insurance because a lot of the larger companies are just not underwriting a lot of the small companies as a result of the large payouts they made as a result of September 11. In fact, there are many, many lawsuits and credits still to go to people who died in September 11 and to pay for some of the costs of the demolition that was done during that period. So September 11 has had a major impact and a lot of small businesses are hearing that, and it's something that I think everyone across this planet has to look into because it certainly has been something that we didn't expect to see but has had a major impact.

We must move forward with measures to keep insurance premiums competitive while providing stronger support for our consumers. Today I am pleased to address the details of our action plan as included in Bill 198 and ask everyone in this House for their support on this particular bill. To begin with, Bill 198 would provide more support for innocent accident victims. If approved by the Legislature, our reforms in this area would include, first of all, expanding the rights of injured people to sue at-fault drivers for health care expenses in excess of no-fault insurance benefits. Currently, innocent victims are unable to sue at-fault drivers for excess health care costs unless they suffer catastrophic injuries. The government's proposal would expand the right for innocent victims who sustain a serious or permanent impairment to sue at-fault drivers for health care expenses in excess of insurance benefits.

The second point on that is that we would also expand the right to sue for health care expenses for injured children. That can be a very, very serious issue, as you know, when someone very young gets hurt and it has an impact, not only on the child but on all members of their family and on their education, as they may in fact be in the hospital for months and months at a time.

The third measure would also improve service to accident victims by ensuring speedier access to medical treatment through the introduction of treatment guidelines for specific injuries. Currently it takes longer for some people with certain injuries such as whiplash to get treatment because of disputes over the need for treatment. We intend that this measure set clearer guidelines for those injuries and help promote quicker access to proper treatment by eliminating prior approval by insurers.

Fourth, we are also looking to provide greater consumer protection. This would include measures to increase consumer awareness by requiring insurance agents to disclose which companies they represent, as brokers now must do. Currently, some consumers may not be able to distinguish between services provided by brokers and those actually provided by agents. Consumers may assume an agent has the ability to compare products and prices from different companies when in fact the agent only represents one company. This measure would ensure that consumers will be better informed about who insurance agents actually represent. It would also give consumers a clearer idea of what services are going to be provided.

Finally, we are moving forward with measures to ensure the auto industry remains competitive. These measures, if approved by the Legislature, would include controlling costs through the elimination of double-dipping. The government is planning to eliminate double-dipping by injured victims who win court awards for loss of income and then receive money from other sources for that same disability. This can mean that the compensation is greater than the losses experienced by the injured party. Situations like that simply add costs to the system for everyone who pays premiums while allowing a few people to double-dip. The government measures, if approved, would require the courts to deduct income replacement benefits received from another source.

Another issue we are trying to address to improve the auto insurance system is in the area of deductibles. There is a $15,000 deductible, or $7,500 for Family Law Act awards, applied to court awards for pain and suffering to discourage frivolous lawsuits. During consultations, Mr Chudleigh and Mr Wettlaufer and Mr O'Toole all heard that the deductible simply decreases the awards for the most seriously injured.

Interjection.

Mr Dunlop: I'm sorry, I've made a mistake. It was actually Mr Sampson, not Mr O'Toole, on that.

We therefore propose to eliminate the deductible for large awards over $100,000; $50,000 for Family Law Act awards. We do not propose to apply the deductible to court awards for health care expenses.

Lump sum awards currently may be adjusted upward so that after income tax is paid on the investment income from the award, the claimant is left with the amount of the lump sum award plus the investment income. We propose to clarify the provisions in the act such that court awards that are paid in instalments over time rather than in a lump sum are not to be adjusted to an upward position. The interest or other income from investing these awards should be taxable.

Changes are also proposed to the motor vehicle accident claims fund, which provides auto insurance benefits for those involved in an accident who did not have any other policy to cover their losses. We are ensuring that the fund's resources are correctly directed—in other words, it will no longer pay statutory accident benefits for accidents that happen outside of our province. In order to ensure that injured individuals do not experience an interruption in their flow of benefits in the event of an insurer insolvency, it is proposed that the motor vehicle accident claims fund take over payment of no-fault benefits to claimants. Any costs incurred by the fund will be recovered from the auto insurance industry. As a result, this measure would not increase the fund's operating costs.

Ours is a balanced package of reforms, addressing many of the concerns we heard throughout our consultations. These reforms would enhance the auto insurance system in Ontario and benefit the consumers who depend on it. These reforms would keep rates from rising as much as they would have without any government action. These reforms would also help ensure the system is fair and effective.

That is why I would ask everyone to support Bill 198. I know Minister Ecker has put a great deal of effort into this legislation. I have confidence not only in Minister Ecker but in the great staff she has around her and the great people who work in the Ministry of Finance, who year after year work diligently with the Minister of Finance, cabinet and our government caucus to make sure we deliver a budget that works well for our strong and thriving economy.

With that, I'd like to thank you for the opportunity to say a few words today. I believe Mr McDonald and possibly Mr O'Toole will be making a few comments to follow my statement here as well.

Mr AL McDonald (Nipissing): In the June budget, the government announced pension surplus reforms. This was in response to concerns expressed by the pension community, pressing for legislation to address pension surplus. The pension community, which includes pension plan administrators, plan members, pensioners and employers, was reacting to recent court cases—which we all know—which called into question the effectiveness of the current surplus distribution scheme and have made it difficult for many employers to negotiate surplus-sharing agreements with their employee members and pensioners, and led to legal uncertainty regarding the rules governing partial pension plan windups and pending resolution of the Monsanto case. Following this case, employers were being forced to distribute surplus on partial windup or delay as long as possible until the law changes. This case is still being considered by the Ontario Court of Appeal.

There is the concern about this case because, if it requires employers to distribute surplus on partial windup, members affected by partial windup may receive surplus even if the continuing members, pensioners or anyone who is terminated for other reasons may never receive surplus. Indeed, depending on circumstances, distribution of surplus on partial windup may jeopardize the basic benefits of the continuing members and pensioners.

Before this case, the pension community understood that employers were able to choose to distribute surplus or retain surplus in the plan on a partial windup. Employers routinely chose not to distribute surplus and were not required to do so. This case has thrown doubt on that practice, which employers thought was authorized by law.

There is a hard-working MPP from Durham named John O'Toole who has worked on this bill for a considerable time, and he has considerable expertise. What I would like to do, as the new member from Nipissing, is defer to Mr O'Toole, the MPP for Durham, to continue on the debate on Bill 198.

Mr John O'Toole (Durham): I'd like to thank the member from Nipissing. People on this side have worked and tirelessly. I look at Rob Sampson and Frank Klees, who both worked tirelessly on this. I think the member from Bramalea-Gore-Malton-Springdale has had an opportunity to work on this. Mr Chudleigh, of course, is currently working on it and continues to do great work because there's always more to be done. Minister Elliott has probably worked on this too. In fact, Wayne Wetlaufer, the member from Kitchener Centre, has worked on it as well.

If I have enough time—and with only 17 minutes, I don't think there is enough time. I was particularly intrigued because when I was PA to finance under Minister Flaherty, like other members I have mentioned, there were considerable consultations on auto insurance reform, which Mr Sampson, to his credit, started. There were commitments in that discussion to have a review in two or three years, and it's long overdue. So this government, in keeping with its commitments—which is its moniker: doing what it says, keeping its promises—is certainly moving forward under this current bill that we're discussing today.

There are a number of sections in the bill. For those viewing, when you look, it's a fairly large bill. I like to give you a physical kind of representation. It's about 146 pages. It's half French, so that means it's approximately 73 pages in English, give or take a few pages, with a preamble. But if a person looks at this, it's really about having a strong economy while at the same time, in the specific sections of the bill—and I'm going to address just two of them—"consumer protection" is the first term that comes to mind.

Just to follow up on the member from Nipissing, who in his comments was talking about the Pension Benefits Act, as I recall, when I met with the pension groups there was a lot of discussion in a broad sense about pensions, about moving toward a defined contribution plan. Now, there's a difference here between a defined contribution and a defined benefit. It's just language, but in the essence of it all, it's a substantive change in what the pensioner actually receives, because if your defined contribution happened to be in Nortel, you have no pension. It's that simple.

So defined contribution is quite onerous. I know people like to have choices, especially young people. They think the world is a bowl of cherries, and it is of course as long as we're in government. But I think in the broadest sense the defined benefit plan is probably far more enticing for the more conservative-minded investors, or employees in many cases.

In fairness, the employer, who in many cases takes the risk to underwrite in a negotiated contract relationship with employees—or takes pretty well all the risk, because if they're entitled to so much a month, then pretty soon you've spent your house, you've spent your cottage, you've spent all your future options and you're running out of business, but you still owe to the pension plan as an employer.

On the pension benefit thing, the groups that I felt most compelled to listen to were the retirees. They had worked under a certain set of assumptions. If there's a great surplus today, some would argue that in their 20, 30 or in some cases 40 years of service they had made contributions and their contributions had set up a little nest egg which then during good times had earned great premiums. So the argument could be made that they probably created the bulk of capital in the investment plan and as such have, I think, an entitlement, even though when retired their voice may not have been appropriately recognized.

One of the groups I met with that I felt the most connection with—of course, I'm of pension age so it's always close to my heart. Except there's not one here, provincially. I hate to get off the track, but I hope people realize there is no provincial pension. There is no pension plan for provincial MPPs. I think some of the pages didn't know that.

The point I'm trying to make is that at the University of Toronto retired professors who had worked to build that great institution came to me and explained that with all their trust funds and with all their pension contribution holidays—and that's the trick here—these pensioners were in many cases living in rather dire circumstances. These are professors of philosophy, professors of physics who had built the great bastion of U of T and now they or their spouses find themselves living in pretty odd circumstances.

Mr Raminder Gill (Bramalea-Gore-Malton-Springdale): Good school. I went there.

Mr O'Toole: Raminder Gill from Bramalea-Gore-Malton-Springdale got his master's degree in chemical engineering, I believe.

Mr Gill: Yes.

Mr O'Toole: I hope you didn't sniff any of those chemicals, because it's dangerous working in those labs.

I also graduated from the U of T and thank many of the professors who taught me, as best they could. Of course, you had to attend classes to learn anything. I had a lot of empathy for that particular group and I believe this legislation goes a long way to strengthening the voice of the retired community.

There's another very famous case: National Trust—what was the bank?—and the merger that occurred. That National Trust group got kind of early retired and there was a huge surplus—

Interjection: Bank of Nova Scotia.

Mr O'Toole: Was it Scotia?

Hon Brenda Elliott (Minister of Community, Family and Children's Services): Victoria and Grey.

Mr O'Toole: Victoria and Grey. That's it. Pardon me, my mind is, as you get older—it's called Alzheimer's, I think.

In sincerity, they appealed to me as well. What happened, in my view, was there was an attempt to wind up when the two entities merged, and the National Trust employees, in my understanding, ended up with not a very specific voice in sharing the surplus at that time. If I look at this legislation, I'm convinced that we've moved toward any redistribution of any perceived surplus or actuarial surplus—that there needs to be a two-thirds vote of all members of the pension plan. As such, I think those organizations will become stronger over the years.

I cast that net even further. As companies do well, I know that often during negotiations the CAW and others look after their employees so that there's some incremental benefit to the people who are on a pension. I think that's important because in many cases people are retiring in their 50s to 60s, maybe very early 60s. I think that's too early, myself. A good example is Mr Chretien. He's not retired. He plans to stick around longer than necessary. He's not retired, but he'll get a great pension anyway.

Mr George Smitherman (Toronto Centre-Rosedale): That's out of order.

Mr O'Toole: That's not out of order. It's the truth and the truth is never out of order in this place. Some have made the argument that he has retired, that he's just still there, but that's another issue.

I still go out to the seniors who will be living longer, thanks to the great health care system we have in Ontario, and with that they could possibly live into their pensioned years for longer than they worked. Just do the numbers: if someone started in the generation when you perhaps didn't need a university education—I'm talking of the 1940s and 1950s—and then they worked for 25 or 30 years, say 20, and they retired at 50-something—that's impossible. Most of them are going to live to be 80 and they'll be retired longer than they worked.

I've looked at it quite sincerely. I hope this is in order. My wife is a teacher, and many of the members of my families are teachers. This isn't personal, although I could mention their names. I look at it this way. When you work in teaching, in the first 20 years of teaching they didn't make $20,000—I'm talking about a specific case I know—and in their last 10 years, under the Liberals and the NDP, their salaries went up to some $40,000 and some $50,000. Now I think the average salary for a teacher—I'm not teacher-bashing. Some of them should make $100,000 a year; some should make $4. The point I'm making is that in the last 10 years they would maybe make $30,000, $40,000, $60,000, and their pension is based on their best five years, so if the pension is 70 factor of $60,000, then they're making about $40,000, and that's more than they made for the first 25 years they worked.

In their pension contribution, which is significant, about 9% of payroll, in the first 10 years of retirement, at 55, not at 65, they've earned out all the money they ever contributed, and they're only 65 and they're going to live to be 85.

Guess why they have a problem with the public sector pension plans, unless of course Nortel re-emerges with a $120 stock. Do you understand? We are the underwriters of all the public sector pensions: that's the OMERS group, a huge problem; HOOPP, the hospital pension plan; the teachers' pension plan—the main contributor to that, the only payer, is the taxpayers of Ontario. When those plans run into problems, the liable party is the government, the taxpayers of Ontario. Let's hope the market keeps going up, is all I can say. We all know the demographics. There's a huge whack ready to retire.

Honestly, on closer examination, you'll see that most of the public sector plans have been on a contribution holiday. OMERS, the Ontario municipal employees retirement savings plan, has been on a contribution holiday, saving the municipalities hundreds and thousands and indeed millions of dollars. In fact, the payroll—that's the actual take-home pay—has been reduced by as much as 9%. When those plans don't have a surplus and they have to go back to making their contributions, they have huge future implications for hospital, school and other public sector pensions. I just put that on the record as part of the debate on the pension entitlement attitude we have today.

I believe this bill goes a long way to addressing the responsibility of the employer—I do not neglect that—and indeed the responsibility of the employee for the tracking. I got into the details of tracking former employees. Anyone who established an employment relationship with a company 25 years ago is theoretically entitled to a pension once they reach pensionable age. Who is going to track all this information? Who is going to notify them when there are partial or full windups of plans? There's a significant amount of work to be done on the Pension Benefits Act. As I said in the beginning, and will conclude those remarks, with respect to the pension benefit portion, I am most concerned that the voice of those major contributors, now retired, is recognized. I want that to be understood as the main point I'm making.

The budget bill proposes to deal first with reform of the surplus distribution under the rules of the Pension Benefits Act and its subset, the reform of surplus rules for partial windup, which I've just mentioned. In 1991, Ontario introduced a surplus regulation, a temporary measure to regulate surplus withdrawals based on a negotiated agreement from defined benefit plans. Again, I've mentioned defined benefit plans as opposed to defined contribution plans. Those are very important words, and the public should be aware of them. When you're a young person being employed, watch whether it's a defined contribution plan or a defined benefit plan.

Pending the development of a more permanent solution, the regulation was renewed in 1994, 1997 and 1998. Other governments have dealt with this. It's a very complex, very touchy issue, and it's my understanding that it expires December 31, 2002. Something had to be done, and this is the government that decided to move forward with, I think, a very balanced approach of making sure that consulting all the stakeholders or shareholders is indeed on track.

The extension of the regulation preserves the current situation pending the drafting of new surplus rules. Merely extending the regulations for a period, however, would not maintain Ontario's surplus sharing tradition, as recent court cases have restricted the ability of both employers and employees to enter into surplus sharing agreements.

I'm going to stop there for a moment. This whole idea of a surplus in a pension confounds me. I don't know of anyone, including Mr Phillips and Mr Kwinter, who are both quite respectable finance people—tell me what a surplus is. It's an actuarial mathematical formula that doesn't mean squat in the overall marketplace; otherwise we'd all be millionaires. These are forecast expected returns that, as we see in the case of Nortel and other kinds of failures in institutions, are only estimates. If you start spending that surplus that I've just described in OMERS, there is no surplus left. In fact, there's a shortfall in the Ontario teachers' pension plan. No one has talked about it, but I can assure you from very good advice—actuaries etc.—that there is a significant bump in the road coming, because the plans have not performed as the pension actuarial forecasts have predicted. Who is going to be stuck paying the bill? The taxpayers of this province are going to be stuck paying those defined benefit plans.

Before the regulations entered into, the pension surplus was determined mainly by the courts in numerous lengthy and high-profile winner-take-all legal actions. For many years, and based on regulations, employers could withdraw surpluses where they had the agreement of pension plan members. The recent Divisional Court decision of Tecsyn v Superintendent, released in May 2000, has restricted the effectiveness of surplus-sharing agreements. That's the Monsanto decision as well. Since the decision, employers have also been forced to demonstrate that the documents that created the pension plan clearly entitled them to withdraw pension surpluses.

Again I want to stop for a moment in the brief time left, because I'm not in favour of employers who are abusing pension surpluses either. There's an agreement made. We both contribute, whether it's 9% of payroll or the employer's contribution. That surplus, I believe, in perpetuity has to survive the people who made the contributions.

Very few pension plans contain clear provisions entitling the employer to a surplus. As a result, few surplus distribution agreements have been negotiated between employers and pension plan members and pensioners. A surplus consultation paper, which I participated in, was released in July 2001, and 78 written submissions were received. We met with many of them. Most of the core proposals of the surplus consultation paper received broad-based support, and from the basis of the proposed surplus reforms, the informed stakeholder discussions announced in the budget took place in August 2002. Representatives of employers, plan members and pensioners participated and gave positive feedback on the modified proposals prepared by our Minister of Finance and staff. The reforms are also consistent with those in many other jurisdictions in Canada where surplus-sharing provisions have been enacted, similar to Ontario's 1991 regulation.

In the very few minutes left, I would like to explain why it's vital that we support the reforms to the Pension Benefits Act. I would say it is committed to maintaining public confidence in the future of their savings—very important. That includes pension benefits and a fair balance between the interests of the employers, plan members and indeed pensioners, as I have stressed throughout my remarks. Their concerns are legitimate and must be responded to.

We have also just recently proposed new measures to strengthen the Ontario Securities Commission, our securities regulator, so that securities violators would be dealt with firmly and promptly. Having effective capital markets in this climate of dealing with pension plans is an extremely important part of that capital market. As I said earlier, several Canadian jurisdictions have similar surplus-sharing agreements. The proposed surplus-sharing reforms provide a framework for the parties to come to their solutions on surpluses and avoid expensive litigation matters.

This budget and the few remarks I have made and that the minister, Janet Ecker, made earlier today are important to keeping confidence first with strong leadership from the top, Premier Ernie Eves, as well as Finance Minister Janet Ecker, so the people of Ontario and others in the economy, including the current House leader and Minister of the Environment and former Minister of Labour, Mr Stockwell, former Speaker of this House—the previous government, I mean. We are keeping our promise to stay on track. There is more to be done. I am anxious to hear the critics on the other side and their response, in a general sense, to this budget bill, a very lengthy document, as I said before, with about 25 sections. We've just touched on one. Thank you for your time.

The Acting Speaker: Questions and comments?

Mr Monte Kwinter (York Centre): I'd like to comment on the member from Durham's comments. It's kind of strange, or as the phrase is that comes from the other side, "passing strange," that he seems to be advocating a defined benefit plan, as opposed to a defined contribution plan, when in fact this government took the defined benefit plan away from the members of this Legislature and gave them a defined contribution plan.

The other thing that I'd like to talk about is that he says, "Where does this surplus come from?" When you're in a defined benefit plan, it's the obligation of the employer to make sure the plan is actuarially sound. So what they do is put money into it to make sure that is the case. If, under actuarial estimates, there is far more money in the plan than is required to meet those commitments, they are, under the system, allowed to take it out.

The concern I have is that you are talking about changing the rules—and I have no problem at all; make it effective at the time this legislation comes into effect. But to go back to 1988, 14 years, to say, "What you did 14 years ago is going to be impacted by this particular bill," really creates some problems for me. What you are really doing is playing games with the people who had an obligation to make sure their pensioners were looked after. They were the ones who took the risk. What you're saying is, "We don't want it to be equal. If the pensioner loses money, then they have to go back and compensate for that." I really have some concerns with that. I totally agree that we have to address it if it is, but I really have some problems with saying we've got to go back to 1988 and, in 2002, impose obligations on people who entered in good faith in 1988.

Mr Kormos: The minister, when she made her comments, made reference to yet another kick at the can by the insurance industry when it comes to amendments to the legislation which determine the rights—few, if any—of innocent victims and insured automobile owners. She neglected to tell us, because the industry has been quite clear that notwithstanding they're getting their way again, there are still going to be double-digit premium increases.

The industry one day will insist it's the result of fraud. The next it will change its mind and say no, it's the result of the increase in medical rehabilitation costs. The next day it'll indicate no, it's a result of the impact of 9/11 on reinsurance costs. The next day the industry will indicate no, it's a result of the bear market and their not being able to get any returns on their investments. Why should auto insurance premium payers have to subsidize the insurance industry just because the insurance industry bought Nortel at $50 on the way down? I don't think and New Democrats don't think that's fair. We don't think it's kosher. Quite frankly, this government has a lot to account for. But at the end of the day it's not so much about the government not getting it right; it's about the industry not getting it right.

This is an industry traditionally with short arms and deep pockets. They've been gouging Ontario premium payers. The data are clear, because all of the same stresses that the Ontario industry talks about are surely present in other provinces, including British Columbia, with the Insurance Corp of British Columbia. The ICBC acknowledges an impact of 9/11 on insurance premiums, but there the impact is but 7.4%, as compared to the more than 13% argued by the industry here in Ontario. Clearly the industry is not being truthful with consumers, auto insurance premium payers here in Ontario. I suspect the industry isn't being truthful with this government that is working so hard to serve them.

Hon Chris Stockwell (Minister of the Environment, Government House Leader): Did anyone else have a flashback there to when the good member for Welland was on his feet for 17 hours, talking about the insurance industry and what a terrible operation was going on? Horrible things were happening. Then what happened? They got elected and they got into government. Their plan in the Agenda for People was public auto insurance. No more private companies.

Mr Kormos: You were no help.

Hon Mr Stockwell: No, I didn't think the plan was a good idea. That was your plan. You, Bob Rae, Mel Swart and all your friends were really high and gung-ho. What happened? They had five years in office and they didn't do it. The insurance industry got worse and worse. They had nothing, not a thing, after all these 17 hours that we had to sit here and listen to the member opposite go on about the terrible insurance industry.

I had a bit of a flashback there. I know Mr Kwinter and Mr Phillips would understand exactly that flashback that took place.

Mr Kwinter: I was the minister responsible.

Hon Mr Stockwell: You were the minister responsible when the 17 hours—gosh, for five years what did they do? He was even the minister in charge. You were the minister in charge, remember?

Mr Smitherman: He was there for a week.

Hon Mr Stockwell: No, he was there months. He was there long enough to have his office swept three or four times for bugs. That's as long as he was there. What did he do? Nothing.

I've got to tell you, the Rob Sampsons of the world came to our defence and saved us. They ran up a good piece of legislation, passed it through this House and put a real wet blanket on that issue. There needs to be some constant tweaking, you're right. But you've got to admit, the member for Welland, in the last five years that issue hasn't even been anywhere near the level of concern in the public as it was when Mr Kwinter was in charge and when you were in charge. So I had a flashback. They say if you can remember the 1960s, you didn't live them. I feel the same way about auto insurance.

Mr Smitherman: In a little bit I'll have a few more minutes to talk to some of the content of this bill, but I wanted to speak in response to the lead debate by the minister and three of her colleagues on what wasn't mentioned in their speeches.

This is really a camouflage bill. Under the guise of restoring investor confidence and dealing with auto insurance, what this bill does is raise taxes and it repudiates decisions of the government in the past. It camouflages and masks the fact that the government had to go to extraordinary lengths, because to raise the taxes in the way they propose, by delaying them, is to break their own law. So in the provisions of an enormous bill, they had to bury that element and they will through the course of this debate seek to do so.

I guess that's why the Minister of Finance in her very brief lead remarks had a very difficult time keeping quorum and keeping the interest of the members from the government party, because the seven-year rhetoric line came to a crashing end when, in their budget, the government had to repudiate their own policies and delay those tax increases.

In just a few minutes, anyone listening at home will have a chance to hear from a man so much better qualified to be the Treasurer of this province, and he will tell you it is time to put an end to the plan for those corporate tax cuts, to put an end to that private school tax voucher, which threatens to take hundreds of millions of dollars away from public schools in Ontario.

For Ontarians listening at home, I want to let you know in the clearest terms possible that the real story is the story you will hear from the Liberals on this side of the House, and not from the government party, which in an hour of lead time failed to live up to the fact that their budget repudiated their own policies.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, and before that momentous occasion occurs, we have an opportunity to hear from one of the original speakers for up to two minutes. The member for Durham.

Mr O'Toole: I'm pleased to respond to the members from York Centre, Niagara Centre, Etobicoke Centre and Toronto Centre-Rosedale.

I want to reply, because I think it's important to know there are two new sections, 79.1 and 79.2, that govern the payment of surplus to employers and other prescribed persons out of the continuing pension plan or a pension plan that is being wound up in whole or in part. Section 79.1 creates a mechanism on the payment of surplus to them on the basis that they are entitled to the surplus. Section 79.2 creates a mechanism that applies when the employer has obtained the consent of two thirds of the members and former members. That's a very important clause. It could be missed in the broader debate. If I listened to the member for Toronto Centre-Rosedale, there would be no content at all.

On the broader question, this bill, like many of the other sections of the bill, actually addresses many things that have been neglected for years—auto insurance, as Mr Kormos would know. This legislation deals very clearly with marketplace realities on the issue of auto insurance. He would know, for instance, that the motor vehicle accident victims fund act is a very technical menu of victims' entitlements. It provides for the process for payments out of the motor vehicle accident victims fund in respect of insurers that are being wound up, a new provision, which is required medical assessments in sections under the superintendent for uninsured drivers, a new provision indicating no statutory accident benefits for accidents outside Ontario, a new penalty provision of a reciprocal provision for payments out of the fund for non-residents. So these technical amendments—that explains the detail that is in this bill.

I commend the minister; I commend the members who have contributed to this process on doing the right thing for the people of Ontario. At the end of the day we do it, with a balanced budget, and I have every confidence we will move forward after the next election.

Hon Frank Klees (Minister of Tourism and Recreation): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I beg your indulgence. I'm sure you will agree that you will rule this is indeed a point of order.

We celebrate our pages, and I had the privilege of having lunch with my page. He sent me a thank you note, and I just have to read this into the record.

Thanks, Minister Klees

for the magnificent lunch

My father and I had a wonderful munch

The pasta was great, as I'm sure was the sole

The salad was awesome, all set in its bowl

I'm writing this poem to say thank you to thee

It's a reason with which my dad would agree.

Alexandre Soulodre.

He will one day be in this House, debating as we are today. I thank him.

The Acting Speaker: The minister will know that's not a point of order and he may not read that into the record.

It is now time for the leadoff speech of the official opposition, and the Chair recognizes the member for Scarborough-Agincourt.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): I should let the House know that I'll be sharing my time with the member for Toronto Centre-Rosedale.

As previous members have said, this is an extremely complex bill. It amends 27 different acts and creates two new acts. We're truly dealing with an omnibus bill. I happen to think it's inappropriate to do this, but the government can do whatever it wants, and I think that's unfortunate.

I want to begin by talking about some of the key elements in this bill. The first is that the people of Ontario should recognize that at the centre of this bill is the government breaking its word and increasing taxes by $1.5 billion.

Mr Smitherman: How much?

Mr Phillips: One point five billion dollars. These were promises the government made. More than promises, they are in legislation. They were legislated commitments that the government made on corporate taxes, personal income taxes, the private school tax credit and residential education property taxes. None of the government members have mentioned it, but people at home should recognize that at the corner of this bill they were promised $1.5 billion of tax cuts, starting January 1, 2003.

Interjection.

Mr Phillips: Mr Chudleigh is here, and his residents will be glad to hear he is supporting a bill that breaks a fundamental promise the Conservatives made. That's how they got elected. They promised this, Mr Speaker. You will know that we have said for some time they can't afford it. You are making promises you can't afford to keep. "No, no, no. We're going to go ahead and do that, because we'll get elected that way."

I was intrigued by the government's own document, which they put out at their convention, because it makes our point for us. It says on page 4, "Questions and answers"—this is a Conservative document—"How can the government justify breaking the Taxpayer Protection Act?" I would say that was the corner of what Ernie Eves believed in. The Premier believed in this Taxpayer Protection Act. I think every single member of the Conservative Party signed it, and it was right at the heart of matters. Mr Chudleigh signed it.

Mr Ted Chudleigh (Halton): I did, proudly.

Mr Phillips: But what happened? I say to the public, if he signed it and believed in it, how in the world, Mr Chudleigh, can you justify breaking it? Why did you break it? You go on to say in this document, "Because Moody's Investor Services have said that to meet the target of a fourth balanced budget, the government must delay for one year scheduled reductions in a number of tax rates." That's what we've been telling you all along. Mr Chudleigh, you're making promises that you can't keep. They may get you elected, but you're going to find that taxpayers say, "What in the world? How can I believe you? You said this Taxpayer Protection Act was something you fundamentally believed in. You signed it. You got elected on that basis."

This is not my document. This is what the Conservative Party put out at its convention to try to rationalize breaking the Taxpayer Protection Act. I'm glad you delayed the tax cuts, because you couldn't afford them. You made promises that were irresponsible. I would say that to balance the budget this year, the government is selling off key assets of the province—many viewers at home are interested in this. You merely need to get the budget document, which shows that in 1999, when the election was called, the government chose to sell off Highway 407. You can see that this line went from $600 million to $2.1 billion. This year, the year we're in right now, it's gone up $1.8 billion.

To balance the budget this year, the fiscal year we're in right now, the government's going to sell off some of the crown jewels of the province. Originally, Premier Eves tried to sell off Hydro One but kind of got trapped on that; I think they're still out trying to sell 49% of it. To balance the budget this year, they've got to do that. To balance the budget next year, Premier Eves has to go against his own Taxpayer Protection Act, something that most people thought could never be touched. As they say in their own document, how can the government justify breaking the Taxpayer Protection Act? Well, Moody's, the credit rating agency, quite rightly says, "If you want a balanced budget, you're going to have to delay these tax cuts." That's what we've been telling you all along. Finally, you've admitted it yourselves in writing.

To the people of Ontario, I'd say that you won't hear the Conservatives talk about this tax cut delay, which is the cornerstone of this budget: $1.5 billion in tax cuts that were legislated, and the only way that the government can get around them is to pass legislation.

Just before the budget was presented, I was asked by a reporter, "Do you think they'll delay the tax cuts?" I said, "If they do that, I'll eat my hat because this is what they say they believe in." They say they believe in this Taxpayer Protection Act. I said, "They should delay them because they can't afford them, but they can't delay them because they signed, to get themselves elected, this Taxpayer Protection Act."

I think the people of the province—

Mr Chudleigh: Did you eat your hat?

Mr Phillips: Oh, I did eat my hat, Mr Chudleigh. I ate my hat because I made the mistake of thinking you'd do what you promised you would, but you wouldn't, so I had to eat my hat. I ate my hat and I don't mind admitting it to the public. I actually made the mistake I'll never make again of believing the Premier when he said he'd support the Taxpayer Protection Act. I'll never believe that again, ever.

When the public listens to this debate, it starts with $1.5 billion of tax promises not delivered. This isn't promises kept; this is promises broken on the $1.5 billion and the Taxpayer Protection Act.

I agree with the delay in the tax cuts. You can't afford them. You've made promises you can't afford and you admit it yourself. You even hand out, at your own convention, Moody's telling you that you couldn't afford it and you have to balance the budget by delaying them.

I must say I was personally offended by the budget where the government attempted to hide the number. If you look at the page in the budget that purports to explain to the public how much this tax cut delay was costing them in forgone revenue, they only reported three months. I think that was inappropriate for a government that owes the public a full accounting of its financing. We work for the public. They deserve a full accounting.

The fourth point I'd want to make is on the incompetence of the government. Today we finally got the audited statements from the year that ended March 31, more than seven months ago. If this were a company listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange and it tried to get away with delivering its audited statements seven and a half months after the fiscal year ended, they'd be delisted. The government just today finally issued its financial statements. Why I'm particularly sensitive on this is that, when the Premier was the Minister of Finance, in 1995—I remember it very well—he made a promise actually that the audited statements would be out within four months and he was going to aim for three months. By the way, he promised he'd eliminate the two sets of books. We've still got two sets of books in the province. He promised there would be a budget delivered before the fiscal year started. This year's budget, I think, was the latest in the history of the province.

I always say to my business friends: just because they may be called Conservatives, don't assume they know how to manage the finances. Nothing could demonstrate it better than legislating tax cuts that now have been delayed and balancing the books this year by selling off $1.8 billion worth of assets. It would be like a corporation saying, "Listen, we're going to lose money this year on our operating, but we can break even by selling off some of the furniture and some of our major assets."

The next point I'd like to touch on is one that I think is fundamental in many respects to the future of the province. This is the government which has decided that corporate taxes in the province of Ontario need to be 25% below those of our competitors in the US. I would say that this decision is going to shape the province of Ontario. We now are the most export-oriented jurisdiction in the world. Nobody relies on exports like Ontario does. Thank goodness we are able to compete effectively. Today it's 55%. Back in 1990, it was 29%. We can compete well with the US because of our business community, and thank goodness for that. But we have to make our choices very carefully as to how we want to compete with our neighbours to the south.

If you look at the budget now, the comparisons are not made to Quebec, Manitoba and other provinces; they're made to Michigan, Illinois, New York and Pennsylvania, because those are our major trading partners. Let me just say that I think competing on the basis of, "Come to Ontario because we're going to have corporate taxes 25% lower than you could get in the United States," is not a solid, long-term economic policy.

The state of Pennsylvania has had quite a few ads on television recently, and you will recall them. They say, "Come invest in Pennsylvania because we graduate more engineers than anybody else. We have three world-class universities in Pennsylvania. Our post-secondary education system is second to none. You will have the best workforce."

We have decided here in the province of Ontario to compete on the basis of corporate taxes 25% below those of the US. This is a substantial amount of money that we're talking about. To have corporate taxes in the province of Ontario 25% lower is forgone revenue of $5 billion a year. We have decided we are going to forgo $5 billion a year.

By the way, the federal government also supports this policy. The province has decided to forgo revenue of $2.2 billion and the federal government $2.8 billion. It is an enormous amount of money. That's how we're going to compete.

But if you look again, as I say, at the US jurisdictions and how they've decided to compete, it's on the basis of a superior workforce. Some $5 billion in the province of Ontario, in my opinion, is too high a price to pay. Why we would want to compete on the basis of corporate taxes 25% lower than those of the US is beyond me.

I carry around the booklet that the province of Ontario uses to sell Ontario. This is the document: "Why Should You Come to Ontario?" It says, "Come here because of our remarkable health care and education systems, which are publicly funded and open to everyone." It also says, "US manufacturers pay on average more than $3,100 per employee for the kind of health care coverage provided by Canada's publicly supported system, whereas Ontario employers pay $540."

In other words, we have a $2,500-per-employee cost advantage in our health care system. Well, there's no magic as to why that is. It is because we have chosen in this country to essentially, all of us, collectively, insure ourselves and to have a public health care system.

So I say to our business community, listen, I know that you're not going to reject corporate taxes 25% lower, but there is a huge price we pay for that. We are going to erode our health care system, our post-secondary education system and, I think, the advantages that we've had here in the province of Ontario.

I do not, for the life of me, understand the rationale of the policy. I've actually asked that question here in the Legislature probably five times. I've said to the government, "Tell me again why we need it 25% lower than the US." I can understand "competitive with the US," I can understand "modestly lower than the US," but to forgo $5 billion? The government has never given me an answer. We have tried to refer this matter to a committee. They've never agreed to that; they've always rejected that. I believe that's a debate we need to have.

If the province were simply to forgo its tax cut, we would still have corporate taxes in the manufacturing area at 33% versus the US at 40%, and in the non-manufacturing area at 35% versus 40% in the US. If we just cancelled this corporate tax cut, we would still be dramatically lower. I truly believe we'll have to do that or put at risk education and our health care system.

On tax cuts, there's another part of this bill that I believe should be cancelled rather than delayed for a year, and that's private school funding. This is going to be at least $500 million of funding.

Hon Jim Flaherty (Minister of Enterprise, Opportunity and Innovation): That's nonsense, and you know it.

Mr Phillips: Mr Flaherty, who is the architect of this, says it's not true, but private school enrolment is rising dramatically.

Hon Mr Flaherty: It hasn't happened anywhere in Canada.

Mr Phillips: We'll see. You'll get your chance to talk later on, Mr Flaherty.

Five hundred million dollars going into private schools is a fundamental mistake, for these reasons—

Hon Mr Flaherty: You can't even count. I'm disappointed.

Mr Phillips: Well, Mr Flaherty, you may get a chance to defend this position later on in this debate, but in the meantime you may want to listen to this debate. Five hundred million dollars is going into private schools at a time when our public school system needs all the support it can get. I have no difficulty with private schools—

Interjection.

The Acting Speaker: I'm sorry. Please take your seat.

I understand the odd outburst now and then, but now it's just continuous, and this member doesn't deserve that. No member does. So please show the respect that you would expect from colleagues.

Sorry for the interruption. Please continue.

Mr Phillips: Thank you, Mr Speaker. I believe that $500 million of public funding going into private schools is a fundamental mistake. Private schools are fine, if they want to fund themselves. I just think that taking public money now and putting it into private schools is a mistake.

I've said many times in the Legislature that the area I represent is very diverse. I represent an area in Toronto, Scarborough-Agincourt, in the northwest part of Scarborough, a great place. It has undergone fundamental change. Over a 30-year period, the composition of that community has changed completely. It has gone through that change with a minimum of problems and a maximum of goodwill, but it has completely changed.

Why has that happened? In my opinion, the major reason—not by any means the only reason—has been our schools. I was at a graduation last week at L'Amoreaux Collegiate, a terrific school. They have flags in that school from 82 countries, representing the countries of origin of the student body there, religions of all sorts and backgrounds of all sorts. I spoke here one day about the Tamil community, a terrific community. The valedictorian two years ago was someone whose background is Tamil, and this year the brother of the young lady who was the valedictorian two years ago was the valedictorian.

I just mention that because for me that school is a metaphor of the value of all our young people coming together and getting to understand each other and the multiplicity of countries and religions and ethnicities. But what's going to happen now in my own area is that there are probably going to be five new high schools opening up as a result, in my opinion, of this plan of funding private schools—five new high schools, and probably end up 12.

Mr John Hastings (Etobicoke North): That's diversity.

Mr Phillips: Mr Hastings says, "That's diversity." You and I have a different view of how we build a cohesive community.

In my view, a key of that is that our young people come together, get to know each other, get to share each other's views. I just have a different vision than Mr Hastings. I understand that you can have yours, but I can have mine. Mine is different than yours. Mine doesn't support this, and mine says it's wrong. I'm prepared to debate that and defend it.

I think it's a fundamental mistake that will have profound and long-term implications for Ontario, recognizing that Ontario will continue, and thank goodness for this, to attract at least 150,000 people from other countries every single year into Ontario. We need that. But if, as they arrive, we simply divide our young people on the basis of, as I say, language or ethnicity or religion, I think it's a mistake. Mr Hastings doesn't. I will choose to disagree. I think it's a fundamental mistake, and that's part of this bill. It is a continuation of the private school funding.

I mentioned earlier what is offensive to many of us, in that this bill amends 27 different acts. It has huge changes for auto insurance, pensions and investor protection. There is this $1.5 billion of tax delays. The $10 million: quietly, and thank goodness for it, it gets rid of that. Remember the $10-million gift to the Blue Jays? That's in this bill. I haven't heard the government mention it. That was the one that was quietly approved by Minister of Finance Ecker, Minister Tsubouchi and Minister Cunningham, the $10 million that for some reason or other was quietly walked around and signed, a gift to the professional teams. That's in this bill—quietly trying to get rid of it. We certainly support that.

It is an omnibus bill. Earlier we talked about pensions. In my opinion, this bill needs to go to committee. It needs to be split out. On the pension one alone, you're going to find, and we're finding, that thousands of pensioners are going to be negatively affected by this. This bill will negatively affect thousands of people, pensioners, who have been laid off by firms. It will not only affect them, but it's retroactive to 1988. It's a matter that was being dealt with through the courts, and suddenly, I gather, the government thought they were going to lose the court battle, so now as I read and understand the legislation—recognize that this bill was introduced a mere few days ago—they will lose their rights and it will have a very substantial impact on them.

I also wanted to mention the municipal financing authority that is a new act. I remember I heard the announcement of $1 billion of government monies going into this. I thought, "That's a lot of money and that's going to be very helpful to municipalities and infrastructure." It's $1 billion going in, not as government funding for infrastructure but money that municipalities can borrow. It's essentially a bank loan. It caught me off guard.

The Premier announced $1 billion to help municipal infrastructure, and the mayors, as I recall, were quite enthusiastic about it. But we find out now it's essentially just a $1-billion loan that the municipalities can borrow against. That's fine, but it's certainly not what it was presented to be.

I want to stress again as we debate the bill, that the government members have focused on auto insurance, investor protection and maybe the pensions. But they've missed the fundamental purpose of this bill—it's a budget bill, after all—and that is to raise taxes by one and a half billion dollars. I say it's to raise taxes because these were tax cuts that were legislated, promised, that the government got elected on.

You will know that the government often says here, "Well, you didn't like those tax cuts." No, we don't like the corporate tax cut; we think it's a mistake. We do not like the $500-million tax break for private schools. And we don't think you can afford your tax cuts.

Well, we've been proven right. The government itself, in its own document that it used at its convention, questions and answers: "How can the government justify breaking the Taxpayer Protection Act?" "Moody's say to meet the target of a fourth balanced budget the government delayed for one year scheduled reductions in a number of tax cuts." So they say, "We had to break the Taxpayer Protection Act. You see what Moody's says. We had to do it to balance the budget." This is the point we've been making with you. You are promising things that you can't deliver.

As an aside, I think we all know the turmoil that the whole province is in because of hydro. The government promised this was going to result in lower rates. We found that it has resulted in dramatically higher rates, with no solution in sight, as far as I can determine, by the government.

So the first point I think the public should be aware of as they watch the debate on this bill is that the government promised you something that they can't deliver. I love the title of this bill. It's called Keeping the Promise. That's what the government called the bill.

Second, they couldn't keep their promise on the Taxpayer Protection Act. I do remember Mr. Eves's debate on this bill. It was, "This is the toughest taxpayer protection in the country. It's going to protect you against tax changes, and it is airtight." What we see—and believe me, I support the delay in the tax cuts. I did not think you could afford them when you announced them; I didn't think you could afford them when you ran. Now we've been proven right. This year, the fiscal year we're in right now, the government has to sell off $1.8 billion worth of assets. They're going to have to sell Hydro One or the provincial savings office or other major assets. For next year, the year that starts April 1, 2003, they've had to delay $1.5 billion worth of tax cuts. Again, I say to people listening out there, look at the document they put out at their own convention that explains why they had to abandon the Taxpayer Protection Act.

I also would say that the debate around corporate taxes—by the way, it isn't as if the US is going to be cutting corporate taxes and they're going to get below us. Virtually every state in the US right now is running deficits. They have to balance their books, so they are using the reserves they've got, but virtually every state in the US is running deficits. The federal US government, as we all know, has gone from quite a significant surplus into a significant deficit position. So why we want to have corporate taxes 25% below the US—first, businesses that would come on that promise will leave on that promise. Second, it is forgone revenue of $5 billion, which is a huge amount of money: $2.2 billion for the province of Ontario. Third, if we want to be a long-term competitive environment economically in this province, we will do it with a totally competitive cost structure. We cannot be out of line on that. We know that; we understand that; we support that. We have to make sure that our business community can compete successfully on the basis of cost. But believe me, businesses will grow here on the basis of the quality and education of the workforce and the quality of our living environment. Part of that is our health care. As I said earlier in my remarks, the average company in Ontario pays $2,500 less for health coverage than in the US.

The other tax measure in here that I believe, rather than delay, should be cancelled is the private school funding. Mr. Flaherty and I will just choose to disagree on this. He thinks it's a good idea and he will run on that platform; I think it's a bad idea and I'll run on that platform. We'll allow the public to make that decision; that's what it's all about. I will do it on this basis, as I said earlier in my remarks: I believe one of the keys to the kind of community that I like to live in is that our young people come together. Our young people come together, first and foremost, in our schools. I am terribly worried, personally, if this is allowed to proceed. I see it in my own community. There are three new high schools being built. There's another public high school that closed that is now being rented out to a community. It is fragmenting on the basis of language, religion or ethnicity. I think that's a fundamental mistake, but that will, I guess, be determined in the election. That's why in this bill we believe that, rather than simply delaying it, it should be cancelled.

I will speak very briefly on two other areas that I find worth pursuing, personally. The bonds area and the tax incentive zones are potentially worth experimentation. On the major elements of this bill that affect me as our party's finance critic, I think the government's making a fundamental mistake in not cancelling the corporate tax cut and not cancelling the private school funding.

I think this bill makes the point for us that we've been making for a long time: you can't afford the promises you've made. And that's not me speaking; that's yourselves speaking. The document you handed out at your own convention points out that you had to break the Taxpayer Protection Act to balance the budget. The next time somebody from that side gets up and says, "Tax cuts generate untold revenue," I'll say, "Wait a minute. This year you had to sell off $1.8 billion of our assets, key crown assets"—

Mr Gerard Kennedy (Parkdale-High Park): It's like selling your car.

Mr Phillips: It's like selling your car to buy your groceries.

Next year you're going to have to delay one and half billion dollars of tax cuts to balance the budget. Isn't that proof that you have made promises that you can't keep, and proof that the tax cut delay was necessary to make sure that you had sufficient revenue coming in?

Finally, before my colleague from Toronto Centre-Rosedale takes over, I say I find it somewhat offensive that this bill being presented is changing 27 acts.

Hon Mr Flaherty: He's not that offensive. He's talking about you.

Mr Phillips: No, Mr Flaherty, I'm talking about the bill, but you're probably not listening. I find the bill offensive, trying to amend 27 acts and create two new acts. I think a wiser move, as far as the public's concerned, is that we should have an opportunity to split this bill up. I suspect that will not happen, but I hope the bill can at least be referred to committee.

Mr Smitherman: As my party's financial institutions critic, it's an honour for me to have a chance to participate in this debate. I say it's an honour because of the role I have, but it's a lousy bill to be talking about. I want to say that my friend the member from Scarborough-Agincourt has done an awfully good job in leading the Liberal reaction to this government omnibus bill, which looks a little more like an ominous bill, in terms of highlighting the extent to which the government is camouflaging so much of their real intent with this bill. It is, in a sense, a little bit of an interesting way to break seven years' worth of rhetoric. Their ironclad pledge to the people of Ontario has, in one fell swoop of the finance minister's pen, been axed. I find it interesting to see the former finance minister, whom one assumes wouldn't have done that had he been in that position, sitting through this debate and from time to time offering pretty much unhelpful interventions. I think it's really important to highlight the extent of what this bill really is.

I want to say that we made the point, and we'll make it repeatedly through the course of this debate, that this bill, as presently constituted, does not provide an effective way to be debated. It deals with too many statutes. We believe it should be broken up, because up-and-down votes on certain matters are a good way to get a real sense of where you're democratically elected people stand. For my part, I sure think it would be appropriate that when the member from Kitchener stands and votes and the member from Etobicoke North stands and votes, they are doing that in a fashion where their constituents can understand that their ironclad pledge around the Taxpayer Protection Act has been decimated, has been eliminated, has been eviscerated to the extent that laws currently on the books in the province of Ontario have to be amended to make their budget legal. I'm looking for some really forthright speeches from those backbenchers, who have no shortage of energy to heckle. It is their government that is, in this bill, breaking perhaps their most significant pledge, repeated ad nauseam, I think it's fair to say, over the course of seven long and lost years. Break it up. Break up this bill so we can watch the up-and-down votes on that.

I'll have a chance on another day when this bill comes back to talk about the intent of the legislation with respect to restoring investor confidence in Ontario. But I want to introduce my comments with a couple of points. Firstly, some of the stuff that's in here is stuff that since 1998 the Toronto Stock Exchange, through the Allen report, has asked three successive Conservative ministers of finance to do something about—five years from the stock exchange responsible for sending a message to the world that this is a capital market that works and can be trusted and can be widely respected. Premier Eves, as Finance Minister, sat on it. Minister Flaherty, as Finance Minister, sat on it. It took this minister to deal with this stuff, only after investor confidence had been lost and billions of dollars had gone in the tank.

That mirrors this government's commitment to the Ontario Securities Commission and its prosecution record. I would say that many people have viewed the Ontario Securities Commission as an organization and an operation that is improving, and I think we should all celebrate that. But as Ontarians, I think we should acknowledge that our prosecution record with respect to white-collar crime in this province is pathetic. We have done an inadequate job of sending the strongest possible message that it is not just the kind of crime conducted by criminals we see every night on television channels, but we also deal with the kind of crimes that bilk people out of their hard-won investments.

In the United States this kind of legislation, coming as it did after the decline in value of people's retirement funds, was a bipartisan effort. We saw, the other night, some changes in the US Senate, but Sarbanes-Oxley came forward in response to the problems in the United States: 99 to 0, support from both sides in the Senate; 423 to 3, representing very strong bipartisan support in the US House; both Houses of the Congress voting almost unanimously in support of legislation designed to restore investor confidence, because it was seen as an issue that was so important to the people whose hard-fought retirement savings were being put at risk.

But instead, we have an approach from this government that continues to place everything in a position where there can be no potential for agreement on a vote because they load the bill up with more hostages. This is their strategy: always a hostage in a bill, making it impossible to gain support on both sides of the aisle.

As a parliamentarian who looks forward to playing a role in helping to send a message to Ontarians that we've learned the lessons and that we're seeking to enhance the protections associated with their hard-fought retirement funds, we have from the government more of the same, more of the partisan kind of bills with 27 different statutes, making it impossible to have this piece of legislation, which talks about investor confidence but is loaded up with so much other stuff, making it impossible for my party to support this bill.

The consumer investor protection is buried. It might have been the name on the backdrop, but the legislation obviously deals with so many other things. As to the public's right to know that their Legislature understood that when Freedom 55 becomes Freedom 75, when it hurts people in the very place they cannot afford it—their retirement funds—this government could get its act together and get support from both sides of the House and send a message that we all looked at it and agreed—no, they won't.

That's why I think we need public hearings, because we need to give the Ontarians who have lost hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars of their retirement funds a chance to look right into the whites of the eyes of the government members and give them an opportunity to ask the hard questions, to analyze what's there, and to make the suggestions.

Bay Street has been consulted; the Crawford report is reflected here. But what about the average person, the consumer investor trying to squirrel away a few bucks to pay Ernie Eves's hydro bills? What about those people? Have they been consulted? No, they haven't, and that's why we think public hearings are an appropriate consideration, that the average person should have a chance to look in the eyes of their legislators and get a sense of confidence from that.

This might be an appropriate time, given the clock, and I look forward to having an opportunity to offer even more substantive comments when this bill is called again for debate.

The Acting Speaker: It now being 6 of the clock, this House will stand adjourned until 6:45 this evening.

The House adjourned at 1758.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Monday 18 November 2002

ASSEMBLÉE LÉGISLATIVE DE L'ONTARIO

Lundi 18 novembre 2002

*The House met at 1330.
Prayers.*

MEMBERS' STATEMENTS

RURAL WATER PROGRAM

Mr Ernie Parsons (Prince Edward-Hastings): This government has a track record of making some very bad decisions, so I would like to tell you about a very good one they made in the spring, which was to implement a program called the tri-county rural water program in Prince Edward-Hastings in Northumberland county.

This would actually implement some of the recommendations from the Walkerton inquiry, improve barnyard drainage, improve surface water protection, move septic tanks and do fuel storage improvements—a wonderful program that would truly protect the groundwater, not just for the farmers but more so for the entire community.

However, in October they took this wonderful decision and they retracted it. After the farmers had spent their money, after they had incurred all of the costs, the minister came back and capped it, saying, “No longer will we do the 50-50 we promised you.” In fact, they had been told that the sooner they started, the better to protect the groundwater. The ministry now says they will not fund anything started before June 28. That’s after the tilling season; that’s after the money had to be spent to buy the equipment and to do the improvements.

It is an absolute betrayal of these farmers in these three counties to renege on an agreement and a commitment that they believed in. This doesn’t improve the quality of life for the farmers; it improves it for everyone in Ontario.

In my community the most valuable thing we own is our name. This good name has been betrayed by the minister with the reneging on this commitment. Speaker, I urge the minister to immediately return to the original commitment made to fund these projects.

LEGISLATIVE INTERNS

Mr John O’Toole (Durham): I rise in the House to pay tribute to the legislative interns for 2002-03, some of whom are working for Ontario MPPs as we speak.

These talented young men and women have recently completed formal studies in universities or colleges.

They are hired each year for a 10-month commitment in different departments across all ministries of the Ontario public service. The interns select the MPPs they wish to work for. Of course, their first responsibility is to assist the member. However, they also have a unique opportunity to observe the political process at first hand. Among their many duties, interns observe the House and its committees. In addition, they attend seminars with elected and legislative officials and senior civil servants, and in fact they work directly on policy development and legislative initiatives.

I’d like to mention at this time Martha Black, who is working in my Queen’s Park office. Martha completed an undergraduate degree at St Francis Xavier University and a master’s degree in political science from Dalhousie University. She has worked in publishing and as a teaching assistant and research assistant, an excellent background for this Legislature. I’d also like to mention former interns who have worked with me: Nathan Fisher, Andrew Owen, Gord Westcott and Lauri Leduc. They have been part of the internship program. It is my privilege to have worked with them during my time in this House.

As well as learning about Ontario public service, interns contribute new and often bright ideas and bring to the workplace an array of skills. I’m confident the Ontario legislative interns will leave the program well equipped for leadership in the public or private sector. I wish everyone in the House to recognize the interns serving our House.

HYDRO DEREGULATION

Ms Caroline Di Cocco (Sarnia-Lambton): The electricity fiasco created by the Harris-Eves gang just never ends. A constituent of mine, Neil, just last week lost his job and has a six-week delay time to receive his unemployment cheque. His wife works and earns minimum wage. Neil’s son is asthmatic and needs a compressor running to help with his breathing. His bill for electricity is now more than he can afford. Last Thursday, he was given notice that his hydro is to be disconnected.

My office called the utility last week to explain the medical situation, and the suggestion from the local utility was that Neil go to five churches, get $100 each and pay his bill, and his hydro would not be shut off.

For the past five years our local utility has been preparing for the electricity market opening. Now these distribution utilities are near bankruptcy themselves because they have millions of dollars of potential unrecoverable expenses.

By the way, over the weekend, Neil went to a number of churches and was given charitable donations adding up to two thirds of his bill. Local utilities such as Bluewater Power are in time becoming charity cases because they are millions of dollars in the red, and in turn local utilities are taking a hard line with people who are unable to pay.

TORONTO TRANSIT COMMISSION

Mr Michael Prue (Beaches-East York): I rise today to talk about the sorry state of the Toronto Transit Commission. In this city, where we pride ourselves on being a world-class city, the Toronto Transit Commission, which carries hundreds of millions of riders every year, is facing a real crisis. The crisis they are facing involves raising the cost by 10 cents per ride. To people thinking that 10 cents isn't all that much, perhaps it isn't, but what is more fearful for all of us who live in this city is that they are saying that this year potentially there could be a 40-cent increase unless there is funding coming from senior levels of government.

As the funds to ride the TTC go up, the ridership goes down, and for all of who live anywhere near the city of Toronto, this is a horrendous thing to happen. We know that gridlock embraces all of us. Even if you live in Mississauga or in Markham or in Durham, gridlock embraces us all. One of the surest ways to get cars off the road is to spend money on transit.

All over North America, cities are provided more funds than we provide to the capital city of this province: Chicago, Atlanta, Montreal, Vancouver—all of them.

It is time to come up with our own urban vision. Surely we have one in the NDP. I invite everyone to come up with an urban vision that will allow us to reduce gridlock and to service the ridership that comes in each of our large cities.

ENERGY CONSERVATION

Ms Marilyn Mushinski (Scarborough Centre): Energy conservation is one of the best ways that citizens can take action to reduce pollutants in our air. By walking to the corner store instead of driving, or turning off lights or appliances in our homes when not needed, each of us can contribute to a cleaner environment now and into the future.

We can make a difference. By acting together, we have a huge positive effect. That is why I am so pleased about the Minister of Energy's announcement of last Wednesday. Let me list some of the government's environmentally friendly initiatives.

Conservation initiatives will be put in place to reduce electricity consumption in the government's own operations by 10%. If government is going to have a moral voice in favour of a cleaner environment, it makes sense that it would lead the way toward energy conservation. The government itself will lead so that fully 20% of the provincial government's electricity usage comes from renewable sources.

Next, the government is creating a Centre of Excellence for Alternative Energy, jointly located at Queen's University in Kingston and the University of Toronto. Its goal will be an Ontario that is the leading North American jurisdiction for research and development of clean energy technologies.

There are more actions being taken to make Ontario an even better place to live, work and raise a family. I am excited by these positive steps and call on the opposition to put their partisanship aside and show strong support for these environmental initiatives.

OHIP BUILDING

Mr John Gerretsen (Kingston and the Islands): For years, many of the employees at the OHIP building in Kingston have suspected that there's something dramatically wrong with the building. Fourteen employees have had breast cancer, 32 others have had other forms of cancer and many employees have suffered a range of other illnesses, including many respiratory ailments.

When governments in the past were unwilling to pay for the testing of the building, OPSEU Local 468 commissioned a study conducted by GeoCor Engineering, a well-respected engineering firm from Kingston, which found coal tar derivatives and some heavy metals in the building, with evidence strongly pointing to a large plume of coal tar underneath the building.

Indeed, there is a possibility that the toxins may have migrated throughout the building's foundations to the rest of the building. However, a comprehensive study, including the complete access to the entire building that was denied to GeoCor, is needed to once and for all determine if there is a link between the contamination and the diseases and to ensure that the people who are working for us in this province do so in a safe and secure environment.

I urge, and indeed demand, that the Ministry of Health without any further delay immediately conduct and fund an independent, third-party study, and furthermore that the government, and through it the owner of the building, fully co-operate with such a study and make its findings immediately public.

Surely everyone is entitled to work and live in a healthy and clean environment. OPSEU Local 468 has led the way, and it's now up to its employer, the Ministry of Health, to conduct the study that's required.

JOHN AND JEANNE PYNN

Mrs Julia Munro (York North): I rise today to talk about a wonderful couple. John and Jeanne Pynn are a husband and wife team that can't slow down, even though they both celebrated their 81st birthdays this year.

Last month, the Pynns became the first couple to be presented with the Ontario Senior Achievement Award by the Lieutenant Governor, James K Bartleman, in a ceremony at Queen's Park. The importance of this is that each of them was being recognized individually; not as a couple with cumulative experience, but rather as individuals who happen to be a great couple.

The Pynns are residents of Sutton, in my riding of York North. They talk about retiring but just don't seem to be able to say no when asked to help with a volunteer job. Their volunteer jobs include a long list of community charities and projects, such as the Georgina food bank. Through her involvement in the food bank, Jeanne teaches young women how to stretch their food dollars and make the most of the food bank offerings. She is also a volunteer with Hospice Georgina.

John Pynn is a founding member of Transit Georgina, which offers transportation to the disabled. John's pet project was arranging a regular super-shopping day where the bus would take people to various businesses where John had managed to arrange for them to have a discount. He also manages to find time to arrange transportation for kidney dialysis patients to York region hospitals.

John and Jeanne are both active participants in Knox United Church. They are also volunteers at the hospice, Meals on Wheels, and both are familiar faces in the landmark Red Barn theatre. What a fantastic couple. Congratulations, Jeanne and John.

HYDRO DEREGULATION

Mr Bruce Crozier (Essex): It used to be that the Premier had an undeserved reputation for competence, but that fairy tale took a very unhappy turn last week. Ernie Eves's bungling of hydro killed any belief that he has a plan, a point or even a purpose for being Premier.

The National Post columnist Andrew Coyne wrote, "I mean this quite literally: voters have no reason to trust a word the Eves government says.... They should be removed—no, hurled—from office, and the sooner the better."

Economist Mark Mullins says, "Ernie Eves' plan would cost $1.9 billion and could be as much as $2.7 billion, much of that coming from taxpayers' pockets, and that's the man who did the costing of the Common Sense Revolution."

Tom Adams of Energy Probe said, "The situation Ernie Eves puts us in this week will almost certainly lead to blackouts and bankruptcies."

And the confidence of Bay Street is shattered. Rebecca MacDonald, the CEO of Energy Savings Income Fund says, "Unfortunately, I didn't know that we have a Premier who's a complete lunatic."

Unfortunately for Ontario, Ernie Eves is simply making up policy on the back of an envelope while he lurches from crisis to crisis. The people of Ontario deserve a more competent Premier with a plan, not Ernie Eves and his wishy-washy, directionless waffling.

STRATFORD CULINARY FESTIVAL

Mr Bert Johnson (Perth-Middlesex): I rise to tell my fellow members of a new initiative by Tourism Stratford to increase tourism beyond the Stratford Festival season. This initiative, the Stratford Culinary Festival, highlights the great restaurants in Stratford. The theme of this year's festival is "Come back." Come back to enjoy the great restaurants, a variety of pre-planned activities and, now that there's snow on the ground, a little Christmas shopping at some of Stratford's unique shops.

The Stratford Culinary Festival has been running for the past two weekends and continues for one more weekend. It is sponsored by the city of Stratford, the Stratford Festival and the Victorian Inn on the Park, as well as other local businesses.

Tourism is Ontario's fifth-largest industry and festival events are an important part of the industry. This government supports three such events through the tourism event marketing partnership program. By means of the program, the Ministry of Tourism and Recreation invested $20,000 in the Stratford Culinary Festival. I want to thank the Minister of Tourism and Recreation for recognizing the importance of such events to the tourism industry. I also want to thank Barb Quarry, manager of Tourism Stratford, for all the work she puts into the success of Stratford's tourism industry.

As Stratford winds up its 50th season, it seems appropriate that another festival will kick off its first season. Maybe 50 years from now someone will be standing here and speaking of the success of the Stratford Culinary Festival's 50th anniversary.

REPORTS BY COMMITTEES

STANDING COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr John Gerretsen (Kingston and the Islands): I beg leave to present the report on the road user safety committee from the standing committee on public accounts and move the adoption of its recommendations.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Does the member wish to make a brief statement?

Mr Gerretsen: Thank you very much. The report contains six recommendations, and just to highlight a couple of them: the Ministry of Transportation should prepare a business case prior to reaching a decision on whether to outsource the provincial driver examination function, and it should assess the costs and benefits during the first year of operation and provide a report to the standing committee.

The ministry should complete the business case for the proposed replacement of the Legacy system and provide the committee with the implementation schedule and its benefits. Finally, the committee felt that the ministry should provide the committee with the key steps taken to improve the contract administration procedures to improve compliance with Management Board Secretariat's consulting services directive. We hope that the ministry will adhere to these recommendations and implement them as soon as possible.

With that, I am pleased to move the adjournment of the debate.

The Speaker: Mr Gerretsen moves the adjournment of the debate. Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion carry? Carried.

VISITORS

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Before we begin with question period, we have with us today in the Speaker's gallery Representative Stephen Buehrer of Ohio, Representative Libby Jacobs of Iowa and Representative Lauren Hager of Michigan. They are members of the Midwestern Legislative Conference and are visiting us on an exchange program. Please join me in welcoming our very special guests.

Mr Howard Hampton (Kenora-Rainy River): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: visiting us today from Alberta we have Raj Pannu, leader of the Alberta NDP, and his daughter Savi Pannu.

Mrs Sandra Pupatello (Windsor West): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: we have a young woman here today from the riding of Windsor West. Her name is Natalie Deschamps and she's here with her father. This young woman actually spent her hard-earned cash at an auction at her school, Holy Names High School, which entitled her to spend the day at Queen's Park with her MPP. She has managed to meet many of you already and has been duly impressed by all those she has met so far. She is hoping to become a young, budding politician herself. One can only hope she would wait until the current MPP retires before she chooses to go forward with that career. Could we please welcome her and her father in the House today.

Hon Chris Stockwell (Minister of the Environment, Government House Leader): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I would seek unanimous consent that this House agree that Sandra give that poor girl her money back.

Hon Dianne Cunningham (Minister of Training, Colleges and Universities, minister responsible for women's issues): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: As long as we're in the mood, I'd like to welcome students from Humber College in the post-diploma public administration program. They're here with their instructor, Elka Walsh.

ORAL QUESTIONS

HYDRO DEREGULATION

Mr Dalton McGuinty (Leader of the Opposition): My questions today are to the Minister of the Energy.

Hydro deregulation in Ontario is dead; it's over. Bay Street knows it; Main Street knows it; everybody seems to know it but you. Minister, why not admit that your bungling, gross incompetence and mismanagement have killed the hydro market now and forever?

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, minister responsible for francophone affairs): The government proposed a plan this past week to try to address the real concerns that a lot of working families in the province of Ontario had, not just with the heavy weight of the bill on their kitchen table but their real concerns and fears for the future as we approach the Christmas holidays and indeed next summer. We certainly make no apologies for standing with working families in the province of Ontario.

Mr McGuinty: That is quite an accomplishment. You must have rehearsed that one in front of the mirror all week, Minister. Well done.

Here's what the National Post had to say about your most recent position: "Mr Eves's blatant politicization of the electricity market ... has erased any chance of developing a private power industry in Ontario: investors simply do not trust it."

Your government has managed to do something which is absolutely extraordinary. This Tory government makes Ontario business nervous. That's quite an accomplishment. Hydro deregulation is dead. The market is dead. Nobody, and I mean nobody, trusts your government any more. You said prices will go down; they went up. You said the debt would go down; the debt is climbing. You said we had all kinds of supply; we're suffering from a desperate shortage of supply.

Instead of wasting time and money trying to resuscitate the hydro corpse, why not admit what everybody knows: deregulation is dead?

Hon Mr Baird: In responding to the real concerns that working families in every region of this province had, we came forth with some real action to address their concern for their high hydro bills on their table and their concern for the future. I think that is incredibly important: that we look at the circumstances of real families in the province of Ontario.

It is important that you come up with a position. The leader of the opposition quotes the National Post. He might want to read the Toronto Star today, where it asks what the Liberal position is. This member was on the radio about 10 days ago. When he was asked what the rebate should be, do you know what he said? He said, "Well, I don't know. I mean, you know. I think you know." Well, the questioner didn't know, so he said, "What kind of rebate would make a difference?" He said, "I don't know. I honestly don't know."

Well, on this side of the House, we know. We're providing substantial assistance to the people in the province of Ontario.

Mr McGuinty: It is simply—

Interjections.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Order, please. The leader of the official opposition has the floor. I apologize to the leader. Continue.

Mr MrGuinty: It is simply too much for us on this side of the House to stomach when this minister stands up and tries to hold himself out somehow as some kind of a defender for the interests of families after we stood on this side for week after week after week and complained about what this government's plan was doing to ordinary families' bills. It is simply too much to stomach.

Minister, I will now ask you again: now that Bay Street recognizes it, now that Main Street recognizes this, now that there is a broad consensus right across the country that this has been one of the most glaring examples of gross mismanagement and incompetence, why not admit it? Deregulation is dead; the market is dead; your experiment has been an abject failure.

Hon Mr Baird: We still have an open market for the generation of wholesale electricity in the province of Ontario and I think that is good news. I'm proud of the fact that Ernie Eves and our government came forward with an action plan to deal with the challenges facing Ontario families, small businesses and farm operators.

If the member opposite wants to talk about price, I'm happy to do that. When asked about price last year, the member said, "Rates may very well have to go up." And what did he say this past week to my good friend the well-known political reporter April Lindgren in the Ottawa Citizen? The first part of the article says, "Electricity prices under an Ontario Liberal government would likely rise."

The people of Ontario have a clear choice. They have a government that can tackle the challenges facing working families, small business people and farm operators, or they can buy into the risky scheme by the Leader of the Opposition. I know which side they'll choose.

HYDRO ONE

Mr Dalton McGuinty (Leader of the Opposition): We'll try the same minister again and see if we have any more success this time around. Minister, now that you're performing Olympian backflips on hydro, let's talk a little bit about Hydro One. You have never made the business case for the sale of any part of Hydro One. During the last three years, it earned a profit in excess of $1 billion. Why would you not keep Hydro One entirely public and use those profits to help keep rates down in Ontario?

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, minister responsible for francophone affairs): Profits from Hydro One on an operational basis certainly provide assistance in dealing with the stranded debt. If the member opposite is against prices in electricity, he might want to call his own brother, Brendan McGuinty. In the city of Ottawa, his boss voted to almost double fixed-rate delivery charges and the local distribution rates and then said, "The devil made me do it." So if he feels as strongly as that, I hope he'll encourage our good mayor in the city of Ottawa to reduce hydro rates by going to a non-profit status.

Mr MrGuinty: I gather it's full steam ahead with respect to the sale of Hydro One. Hydro One is a natural monopoly. It is the central nervous system of the Ontario economy. It earns us a profit. You want to give that profit away the same way you gave the 407 profit away. You find yourselves now in desperate financial circumstances. You want to sell off Hydro One so you can balance the budget. In the end, it's going to be consumers who will continue to pay the price for your mismanagement and bungling. I ask you again: now that you have effectively killed deregulation, why not finish the job and keep all of Hydro One public, where it belongs?

Hon Mr Baird: The member opposite is certainly one to get public policy advice from. Every decision this government makes will be based on what's in the best interests of the people of Ontario, whether they be working families, farm operators or small business people, as we come to terms with dealing with some of the challenges. There are huge infrastructure needs at Hydro One in terms of investments that haven't been made over perhaps the last 20 years as they should have been. I think any policy the government proceeds with will certainly be advantageous for working families.

The member opposite is quoted on Focus Ontario. And what did he say on this natural monopoly? "I am in favour of privatization, both in terms of the transmission and the generation." So I might ask the leader: I've said why I'm in favour of it. Maybe he could tell us why he was in favour of it then too.

Mr MrGuinty: Minister, you want to talk to others about changing position after last week and Monday's performance with that teleprompter inside that home? Give me a break.

There's only a limited amount of time I have in which to put the question, but I'll try to re-cover some of the changes in your position with respect to Hydro One. April 26, 2002: you're going to privatize all of Hydro One. May 2, 2002: no, the privatization is off the table. May 8, 2002: no, it's back on the table. May 30, 2002: you introduce legislation to sell all of Hydro One. June 7, 2002: "No, we're going to go with an income trust." June 13, 2002: "We're going to kill the IPO option." July 6, 2002: "No, what we think we're going to do is settle on selling half of Hydro One."

Minister, I'll ask you again: understanding now that you have effectively killed deregulation in the market with respect to OPG, why not do the right thing and tell us you're going to keep Hydro One entirely in public hands?

Hon Mr Baird: We'll obviously pursue a policy that's in the best interests of people in Ontario. I think that's important when we look at the structure of any sort of arrangement with respect to a strategic partnership that would have benefits for taxpayers, for working families and indeed for everyone in Ontario. The member opposite says, "I've been very consistent with respect to Hydro One. I'm in favour of privatization." Can you explain that, Mr Speaker?

Interjections.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Order. It's getting too noisy in here. New question.

HYDRO DEREGULATION

Mr Howard Hampton (Kenora-Rainy River): My question is for the Minister of Energy. Earlier today, Raj Pannu, leader of the Alberta NDP, came all the way to Toronto to warn Ontario Hydro consumers about your desperate scheme to hide the skyrocketing cost of privatized, deregulated hydro until after the next election. He says your pre-election hydro rebate scheme is the same bribe Ralph Klein used in Alberta. In Alberta, $2.3 billion of the people's money was used to hide the cost of deregulated hydro until after the election. As soon as the election was over, off came the rate caps, off came the hydro rebate.

It cost $2.3 billion to hide the cost of hydro privatization in Alberta. How much of the people's money will it cost you to hide the cost until after the next election in Ontario?

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, minister responsible for francophone affairs): In responding to the real concerns of working families in Ontario, of farm operators in rural Ontario and of small business people, whether they be the drycleaner in North Bay or the shop owner in Toronto, we thought it was important to act decisively and to do the exact opposite of what the member opposite just charged. We believe it was important not just simply to put in a quick fix, Band-Aid solution, but rather some meaningful relief in the medium term while new generation is brought on-line.

To very directly answer the leader of the third party's question, our plan fully balances itself over the next 41 months. I will congratulate the member opposite. He has been consistent on this issue. He is no Howard-come-lately like the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr Hampton: No one believes your line that you can cap hydro rates and provide a rebate and it won't cost the taxpayers of the province anything and it won't cost hydro consumers anything. In Alberta, eight months after the election the hydro rebates disappeared, the rate cap disappeared and people's hydro bills doubled again. Why? Because hydro deregulation and privatization continued there, just as you want to continue it here, just as you want to sell off Hydro One, just as you want to sell off more of the generating stations, just as you want to use billions of dollars of public money to subsidize private for-profit hydro generators.

I think you owe it to the people of Ontario. You're going to hide the costs from them on their hydro bills. How much is it going to cost them in taxes? How much is it going to cost them after the election? Don't try to fool them like Ralph Klein did.

Hon Mr Baird: We now have Howard the Taxfighter leading the third party. I wish he had been so concerned about the bottom line for working families in Ontario when he raised taxes all those times when he was in government.

We've responded to the real concerns of working families in Ontario. The plan fully balances itself over the 41 months of it. Let's look at the bond rating companies. Dominion Bond Rating Service says, "We expect the net impact of this initiative on the province's fiscal balance to be manageable." Standard and Poor's says, "Announced provincial electricity rate cap will have no material impact on Ontario's financial performance."

Mr Hampton: You can keep trotting out that line, but people know that when you're paying the likes of British Energy, Brascan or some of the American profit-driven hydro companies $1,000 a megawatt hour and you only charge $43 a megawatt hour on the hydro bill, it's going to take a lot of taxpayers' money to cover up that subsidization of your profit-driven friends.

Now, you and the Liberals think that rolling out a rebate is going to cover up the cost of privatized, deregulated hydro. It's not. You've already admitted that privatized, deregulated hydro is too painful for people on their hydro bill. Why don't you go the next step and admit that hydro privatization/deregulation is too expensive for people, period, and kill it now?

Hon Mr Baird: The leader of the third party is running around Ontario preaching public power at cost, but his own record speaks for itself. When he was in government, the Hydro debt went up by more than $3 billion in addition to the more than $50 billion that was borrowed to balance the books under his party's regime.

We're taking action by maintaining the market open, by maintaining the market in generation, to try to encourage prices to go down, to try to encourage competition, which we think is in the best interests of the people of the province of Ontario.

There have been some bumps along the road, and that's why we've taken some decisive action with respect to the price for working families, for small business people and for farm operators, because I think that's the right thing to do.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): New question. The Leader of the third party.

Mr Hampton: Minister, you've admitted that privatized, deregulated hydro is far too expensive to allow the price to appear on people's hydro bills. It just seems to me the next logical step is to admit to everybody that this stuff doesn't work, and end it.

Again, let me just point out what happened in Alberta. Immediately after the election, people started to see something new on their hydro bill. It was called a rate rider. When they asked what it was, they were told, "Well, before the election we wouldn't let the private hydro companies jack up the rates. Now we give them a rate rider to make up for what they lost before the election, before the rate cap, before the rebate." In other words, people had to pay twice after the election for the bribe that happened before the election.

I'm asking, Minister, do you really think you can fool the people of Ontario with a before-the-election bribe using their own money, and then jack up the hydro rates on them after the election? Do you really think you can fool them?

Hon Mr Baird: If we had come forward with a plan that was a six-month, quick-fix solution, I think the people of Ontario—working families and small business people around the province—would have seen through that. But Premier Ernie Eves came forward with a really comprehensive initiative to provide some stability for 41 months. I think that's good. It was supplemented by new announcements to encourage supply in the province of Ontario; to promote green, clean and alternative fuels; and probably most importantly, some specific and tangible measures to promote conservation. We think that's sound public policy and the right thing to do.

Mr Hampton: Minister, you and the Liberals talk about a hydro rebate to hide the true cost of deregulated, privatized hydro. You talk about a rate cap until 2006. But you know yourself that the profit-driven producers of hydro that you want to bring into the province will never stand for a rate cap until 2006. You also know it is too expensive. The people out there know it's too expensive.

People want hydro as an essential public service, to be publicly owned and provided on a non-profit basis. They don't want profit-takers, fee-takers, commission-takers, all loaded up on the hydro bill, and they don't want them loading up on a subsidy in the backroom either.

I ask you again, Minister, now that you've admitted that deregulated, privatized hydro is too expensive to show people on their hydro bill, will you admit that it's wrong in principle and stop, cancel, kill hydro privatization and deregulation?

Hon Mr Baird: When there was a non-profit system in the province of Ontario, it cost us $38 billion in debt. That's more than $10,000 for every family in the province of Ontario. For the baby born this morning in Nepean, that's a $3,000 mortgage on their future. Now, I realize that's small change for the leader of the third party, because when he was a member of the executive council of Ontario, they in fact ran up more than $50 billion worth of debt in five short years.

What we're doing is making some responsible decisions to provide some real relief to consumers, small business people and farm operators over the next 41 months. The member opposite in his first question said that private generators were going to continue to get a market price and in his second question said they're not. Which is right, the first or the second?

TENANT PROTECTION

Mr Dalton McGuinty (Leader of the Opposition): My question is to the Minister of Housing. Tenants across Ontario are worried that your government's bungling of hydro is going to lead to even further rent increases, and they have every reason to worry because of what happened in the case of natural gas. I'm sure you'll understand, Minister, that when gas prices spiked, landlords applied for and obtained rent increases, and when the price of natural gas came down, tenants didn't see their rent go down, because under your system tenants are forced to pay temporary utility cost increases forever.

Tenants are now worried that the same thing is going to happen with respect to hydro. The rent is going to go up, landlords are going to get the benefit of the rebate, but the tenants will still have to pay the increase. Will you issue a directive today to ensure that no Ontario tenant will experience a rent increase because of your government's mismanagement of hydro?

Hon Chris Hodgson (Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing): It's a hydro issue, and I know the minister wants to talk about that.

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, minister responsible for francophone affairs): The announcement the Premier made brings rates back, almost retroactively, to what consumers have been paying, to 4.3 cents. That's where they were before the market opening. Therefore, obviously with respect to the commodity portion of the bill there's no rate increase. It can't be clearer than that.

Mr McGuinty: Minister, it's a fairly straightforward question. Let me just say at the outset that it's really a sad commentary that the minister responsible for housing, the defender of tenants in that government, has fully abdicated his responsibility and turned this over to you.

Interjection.

Mr McGuinty: Apparently he wants to answer the question now, Speaker. Perhaps the minister will refer it back to him. But since he's refusing to do so, I'll go back to the Minister of Energy.

It's a fairly straightforward question: will you assure us that the legislation, which you're apparently still drafting on the back of an envelope, will protect all tenants from any rent increase attributable to your government's mismanagement and gross incompetence on the hydro file?

Hon Mr Baird: The relief we came forward with, that the Premier announced a week ago today in the province of Ontario, is substantive in its relief, retroactive to May 1, and I think that's important. We stepped up to take significant action to protect tenants, homeowners, small business people and farm operators right across Ontario. For those tenants where it's included, it's self-evident that the price of the commodity hasn't gone up.

We've looked at it and dealt with it retroactively. Maybe the leader would like to return the cheques for the $350 Bay Street fundraiser he had when he was a big promoter of deregulation. Wouldn't that be the right thing to do?

NORTHERN ONTARIO ECONOMY

Mr AL McDonald (Nipissing): My question is for the Minister of Northern Development and Mines. Over the past few weeks, I and several members have risen in our places to ask questions about economic activity in the north. Today, I'd like to focus on recent announcements made by Weyerhaeuser in Sturgeon Falls and Tembec in Mattawa that are not in line with my or this government's vision of a strong, prosperous northern Ontario. Minister, could you please inform everyone what your ministry is doing to boost economic activity in northern Ontario?

Hon Jim Wilson (Minister of Northern Development and Mines): We at the ministry take very seriously the challenge to improve economic conditions in the north. We believe in a healthy, competitive and sustainable northern economy, which combines and builds upon the strengths of our resource sectors with the emerging opportunities of a knowledge-based economy.

The Minister of Finance just finished putting out expressions of interest for tax incentive zones for rural and northern Ontario. There will be six pilot projects. Also, the government has announced that we'll be introducing opportunity bonds, allowing municipalities to build and rebuild their infrastructure at lower cost. We've doubled the northern Ontario heritage fund, which is our big economic engine for the north, to $60 million a year. In fact, since October 1996, the government, through the heritage fund, has created about 15,650 jobs in the north.

Finally, to help northern economic development we've spent a record $1.6 billion on northern highway infrastructure in the north.

Mr McDonald: Thank you, Minister. I know from talking to a lot of northern Ontarians that they appreciate your dedication and the good work our government is doing on their behalf. They do appreciate the effort this government is making on northern Ontario.

However, the residents of west Nipissing were especially hard hit by the announcement that Weyerhaeuser will be closing their facility there. I know that you travelled to Sturgeon Falls, Minister, with some important news. Could you please share that with us?

Hon Mr Wilson: On November 7, I did travel to Sturgeon Falls in west Nipissing. First, though, I want to commend the honourable member. AL McDonald was the first member of this Legislature, the first MPP, to express his concern with the announcement to close the Weyerhaeuser plant. West Nipissing is not his riding, but he did offer, on behalf of the government and the people of this Legislature, all of our assistance.

On November 7, I announced a new northern Ontario heritage fund project. West Nipissing-Sturgeon Falls will be eligible for an unlimited number of projects. For each one, we will pay 75% or $5 million per project, an unlimited number of projects, to help that community get back on its feet. It's money well spent. It's northerners' money. It will be spent on bringing Sturgeon Falls-west Nipissing back to better than it was before.

HYDRO DEREGULATION

Mr Michael Bryant (St Paul's): My question is to the Minister of Energy. Minister, will you stand in your place today and tell us that you have full and unqualified confidence in the chair and CEO of Ontario Power Generation?

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, minister responsible for francophone affairs): In fact, there's a chair and a CEO. They're two different people.

Mr Bryant: That's a ringing endorsement. Who said this of Mr Osborne and Mr Farlinger? Who said that we had the best possible management and the best possible chair of OPG? Who said that? You said that, the Minister of Energy, now the member for Simcoe-Grey. Who appointed the current chair and CEO of Ontario Power Generation? Did we do that? Did Eleanor Clitheroe do that? Did Floyd Laughren do that? No, you did that. Who appointed the CEO, for that matter, of Ontario Hydro One? Did we do that, did Floyd Laughren, did the people? No. You did that. Who's paying them $2 million a year, the head of your Hydro Hydra? Who's doing that? You're doing that. You're trying to point fingers. First it's Mother Nature, then it's Clitheroe, then it's Floyd Laughren. Now it's Osborne; then it's Farlinger. Who's to blame for the shipwrecking of the Hydro Hydra? You are, the Harris-Eves government, who destroyed the electricity system in the province of Ontario.

Hon Mr Baird: I didn't hear a question there, but it was a good theatrical performance.

JUNO BEACH CENTRE

Ms Marilyn Mushinski (Scarborough Centre): My question is for the Minister of Culture. Minister, I understand that on November 7, Premier Eves announced this government's support in the amount of $1 million for the Juno Beach Centre in Normandy, France. With the support of this government, I understand that the Juno Beach Centre is now $7 million closer to their $8.1-million goal. The centre is scheduled to open on June 6, 2003, June 6 representing the date in 1944 when over 21,000 Canadian soldiers stormed the beach code-named Juno in the small fishing port of Courseulles-sur-Mer. Three hundred and forty Canadians gave their lives, 574 were wounded, and 47 were taken prisoner.

Minister, could you please tell this House what the Juno Beach Centre will mean to the people of this province?

Hon David H. Tsubouchi (Chair of the Management Board of Cabinet, Minister of Culture): First of all, I want to thank the member of Scarborough Centre for the question. I was pleased to be at the announcement, along with Premier Eves and Minister Runciman, which was also attended by many of the veterans, the men and women who have served this country so well.

There are certain times in history which are defining moments for our country. In World War I it was Vimy Ridge, and in World War II it was Juno Beach. This is where our troops gained the recognition that they really needed to have. The Juno Beach Centre will be more than just a memorial; it's a memorial honouring Canadian veterans of World War II, and it will be a memorial museum as well.

I want to congratulate, in particular, Garth Webb, who is the president of the Juno Beach Association. I'd also like to mention Don Kerr, whom I've met, who is a volunteer and veteran who strongly believed in Juno Beach and brought this idea to my attention, through our member John O'Toole. These are the people who really served our country; it's important for us to recognize that, and that's why we're all very pleased to support this wonderful project.

Ms Mushinski: Thank you for that response, Minister. I also understand that the Juno Beach Association asked our government for a $250,000 contribution and that Premier Eves in fact contributed $1 million. I am sure this came as a very pleasant surprise to all who were present. The Juno Beach Centre is designed to honour Canadian men and women, and the people of the province of Ontario, who gave their lives in the fight for freedom.

I spent November 11 representing the province of Ontario at the Remembrance Day ceremony at the Toronto Zoo. I also spoke at the local Scarborough Royal Canadian Legion "Dambusters" branch 617 about Canada's extraordinary wartime effort, unparalleled by any other country. Could you please tell this House why we should continue to invest in Canada's military past?

Hon Mr Tsubouchi: I thank the member again, but the question shouldn't be, "Why should we?" The question should really be, "How could we not participate in a very important project?"

The Premier also announced that we now have a commitment to build a war memorial on the grounds of Queen's Park. I think it will serve the people of Ontario quite well. These were ordinary Canadians, my neighbours and your neighbours, ordinary men and women who served selflessly; people like Wayne Baker, a paratrooper who was dropped off behind enemy lines as an advance scout; Margaret Ackroyd, who was with us at the announcement, who joined the Canadian Army Show in 1943 and entertained the troops until 1946 and is still very active giving the stories of World War II to children across this province; Art Underwood, who was wounded in action; and Jack Harris, who just passed away at the age of 90, who was decorated for saving his tank crew.

These are the men and women for whom I am very proud to stand here today, as are all of us, and say we support the Juno Beach project to support our veterans and thank them very much.

HYDRO DEREGULATION

Mr Howard Hampton (Kenora-Rainy River): My question is again for the Minister of Energy. This week-end, your government launched yet another television advertising propaganda campaign, this time trying to convince people that the skyrocketing cost of hydro that has been privatized and deregulated is going to disappear, trying to hide it from the public. It's bad enough that you refuse to kill hydro privatization and deregulation; it's bad enough that you're going to use billions of dollars of taxpayers' money to subsidize private, profit-driven hydro companies in the backroom, but to top it all off, you're going to use the public's money on another propaganda campaign to promote your pre-election bribe.

We called your officials in the Ministry of Energy and asked them the cost of this propaganda advertising campaign. They refused to answer. Perhaps you can tell the people of Ontario now how much of their own money you are going to try to use to convince them of this pre-election bribe.

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, minister responsible for francophone affairs): It may come as a surprise to the member opposite that I don't share his characterization. What we're doing is responding to the real concerns that a lot of working families have, not just about the high cost of the electricity bill on their kitchen table but the fear that they have for the future. The government has heard that concern, and we're responding with specific proposals and legislative measures. We think it's responsible to report back to the people we serve on this important issue.

Mr Hampton: Last spring you spent $2.3 million on a propaganda campaign telling people that deregulated hydro was going to cost them less, that it was going to be good for them. Now it looks like you're going to spend $2.3 million trying to hide the cost of privatized deregulated hydro, trying to tell people the bogeyman won't get them. Minister, if you spent $2.3 million trying to tell people that it's good for them last spring and you're going to spend $2.3 million trying to hide the skyrocketing hydro bills now, why don't you just admit it doesn't work, that it's a rip-off for consumers, and kill hydro privatization and deregulation? Why don't you do it now?

Hon Mr Baird: Again, it won't come as a surprise to the member opposite that we believe in an open, competitive market in the generation of electricity in Ontario. We've maintained the market and the wholesale aspect to try to encourage more generation. It was a better option than continuing to pile on debt at the old beast of Ontario Hydro. I say to the leader of the third party that that Hydro debt, the beast created by successive governments, isn't dead. That's why we've had to take some pretty solid action to try to deal with the challenges facing our electricity system.

We've had the courage to embrace that. While I've been disappointed that we haven't had the support of the leader of the third party, it warms my heart that all Liberal MPPs who were present for the voting on Bill 35 stood up and voted for it when we did it, on principle.

CONSUMER PROTECTION

Mr John O'Toole (Durham): My question is to the Minister of Consumer and Business Services. Minister, as you probably know, and I'm sure you do, later this afternoon we're debating modernizing Ontario's consumer protection legislation. You've actually taken some very bold initiatives in this legislation. One that attracted me was the capping of variations to written estimates for things like home repairs. That's just one. It also requires goods bought on the net to be delivered within 30 days or the contract is void. Also, there is the banning of negative option billing. I commend you for these initiatives, great new proposals to have in place. I know your ministry has a great track record of shutting down bad operators. Minister, will this new legislation beef up the penalties—that's the question—against these bad guys in the marketplace?

Hon Tim Hudak (Minister of Consumer and Business Services): I appreciate the member's question. He's right. Before the House for debate later on is Bill 180 for CP21, consumer protection for the 21st century, the biggest overhaul to help protect consumers against scam artists in the last 30 or 40 years.

The member makes a good point. This ministry has had great success in terms of flushing out bad operators and stamping out consumer deception. For example, in the past year or two years, 1,000 charges have been brought forward with over $1 million in fines that have been allocated, and over $2 million in restitution has been returned to consumers who have been ripped off by scam artists.

The proposed legislation, if passed, would help to double the fines for individuals and for corporations, and jail times would be boosted to the maximum of two years less a day, the provincial maximum. Finally, we are also increasing the standard limitation period to two years to allow our prosecutors more opportunity to go after the bad guys and to put them out of business.

Mr O'Toole: Thank you for that information, Minister. I'll be pleased to share it with my constituents. I was very pleased to see that the Ernie Eves government and yourself are strongly committed to curbing consumer scams. Your proposed new legislation will be protecting consumers in areas where so far there is no consumer protection law, specifically in the Internet area.

I can tell that you are working for families, not just in my riding of Durham but across Ontario. They're jumping on the Internet quickly, as I'm sure you know, Minister. I can hardly not use this opportunity to recognize the important work done by Durham Regional Police Sergeant Ken Anderson as well as Detective Constable John Bradley, who is an investigator in the computer crime area in my riding of Durham.

I know the proposed legislation will protect on-line consumer competition, but Minister, how would your proposed legislation protect Ontarians who are dealing with companies in different parts of the country, indeed different parts of the world?

Hon Mr Hudak: The member raises an excellent question. We want to make sure that people who are jumping on-line for transactions, and doing so increasingly, can do that with increased confidence in the laws that back up the system. We want to take those rogues who are lurking on the Internet and reinforce confidence in this industry.

We have worked with the other provinces for a harmonization agreement that would apply across Canada. For example, a 30-day rule for delivery of a good or service when contracted for would be reinforced by our legislation, CP21, if passed, and would apply through harmonization to all such agreements across Canada.

Similarly, we want to work with operators across North America and throughout the world in harmonizing these rules where possible, so people will have confidence when making a transaction across the Internet. We want to make sure that Ontario is a much less attractive jurisdiction for scam artists and more attractive for on-line e-commerce.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): I apologize; I did miss the rotation. It will equal out. We'll do two Liberal questions. I went to the wrong side, even though it said it here.

DIAGNOSTIC SERVICES

Mrs Sandra Pupatello (Windsor West): My question is for the Minister of Health. On Thursday after midnight you released your press release that announced private MRIs and private CTs coming to Ontario and that you would have requests for proposals from several communities to open private MRIs and CTs, what we believe is a two-tier health care system.

I would like the Minister of Health to tell the community of Huntsville—this is a community whose hospital has made a submission to you for permission to have a CT scanner. Those people have been waiting for an answer. They know they're responsible for raising the money to purchase the equipment. You've ignored that proposal, but you've gone forward to include Huntsville as a potential community for a private CT. Could you please explain to that community why you are so bent ideologically to the private sector when the hospital is waiting and begging for a CT?

Hon Tony Clement (Minister of Health and Long-Term Care): It will come as no surprise to this chamber that I take issue with pretty well everything the honourable member said in her characterization of this initiative to bring greater accessibility to diagnostic services to the people of Ontario.

First of all, she should know that this initiative was originally signalled in the throne speech of this government, in the budget of the Minister of Finance and by me in July. If the honourable member didn't take time to pay attention, perhaps she's the only one who is surprised.

She insists that this is two-tier medicine. Nothing could be further from the truth. This is about accessibility, using your OHIP card, to publicly financed universally accessible services—greater accessibility to diagnostic services throughout the province of Ontario, yes, in stand-alone clinics. We make no apology for the fact that we rely on stand-alone clinics as well as hospitals to deliver excellent services. We announced three MRIs and a previous CT as part of our initiative in advanced diagnostics. We are providing that in hospitals, throughout our community—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): I'm afraid the minister's time is up.

Mrs Papatello: Minister, based on your answer I'm going to presume that what you said in July still holds true. What the Minister of Health said in July is that people can pay cash for a CT or an MRI. That's what you said in July. When you were pushed by journalists to answer that question, you said, "Yes, people can pay cash." What you're saying today and in your press release is that suddenly you've changed your mind on that tack. The point is that you are not to be believed. All the things you say one week no longer hold true the next week. Hydro is a perfect example of that.

What you said last July was that people would pay cash in a private system. What we know is that there are a host of communities who have asked for permission from you, who know they have to raise money for an MRI or a CT. Those communities include Belleville, Chatham, parts of Ottawa, Cornwall, Hamilton and Etobicoke. What I'm asking this minister is, how can you ignore those submissions that are already on your desk asking for approval when they have to raise the money for the machines? You've ignored them and you've gone to other communities to announce private MRIs and CTs. What rationale could you possibly have—

The Speaker: I'm afraid the member's time is up.

Hon Mr Clement: The honourable member is confused. The honourable member should have checked very carefully the notes on the July announcement. The issue was queue-jumping, and I made it very clear that queue-jumping will not be allowed in the province of Ontario. We have stricter rules than anywhere else in Canada, and we are proud of that fact.

If the issue is uninsured services, our emphasis is on insurance services, but just as in a hospital right now you can get an uninsured service, that is the case in stand-alone clinics as well. If the honourable member has a problem with stand-alone clinics, she should stand in her place right now and say that the Liberal Party of Ontario is against stand-alone clinics. Perhaps she's against the Diagnostics Imaging Associates located at 600 Tecumseh Road East in Windsor. Perhaps she's against the Essex X-Ray Ultrasound & Mammography clinic at 2462 Howard Avenue, Windsor. Perhaps she's against the Windsor Radiological Associates clinic at 410 Giles Boulevard East in Windsor.

You stand in your place and say you're against stand-alone clinics and the Liberal Party is against them. You stand in your place and say you're against increased accessibility. You do that, and then we'll have the debate.

Applause.

PENSION LEGISLATION

Mr George Smitherman (Toronto Centre-Rosedale): I was pretending the applause was for me, Mr Speaker.

My question is to the Minister of Finance and it concerns provisions of Bill 198 which include significant amendments to pension law in this province. If passed, this bill will be retroactive to 1988, wipe out current, pending cases, overrule pension agreements and remove rights of appeal to the courts. Perhaps most incredibly, it sets Ontario apart as a jurisdiction—because you can't do this in the United States of America—where CEOs will be encouraged to raid any pension fund where an actuary's report might indicate that a surplus exists.

Madam Minister, how is it that you could use a bill designed to restore investor confidence to rob employees of their rights and to encourage pension fund raiding through the introduction of the Conrad Black clause?

Hon Janet Ecker (Minister of Finance): I really suggest that Liberal research needs to hire somebody with a little bit of expertise in reading legislation, in reading policies and understanding pensions, because the legislation that he cites in this House does not interfere with court cases; it does not take away pensioners' rights; it does not allow employers to raid pension funds. For the honourable member to suggest this is being—well, I would like to stay polite, so I won't say what I think it is, but it is fearmongering at its best.

Mr Smitherman: Madam Minister, if you're so confident in your analysis, agree today, before this Legislature, to put this bill out to public hearings and let Ontarians have this debate, because a very clear reading of section 79.1 clearly indicates that an actuary's report will allow corporate raiding of surplus pension funds. Won't you agree that since 1988, when the member from York stood and introduced legislation, both employers and employees have been involved in the discussion around matters relating to pension windup? Those employee rates in this legislation, under the provisions that you've introduced, are eviscerated.

Will you put this out for public hearings? If you're confident in the positions that you take, put this out for public hearings.

Hon Mrs Ecker: Again, where has the honourable member been? There has been public consultation on this. As a matter of fact, we put out a discussion paper and invited all stakeholders to participate. We announced in the budget that we were going to be proceeding, and then do you know what we did? We did more consultations.

Interjections.

Hon Mrs Ecker: He asked the question and now he doesn't want to hear the answer. There has been considerable public consultation on this. There is nothing in this legislation that takes away the rights of pensioners or interferes with the rights of pensioners or their earned benefits. In fact, what this legislation does is ensure that the pensions are respected, to ensure the financial solvency of pensions, to make sure that the money is there when a pensioner needs it. That is the pre-eminent goal of the legislative amendments we've brought forward.

SURFACE WATER MONITORING CENTRE

Mr Bert Johnson (Perth-Middlesex): My question is for the hard-working Minister of Natural Resources, the Honourable Jerry Ouellette, from Oshawa.

Minister, as you know, my riding of Perth-Middlesex has a large agricultural component. That's why I was very interested to hear your recent announcement about a new centre that will help predict and minimize the potential impact of floods and droughts in the province of Ontario. As we all know, information on flood and drought situations is extremely important. Would you please explain to us here today how this centre will work?

Hon Jerry J. Ouellette (Minister of Natural Resources): I thank the member from Perth-Middlesex for the question. Last month, as the member mentioned, I was happy to announce on behalf of the government the creation of the Surface Water Monitoring Centre. This centre will assist in the predicting and informing people of flood and drought conditions throughout the province. The monitoring program is based on over 400 gauges located throughout the province. These gauges will measure the amount of water flow in the rivers and streams as well as the water levels in lakes. The equipment will also record climate data such as precipitation and temperature.

As well, I am happy that we are able to move forward with partnerships with the Ministry of the Environment and the conservation authorities to provide this program.

Mr Johnson: Thanks very much for that answer, because we have heard a lot of misinformation about the number of gauges and testing stations in rivers and streams in Ontario.

As you'll recall, a couple of years ago in July, there was a devastating flood in my riding and the one next to it. It started at Brucefield and came down through Exeter, Woodstock, London and so on. It had a devastating effect by flooding thousands and thousands of good fields of crops, and it left livestock situations that were totally intolerable, with too much water.

I have heard that this new centre will be a consolidation of two old—

Interjections.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Order, members. The member has a sore throat. Could we keep it down, please? It's difficult for him.

Sorry, member for Perth-Middlesex.

Mr Johnson: Minister, it will be a fantastic advantage having the staff in one location, but what will the other benefits of this consolidation be?

Hon Mr Ouellette: I thank the member again for the question. Yes, there are over 400 gauges located on streams, rivers and lakes throughout the province. The centre, to be located in Peterborough, will bring together the drought experts along with the flood experts. Bringing these experts together maximizes their expertise for more informed decisions to help reduce the risks to both people and property. Increased public safety is the main motivation. As mentioned, this would assist with a quicker response and would aid communities such as the member's in situations that deal with floods, as he mentioned earlier on.

The MNR plays a very important and lead role in forecasting floods and droughts for the province, and in the protection of life, I might add. The centre will certainly expand those abilities here in the province of Ontario.

FUNDRAISING

Mr Tony Martin (Sault Ste Marie): My question is for the Minister of Consumer and Business Services. Minister, the alcohol and gaming commission is wreaking havoc on local fundraising efforts in my city, Sault Ste Marie. Organizations like the Marconi Club, the Elks, the Legion and many others are being told that the way they have always raised money to support community events can no longer happen. They are being denied lottery licences they have always gotten, and they are unable to pay their own expenses from the small amount of money raised. This means they can no longer fund community activities such as minor hockey and the local band that plays in hospitals for sick kids. Some are faced with closing their doors.

Minister, what are you going to do immediately to ensure that our local clubs can still conduct the small fundraising events that we've all always relied on?

Hon Tim Hudak (Minister of Consumer and Business Services): I appreciate the question of the member from Sault Ste Marie. I think certainly all of us in the Legislative Assembly understand the important role charities play in helping to support vulnerable citizens or other good causes in communities, whether it's Sault Ste Marie, Fort Erie or Beamsville.

With respect to the issue of legalized gaming—obviously a very important and sensitive issue, something that's governed by the Criminal Code as well as the alcohol and gaming control commission in the province of Ontario—we want to make sure that we can help support charities and work within the law. If the member has some particular concerns, I would be pleased if he sent them over to me here in the assembly, and I can ensure that they get the proper attention.

Mr Martin: As a matter of fact, I have a number of, I think, really good suggestions. I'd like to meet with you within the next week or two to talk about those, if you would agree.

Our local clubs and groups do not want to have to rely on outside fundraisers that keep up to 80% of the money they raise for themselves. They want to raise money from the local community and spend it in the local community. But the way this government is enforcing the rules makes that impossible. We need to be empowering these local groups, not cutting off their lifeline.

Your government takes such pride in cutting red tape, but you are choking off these groups with that same red tape. The current rules aren't working and they need to be changed.

Will you promise today to conduct a review of the criteria for issuing lottery licences to ensure that the small charitable organizations can fundraise and continue to provide essential services to the community?

Hon Mr Hudak: Certainly this government, the Ernie Eves government, takes great pride in eliminating red tape to help support job creation, in fact record job creation across the province of Ontario, and similarly, cutting red tape to help empower charitable groups in their important purposes.

Obviously when it comes to gaming regulations, we want to make sure that we maintain the integrity of the gaming and comply with Criminal Code law with respect to gambling enterprises. That having been said, I'd be very pleased to discuss with the member a meeting he wants to set up. In fact, I'm here both this afternoon and this evening if he wants to come over. We could talk about it and I could look into the specifics of the concerns he has brought forward on behalf of the community of Sault Ste Marie.

OHIP BUILDING

Mr John Gerretsen (Kingston and the Islands): My question is to the Minister of Health and Long-Term Care. Minister, you know there's a very serious health concern with respect to the OHIP building in Kingston. This matter has been like that for at least the last 10 years or so. As a matter of fact, there have been statements made that up to 14 employees who have worked in the building have suffered from breast cancer, and another 32 individuals suffer from other forms of cancer.

A recent study that was conducted by OPSEU Local 468 clearly indicates that there's a problem with respect to coal tar residue beneath the foundation of the building. The union has gone to the lengths of getting the study done. It clearly indicates that there's been a problem there for the last 15 to 20 years.

Minister, will you now do the right thing and completely fund an independent, third-party study so that we can once and for all get to the bottom of this, and also give us your commitment here today that when that study is done and completed, it will be released to the public so it can give a certain amount of surety and safety to the people who work in that building?

Hon Tony Clement (Minister of Health and Long-Term Care): Yes, I believe the Chair of the Management Board can answer that question.

Hon David H. Tsubouchi (Chair of the Management Board of Cabinet, Minister of Culture): First of all, I must say that all of us are concerned about the health and safety of any of our workers. Having said that, I will say this, that the Ontario Realty Corp is currently in the process of retaining a reputable consultant to conduct the testing required in the facility. It is important for us to complete this testing. It's of an urgent nature for all the employees there, and we certainly consider it that as well.

Mr Gerretsen: I appreciate that, and I hope we will actually see that happen, because there's been a concern of the employees there for quite a considerable period of time.

As you know, you no longer own the building. The building is owned by a third party. Although you are responsible still for the environmental situation that existed there at the time the building was sold, there are major concerns that the owner of the building will not give you access to the building, so that in effect the tests that GeoCor, which is a very reputable Kingston engineering firm that did the study for Local 468 but were not able to get into the building—that you once again, or whoever does the study, may be denied access to the building to do the necessary test hole drilling in the foundation of the building to determine exactly what the status is.

This is a major concern, Minister. I hope that you will not put this out for a further study but that you will actually get to it and agree today to fund the study and make it public once the study has been completed.

Hon Mr Tsubouchi: First of all, if I could say, the Ministry of the Environment has been asked to participate in the investigation, and the Ministry of Labour as well, so we're making sure that all the bases are covered with this particular area.

The studies, which will be done by ORC, would be shared with the joint health and safety committee. So that's important for the member to know as well.

If I could give some assurances, certainly this has occurred before in the past, as the member knows, that other studies have been done. In fact, the last one was done as recently as—I believe the testing results were received in January of this year, earlier on, which indicated that there were no air quality concerns at the time.

However, I'll say that when the concerns are raised again, it's important for us to give that assurance to our employees that we have committed to conduct another study to make sure their working conditions are safe. It's important for us over here, and that's why we, along with the Minister of the Environment and Minister of Labour, have committed to do these studies to give that assurance, because they are our employees.

PETITIONS

CITY OF WINDSOR ADMINISTRATION

Mr Dwight Duncan (Windsor-St Clair): Last week, I was presented with a petition by Mr Al Nelman and 2,500 other citizens of our community of Windsor, which reads as follows:

"Whereas the citizens of Windsor, Ontario, have seen the greatest period of sustained growth and resulting prosperity in the city's history;

"Whereas the citizens of Windsor, Ontario, have been presented with a plan which acknowledges a debt of $225 million by the year 2005;

"Whereas city council has been unable to control the city's administration, leading to unauthorized multi-million-dollar contracts;

"Whereas the mayor and a majority of councillors have failed to provide communal services and infrastructure maintenance efficiently and at the lowest possible cost;

"Whereas the mayor and city council have been reckless in the use of land expropriation, leading to the loss of millions of tax dollars;

"Whereas city council has used in camera meetings to excess, thereby depriving the citizens of Windsor of important public information;

"Whereas city council has arbitrarily reduced public meetings from weekly to biweekly, coupled with a five-minute limit for delegates to make a presentation drastically reducing public scrutiny and input;

"Whereas city council continues to enter into further unmandated risky commercial undertakings, the pursuit of which continues to divert tax dollars from necessary expenditures;

"Whereas there have been cases of criminal behaviour by members of the administrative staff which have been dealt with under a cloak of secrecy, denying citizens their right to know the extent of the damage they have sustained;

"Whereas taxpayers in the city of Toronto have benefited from a forensic audit, the taxpayers of the city of Windsor believe that an arm's-length investigation is essential;

"Whereas a significant number of the citizens of Windsor no longer trust city council to take care of their interests;

"We, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario as follows:

"Request the Minister of Municipal Affairs to immediately undertake a forensic audit of the city of Windsor's finances and administrative procedures."

I table this on behalf of Mr Nelman and 2,500 other citizens of Windsor.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION FUNDING

Mr Bob Wood (London West): I have a petition given to me by the University of Western Ontario's Society of Graduate Students and signed by 582 people. It asks the Legislature to "freeze tuition fees for all programs at their current levels and take steps to reduce the tuition fees of all graduate programs, post-diploma programs and professional programs for which tuition fees have been deregulated since 1998."

GOVERNMENT OFFICES IN BRANT

Mr Dave Levac (Brant): I have a petition to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario, signed by well over 1,000 people.

"Whereas Brantford is a community of more than 89,000 people, and combined with the community of Brant county, the population exceeds 110,000; and

"Whereas the business community of Brantford and Brant county warrant and deserve the service they have come to expect from the Ministry of Finance Brantford district tax office; and

"Whereas the Mississauga regional tax office continuing business plan strategic priority number one is building a customer-centred public service that provides service when, how and where the customers want it;

"We, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario as follows:

"We would like to propose that not only should the location and services offered by the Ministry of Finance be kept in Brantford, but they should be expanded to include a much-needed permanent location authorized to issue health cards by exploring the following alternatives: (1) maintain the status quo at 213 King George Road in Brantford; (2) relocate to 10 Fairview Drive, former OPP station in Brantford" owned by the government; "(3) build a new office in a central location; (4) investigate available vacant buildings that would be suitable" for the proper process of multi-government offices.

I sign this and support our constituents in Brant.

LONG-TERM CARE

Mr James J. Bradley (St Catharines): This petition is to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario.

"Whereas the Eves government has increased the fees paid by seniors and the most vulnerable living in long-term-care facilities by 15% over three years or $3.02 per diem in the first year, $2 in the second year and $2 in the third year, effective September 1, 2002; and

"Whereas this fee increase will cost seniors and our most vulnerable more than $200 a month after three years; and

"Whereas this increase is above the rent increase guidelines for tenants in the province of Ontario for the year 2002; and

"Whereas the long-term-care funding partnership has been based on government accepting the responsibility to fund the care and services that residents need; and

"Whereas government needs to increase long-term-care operating funding by $750 million over the next three years to raise the level of service for Ontario's long-term-care residents to those in Saskatchewan back in 1999; and

"Whereas this province has been built by seniors who should be able to live out their lives with dignity, respect and in comfort in this province;

"We, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario as follows:

"Demand that Premier Eves reduce the 15% increase over three years in accommodation costs to no more than the cost-of-living increase annually and that the provincial government provide adequate funding for nursing and personal care to a level that is at least at the average standard for nursing and personal care in those 10 jurisdictions included in the government's own study."

I affix my signature. I'm in complete agreement.

COMPETITIVE ELECTRICITY MARKET

Mr Tony Ruprecht (Davenport): I have a petition on the electricity increases in Ontario. The petition reads as follows:

"Whereas the Ernie Eves Conservative government has legislated the opening of the Ontario electricity market as of May 1, 2002, and the price per kilowatt hour for electricity in the province of Ontario has nearly quadrupled since May 1; and

"Whereas Ernie Eves has done a poor job in educating the public as to the ramifications of an open electricity market in the province of Ontario and has done little to punish the unscrupulous sales practices of door-to-door energy retailers; and

"Whereas the Ernie Eves government appointed the board of directors for Hydro One, who approved exorbitant salaries and compensation packages for Hydro One executives;

"Be it resolved that the Ontario government move immediately to protect our province's electricity consumers by addressing the serious generation problem in Ontario, by punishing unscrupulous electricity retailers and by moving forward with a rebate to offset the increasing costs of electricity in Ontario."

Since that is being contemplated, I am delighted to put my name to this petition as well.

Mr Pat Hoy (Chatham-Kent Essex): I've received petitions with hundreds of names, actually thousands of names in this regard.

"To the Legislative Assembly of Ontario:

"Whereas the Ernie Eves Conservative government has legislated the opening of the Ontario electricity market as of May 1, 2002, and the price per kilowatt hour for electricity in the province of Ontario has nearly quadrupled since May 1; and

"Whereas the Conservative government of Ontario has done very little to address key issues such as energy supply, which forces the province to import power and causes the price of electricity to skyrocket; and

"Whereas Ernie Eves has done a poor job in educating the public as to the ramifications of an open electricity market in the province of Ontario and has done little to punish the unscrupulous sales practices of door-to-door energy retailers; and

"Whereas the government of Ontario has saddled the population of Ontario with additional debt reduction charges, which further increases the amount that the citizens of Ontario have to pay per kilowatt hour, yet the Hydro debt continues to increase; and

"Whereas the Mike Harris-Ernie Eves governments appointed the board of directors for Hydro One, who approved exorbitant salaries and compensation packages for Hydro One executives;

"Be it resolved that the Ontario government move immediately to protect our province's electricity consumers by addressing the serious generation problem in Ontario, by punishing unscrupulous electricity retailers and by moving forward with a rebate to offset the increasing costs of electricity in Ontario."

I too have signed this petition.

EDUCATION FUNDING

Mrs Leona Dombrowsky (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): "To the Legislative Assembly of Ontario:

"Whereas the funding for school boards is now based on the student-focused funding legislative grants for .. 2001-02....;

"Whereas the Hastings and Prince Edward District School Board is in a period of declining enrolment, a trend that is projected to continue over the next five years;

"Whereas application of the student-focused funding model for 2001-02 does not allow sufficient funding to the Hastings and Prince Edward District School Board for secretarial support in schools, principals and vice-principals, transportation or school operations;

"Whereas costs in these areas cannot be reduced at the same rate as the enrolment declines;

"We, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario as follows:

"To reassess the student-focused funding" formula for 2002-03 "to provide additional funding for those areas where funding is insufficient and to adjust future student-focused funding legislative grants to address the situation of declining enrolments faced by the Hastings and Prince Edward District School Board and other boards in Ontario."

I'm very happy to affix my signature to this petition.

LONG-TERM CARE

Mr John Gerretsen (Kingston and the Islands): I have here a petition that deals with the long-term-care rate situation. It's addressed to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario.

"Whereas the Eves government has increased the fees paid by seniors and the most vulnerable living in long-term-care facilities by 15% over three years or $3.02 per diem in the first year and $2 in the second year and $2 in the third year, effective September 1, 2002; and

"Whereas the long-term-care funding partnership has been based on government accepting the responsibility to fund the care and services that residents need; and

"Whereas government needs to increase long-term-care operating funding by $750 million over the next three years to raise the level of service for Ontario's long-term-care residents to those in Saskatchewan in 1999; and

It has been signed by approximately 1,000 residents from Halton. I agree with it. I affix my signature to it. I'm handing it over to Brian, our new page here.

COMPETITIVE ELECTRICITY MARKET

Mr Dave Levac (Brant): I have a petition to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario regarding hydro, signed by hundreds of residents in my riding.

"Whereas the Harris-Eves government deregulated electricity on May 1, 2002, in the province of Ontario without it being in their election platform in either 1995 or 1999 and without the mandate of the people of Ontario; and

"Whereas the price of the commodity of electricity has reached outrageous levels, having risen at times over 100% since May 1, 2002, causing Ontarians great financial hardship; and

"Whereas Ontario Power Generation (owned by the Ontario government) has applied to the Ontario Energy Board for a 20% reduction in the promised rebate to Ontarians if the commodity price of electricity rose above 3.8 cents per kilowatt hour; and

"Whereas competition in the electricity market has been scared off by the uncertainty of the Harris-Eves government's attempts to sell off a portion of Hydro One, leaving electricity commodity prices high; and

"Whereas the Harris-Eves government authorized exorbitant salaries and bonuses in the amount of $2.2 million per annum to be paid to the former president of Hydro One, and in excess of $1.6 million per annum to the vice-president of Ontario Power Generation;

"Therefore we, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly as follows:

"We demand that the Harris-Eves government take immediate action to ensure that Ontarians have fair prices for the necessary commodity of electricity in Ontario, and that the Harris-Eves government and its leader, Ernie Eves, call a general election on the instability of the energy market so that Ontarians can have a voice on this issue."

I sign my name on this petition and hand it over to Nicholas.

SCHOOL BUS SAFETY

Mr Pat Hoy (Chatham-Kent Essex): I have a petition to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario.

"Whereas some motorists are recklessly endangering the lives of children by not obeying the highway traffic law requiring them to stop for school buses with their warning lights activated;

"Whereas the current law has no teeth to protect the children who ride the school buses of Ontario, and who are at risk and their safety is in jeopardy;

"Whereas the current school bus law is difficult to enforce, since not only is a licence plate number required but positive identification of the driver and vehicle as well, which makes it extremely difficult to obtain a conviction;

"Therefore, be it resolved that we, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario as follows:

"That the measures contained in private member's Bill 112, An Act to amend the Highway Traffic Act to protect children while on school buses, presented by Pat Hoy, MPP, Chatham-Kent-Essex, be immediately enacted. Bill 112 received the unanimous all-party support of the Ontario Legislature at second reading on June 13, 2002....

"And we ask for the support of all members of the Legislature."

I too have signed this petition.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

KEEPING THE PROMISE FOR A STRONG ECONOMY ACT (BUDGET MEASURES), 2002 LOI DE 2002 SUR LE RESPECT DE L'ENGAGEMENT D'ASSURER UNE ÉCONOMIE SAINTE (MESURES BUDGÉTAIRES)

Resuming the debate adjourned on November 7, 2002, on the motion for second reading of Bill 198, An Act to implement Budget measures and other initiatives of the Government / Projet de loi 198, Loi mettant en oeuvre certaines mesures budgétaires et d'autres initiatives du gouvernement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr David Christopherson): It's my understanding that we will resume debate with the member for Toronto Centre-Rosedale, who may now assume the floor.

Mr George Smitherman (Toronto Centre-Rosedale): It's my pleasure to have an opportunity to continue the Liberal lead in response to government Bill 198, dealing with certain measures related to the budget, but not in its title or in any of the communications of the government—it needs to be said here very clearly at the beginning—dealing with the fact that this is the bill that repudiates the government's track record and language around "tax cuts pay for themselves." This is the bill, this is the very one, that if the government didn't change a law, they would be breaking the law by stopping or slowing down tax cuts they had already proposed.

The Liberal Party is clear on this, but it's worth repeating that the proposed cuts they want to slow down, we want to kill altogether. There is the private school tax voucher that sends an incentive to take kids out of the public system and into private schools. We're going to kill that.

Hon Dianne Cunningham (Minister of Training, Colleges and Universities, minister responsible for women's issues): That's not what you said at your riding association last week.

Mr Smitherman: I don't know what the minister from London—I'll look forward to her opportunity during questions and comments to try and correct the record, but she's obviously mistaken and should get to work.

Secondly, we are going to kill those corporate tax cuts, because we don't believe that Ontario's future is best reflected in a race to the bottom with Alabama. That's what the government of the day proposes. We're going to get rid of those.

Another thing this Bill 198 doesn't in its face talk about is the unprecedented action of turning back the clock to 1988 on the pension funds of employees in this province of Ontario. This is the bill that is loaded with the ghost of that man who has decamped for London, England: Conrad Black. If you pay no attention to anything else with respect to this bill, particularly for those people at home who were watching question period, as they know, I asked a question with respect to section 79.1 of this bill. They know I asked that question of the minister. In her answer, the minister went to great lengths to deflect from the reality of what's going on here. So I'm going to spend a reasonable amount of time informing people what the effects of this section of that bill are.

The minister spoke about consultation, about a consultation paper. First off, the paper she refers to did not in any way outline or raise the draconian steps they took when legislation was brought forward. So to say there was a consultation paper is true, but the contents of that paper did not reflect the actions this government took with respect to pensions in Ontario.

The minister said Bill 198 does nothing to change the role of employees as it relates to pensions. Not true. In 1988, under extraordinary pressure brought about by Conrad Black's attempt—I think he was successful—at raiding the pensions of the employees of Dominion stores, the government of David Peterson, led at that time by the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations, my colleague Monte Kwinter, introduced legislation that ensured, on matters of pension windup, that both employees and employers had a role to play.

Although pension matters are complex, for the better part of 15 years, through three successive governments, through governments of three different political stripes, this operated reasonably well, but we see in this legislation a capitulation to voices like the Canadian Bankers Association. The corporations in our society, as a result of their chartered status, had an opportunity to be very successful, and I celebrate their success, but their lobbyists have been lined up at the government's door, at the minister's door, in an attempt to ensure that these pension provisions were in there. They're in this bill at the behest not of employees, not of average working-class Ontarians, not of the people who pay into their pensions and not of the people who depend upon them; they're in there at the behest of the largest corporations in our province, and if it's not bad enough that they're changing the legislation for the future, they're letting them reach back 15 years—retroactive legislation that has the effect of wiping out employee rights, of changing pension agreements—no protection whatsoever.

When the questions are asked of the Minister of Finance, she dodges and weaves and doesn't answer with the full effect of the law in mind, and I say that's a shame. I say it's a shame that in Ernie Eves's Ontario we have a government minister, the Minister of Finance, bringing forward legislation to claw back the rights of employees in a way that even Mike Harris didn't contemplate doing. That's how bad it's gotten.

Is it anything more than a coincidence that the same law firm that Mr Eves was working at during his golden year, Borden Ladner Gervais, is also the pension specialist representing Scotiabank, which because of their purchase of National Trust stands as the biggest beneficiary of this legislation? Is that any coincidence? I don't know if it's a coincidence, but we've got a demonstrated pattern here whereby corporate players can always get the ear of the Minister of Finance, but the average person who depends upon their pension benefits for survival in their golden years—can they ever get the ear of the Minister of Finance? No.

When we ask to provide an opportunity for this massive bill, 168 pages, something like 25 significant statutes amended—when we ask in a reasonable way for the government to consider sending that legislation out for public hearings, to give the citizens of Ontario a voice so that they can highlight the extent to which they're impacted by it in this section and in the sections dealing with changes to the operation of the Ontario Securities Commission and dealing with the sections that amend the way benefits will work for people involved in auto accidents—just three of those sections, all of them dealing with individual Ontarians—when we ask in a reasonable way for the government to send this legislation out to committee to give average Ontarians a chance to put their views on the record, what do we get from the government in response? We get stonewalling and we get rhetoric and we get a minister hiding behind a discussion paper that only ever went to the players, to the insiders, to the $350-an-hour types—nothing to protect the rights of those individual Ontarians who are now sitting in limbo, at one time certain and now uncertain of whether their pension funds will be properly paid out.

Then we've got the Conrad Black clause, 79.1. What does 79.1 do? Section 79.1 opens Ontario up to be the first jurisdiction in North America—no US state allows what is proposed in this bill. What is proposed in this bill is that any corporate CEO—some of them are better than others—who gets in his or her hot little hand a report from an actuary—and this is not a science around which there is ultimate agreement—which says, “You have a surplus in these funds,” the incentive is there to claw that money back to the benefit of the corporation without any consideration, any discussion, any consultation with the employees who have paid into it and who are depending upon it.

That's what we're asked to accept as an appropriate way of dealing in Ernie Eves's Ontario. Mike Harris didn't do it. Bob Rae didn't do it. David Peterson didn't do it. But under pressure, this Minister of Finance, led by that Premier, has capitulated in a way that will allow corporate raiders—not just allow them; it will incent them, it will encourage them—to find an actuary who will produce a report about their pension that says it's in surplus and grab it, take the money and run.

When this government introduced this bill, because they didn't want to talk about the fact that they were going backwards on their tax cut pledges, they used their little backdrop at their media event that said, “Restoring public confidence. Restoring investor confidence.” Well, let me ask you this: how much confidence should the public have in a government that sends a message to the corporate world that any time their pension funds get in surplus they should be a source of raider activities? How does that restore investor confidence?

Will we have a situation like the one we've had in the United States in the last month or two where two of the Big Three car makers, General Motors and Ford, I believe, were highlighted for the fact that their pension plans were in a dangerous way? Should we celebrate that we have pension funds which are solid? Should we celebrate that we have pension funds which have the capacity to withstand some of the ups and downs we've all learned too much about in these past two years? Or should we have pension funds which are highlighted in the corporate prospectus and put out there for the corporate raiders as some kind of signal, as some kind of golden pot, designed to lure the corporate raider in to scavenge those funds and to put at risk the corporation, particularly the pension fund's capacity in the long term to provide for the retirement funds of those individuals who have paid into it?

This bill is such a lopsided dividend payment to the corporate players in this province at the expense of the hard-working people. For the Liberal Party's part—sometimes you get to stand up in this Legislature and vote yes or no with a certain level of enthusiasm, but we vigorously oppose this legislation on so many counts. It fails hard-working Ontarians. It jeopardizes their future capacity to rely on the pension funds that they have contributed to.

So we ask ourselves, why is the government bringing this forward at this time? We know these changes are ones that the corporate entities would have preferred in 1988, 1989 and 1990. We know that this has been the subject of intense lobbying of all finance ministers of all political parties. But we ask ourselves at this time, why did Janet Ecker, the Minister of Finance of the day, capitulate with this golden egg for the corporate entities? One is left to speculate, because the government does not provide us with a very clear understanding of it. I ask the question again whether the relationship where Mr Eves's former role at Borden Ladner Gervais, the lawyer for National Trust and Scotiabank, which are the most likely beneficiaries of this legislation—has that relationship got something to do with it? Did that help get people to the front of the line, or is it other elements of this bill, including slowing down, with a bit of a nudge and a wink to the corporate community, some of the tax cuts that had been promised?

For our part, the Ontario Liberal Party position is clear: we vote against this legislation. We oppose it with vigour. We think it's a huge reward to the corporate community for their loyal support of the government opposite. We think it is an awfully profound example of the extent to which, when the decisions are being made, the voices and influence of the corporate community are at the table and in the ear of the people who make the decisions. And the people with their pensions, put at risk by this kind of legislation, their ear, their representatives and their desire to express at public hearings their opinion on this continues to be stonewalled against hiding behind discussion papers that were never circulated at their level and with legislation that goes so far beyond the discussion papers so as to make a mockery of that entire process.

Last week in the Toronto Star, I believe it was, there was an editorial cartoon that showed a US border jail and three inmates chained to the wall. The first said, “I'm a suspected terrorist.” One said, “I bought gas in Maine,” and the third said, “I'm a pension-fund-raiding CEO.”

But they're behind bars. Maybe they're behind bars because in the US circumstance, this kind of activity would be outlawed; it's illegal. I repeat what I said earlier: with this piece of legislation, Bill 198, section 79.1, the Conrad Black clause, the Minister of Finance, Janet Ecker, sends a message forth to the whole world: “Pension funds are up for grabs. Come and get yours today. To all of those CEO pension-fund-raiding types.” We know their faces sometimes glimmer at us on screens on Kudlow and Kramer and across business magazines. We know there are people out there whose individual bottom-line interest moves forward of the rights and interests of individuals, of hard-working people who invested in their pensions. When Liberals vote on Bill 198, we will vote against this bill, we will vote against this government and we will vote against corporate raiding of pension funds. We're voting in favour of people.

The Acting Speaker: Members now have up to two minutes for question and comments.

Mr Gilles Bisson (Timmins-James Bay): I'm going to have an opportunity later to speak more fully on this, but I want to echo much of what was said by the member who just spoke, because I agree with him that this move on the part of the government with regard to how they're going to treat pension surpluses, quite frankly, is beyond the pale. There has been a standing rule since 1991 that was put in place by the former NDP government that basically says, in the case of partial windups, there is a mechanism for people to be able to deal with those windups. The effect of that was quite simple: employees, through their bargaining units, would sit down with employers if there were partial windups, they would look at how to utilize that money in order to build better pension plans so people can afford to retire with some dignity. If there was a reason to pull the money out—because there are times when a plan is fully funded, you've bought the maximum benefit and there is a surplus; you have to figure out a way to get that money out—there was a mechanism that basically said that when you do that, it can only be done with the consent of plan members, the people who are benefiting from the benefit. Usually that ended up being a 50-50 withdrawal. In most cases, that's where it ended up.

This move this government is attempting to do by way of this move in Bill 198 is to basically say, "Employees be damned. You don't have a say. If there is a partial windup of a pension plan, the employer will have the right to be able to go in and scoop that money without any ability for the employees to do anything about it." Quite frankly, that brings us not only back to where Conrad Black was in 1988; I would argue it brings us even further back than that. I'll have an opportunity to speak to that a little bit further.

I also want to indicate that our caucus, the NDP caucus, will be voting in opposition to this bill, not only because of what's inside the pension regulations, which I'll get into later, but because there's much in this budget bill that is not the direction we think the government should be taking when it comes to this issue of finance, and we'll speak to that a little bit later in the debate.

Mr Raminder Gill (Bramalea-Gore-Malton-Springdale): It is a pleasure to have what they traditionally call a two-minute hit in terms of what the member for Toronto Centre-Rosedale spoke about. There are many issues and good things in Bill 198; it's not only about pensions. I want the people at home to know that there are many good things, and I must remind them that it's not the first time the opposition will be voting against it; they have made that very clear. They have voted against pretty well every measure we brought forward, even in terms of giving $200 back to Ontario taxpayers. They didn't like that, and I'm not sure why.

Over the weekend, I was very happy to meet a couple, the Hardatt's who were at a social function I happen to be at. I thought I had seen them somewhere, and I realized later that I had seen them in the newspaper. They were the people who were there when Premier Ernie Eves rolled out his plan about hydro. I was pleased to meet the ordinary, hard-working citizens of Mississauga who are quite pleased. In fact, they came over and complimented us on handling the hydro issue very well. I want to compliment the government for taking its time—they didn't rush into it. But the plan they brought out is up to the year 2006, and as well they promised to continue the freeze if they have to. So it's not a short-term plan but a long-term plan, and I'm pleased to speak on that as well.

Mr James J. Bradley (St Catharines): What we look at in a bill of this kind is the fact that it's an omnibus bill. That means it has so many components to it that it should probably be broken down into four or five different bills. As is the case with many omnibus bills, some of the provisions in this bill are supportable; others are not. What the government usually does is put a hostage in the bill so the opposition won't vote for it, and then they can say about the good and popular things in the bill, "The opposition voted against it." But you really can't fool people with that.

I want to say that I have been receiving communications—telephone calls, letters and e-mails—about the issue of pensions and the raiding of pension plans that might be permitted by the provisions of this bill. Those people are very petrified about this, and the reason they're concerned is that their costs have already increased substantially. They have had huge utility increases; consumers are finding that gas bills are going up. Gas at the pump is going up. They're finding that their water bills are going up. In other words, they're being met with a lot of increases that are exceedingly important to them. That is why they're concerned when they see that their pension plan could be raided under the provisions of this bill.

I want those individuals, and members of the government, to know that we in the Liberal Party in the official opposition will adamantly oppose that provision, which would allow the raiding of pension plans. I'm surprised there hasn't been more of an uprising about this matter within the government benches. We know that the government capitulated last week to very heavy pressure from the opposition and from the public on the hydro issue. We hope the government will once again see that it is wrong, in the provisions of this bill, and that it will withdraw the provision that will allow the raiding of pension plans.

Ms Marilyn Mushinski (Scarborough Centre): I'm pleased to join in this particular debate by the member of Toronto Centre-Rosedale. It's interesting that he sort of says, "We're not going to support any more tax cuts." It really shouldn't surprise any members on this side of the House. I can remember, when I was a member of municipal council in Toronto, that they introduced, I believe, 33 tax increases in their very short five-year term. One of them happened to be the commercial concentration tax. That commercial concentration tax drove out more jobs from this city than any other kind of tax increase I can think of. That was one of the reasons that we, as a party, said in 1995 that we were going to cut taxes, because we believe that cutting taxes is going to create jobs. And guess what? Seven years later, one million jobs have been created in this province. One million jobs. It's interesting because there's an article in the clippings today that says Alberta and Ontario lead the way in job creation in Canada. So if anybody wants to know about the virtue of cutting taxes, just look at this government's track record in the last seven years. We have grown jobs in this province every month of every year for the last seven years. So you try and tell me that tax cuts don't work.

The Acting Speaker: The member for Toronto Centre-Rosedale has up to two minutes to respond.

Mr Smitherman: Following on the comments by the member from Scarborough Centre, you'd think she doesn't know that when she votes for this piece of legislation she's voting for a tax increase. What this bill does is, it makes it legal for you guys to break your own law. So thank you very much for making my point. Talk about consistency. To the members from Timmins-James Bay, Bramalea-Gore-Malton-Springdale, St Catharines and Scarborough Centre, I thank you.

It is interesting: the government members had four minutes to respond, but not a word about the central point that I talked about for 17—pensions. Not one word from the solemn masses of government members who lumbered back to Queen's Park today. Not one word about the fact that they are going to come in here, time allocation, and vote in favour of the Conrad Black clause. They're going to vote in favour of a piece of legislation that asks of corporate raiders in Ontario to steal as much as they can from the surplus and put at risk the pension funds of hard-working Ontarians. That's Bill 198 and that's a bill the government members, with great enthusiasm, will support.

But here in the opposition benches, in addition to our pronouncement that we will vote against it, is our request—and I say it this time in the presence of the member from Etobicoke Centre, the great government House leader. Please use that in your literature. I want to say to that member while he is here, why, why, why will you not allow the people of Ontario to have an opportunity to comment on this bill in public hearings in their centres? The Minister of Finance likes to hide behind her consultation papers, but I dare you to bring this to Scarborough municipal hall. Bring it there and hear from the people that are seeing this government support the big corporate raiders over the little guy. We're Ontario Liberals and we're with the little guy.

The Acting Speaker: Well, it must be Monday.

Interjection.

The Acting Speaker: "There's an election coming" is right. We will now move on to the leadoff speech for the third party.

Mr Bisson: That was quite interesting, the last comment. First of all, I want to thank you or give you my condolences, Speaker, that you have to be in the Chair today as our critic, the day that we have this debate coming up. I appreciate your leaving me the opportunity to utilize your lead on this, because normally it would be your opportunity. I want to make sure people know that I just wrestled it from you hand and foot because there are a number of things that I wanted to speak about on this bill.

I want to speak about three particular issues inside this bill. The first part I want to talk about is the pension legislation that the government purports to change by way of this bill; I want to speak about, obviously, Ontario Hydro and the fiasco around deregulation; and I also want to speak about auto insurance and insurance in general because it's an issue that is coming back, as many people would know.

First of all, let's be clear about what the government is trying to do here. Specifically I want to deal first with the pension issue. There has been, since about 1988, a change in the way that we deal with partial windups for pensions. The problem existed in the province of Ontario that if you had an employer that had 10,000 plan members inside a pension plan and there was a massive layoff or plant closure but not everybody was gone—in other words, you may have multiple plants and one or two plants were closed down and another couple of plants were left open—you went from being an employer that had 10,000 employees to one having 5,000. There was this whole issue of how you deal with the surplus that exists within a pension plan in the event of that partial windup.

You go from 10,000 employees to 5,000 employees. They figure out what the actuarial costs are to cover off all plan members and it's found that there is a surplus but there has been a partial windup; there's been a layoff in the plant that affects that there are less people working and contributing to the plan. An issue existed—how do you deal with that pension surplus?

What happened prior to 1988 was that there wasn't much in the way of rules, and employers were taking advantage of those situations and stealing money from pension plans. When there were those layoffs, they would do what was called a partial windup to their pension plan.

The most notorious of them all is the one we all remember—the Conrad Black affair. With Conrad Black and Dominion Stores, exactly that situation existed. There was a partial windup of the pension plan, and Conrad Black scooped out money that was paid by employees in the plan, took that surplus in the plan out and then ran with the money. I think at this point he has been knighted or something for having done it. I guess that's kind of a weird thing. You've got to wonder when you have a system that recognizes people like that as making a valuable contribution after having taken money out of the pockets of pensioners. You say to yourself, "What's wrong with their system?" But that's another debate.

What happened was that there was a huge outcry in Ontario. People across this province said there was something wrong. Pension surpluses shouldn't be used for employers to scoop money out to do whatever with. Those dollars should stay in the pension plan in order to negotiate better pension systems.

For example, in Northern Ontario, as across other parts of the province in the 1980s and the 1990s, we saw huge changes within the mining sector. We had employers like Inco, for example, that had about 15,000 employees that dropped down to below 8,000 by that period in 1988. Quite frankly, what do you do in a community of some 100,000 people when the major employer has laid off a full third of the employment figures? So the union, the United Steelworkers of America, went to the bargaining table and said, "We want to use surpluses that exist within pension plans, and we want to use those surpluses to negotiate better pensions for members, because we know there are going to be fewer jobs in the future. We want to be able to negotiate better pensions for those workers who exist and those who are out on pension so that once they do retire there will be enough money there within the pension plan to allow them to retire with some dignity," recognizing that the employer of today or the 1980s didn't want to keep a person at 65 years of age working in a mine in Sudbury or a mine in Timmins; they wanted to try to find a way to make the workplaces reflect a much younger age.

So we, the union, went to the table. I'm proud to say I am a Steelworker and I was part of that process that negotiated, not necessarily the Inco agreement, but other agreements where we went to the table and we said to the employer, "Listen, because of the windups and because of the layoffs we've had in our company, we want to utilize the surpluses that exist because of that and because they've made money as far as the investments in the market with the money from the pension plan. We want to take those surpluses and we demand that we negotiate better benefits for our members." By and large, with a lot of difficulty, in most cases dragging the employer kicking and screaming to the bargaining table, often being out on strike—in fact, the longest strike in Sudbury at Inco was about eight or 10 months, if I remember correctly, and it was over exactly this issue. It was over what you do with pension surpluses.

So in the end the Steelworkers and the members won the right to be able to negotiate themselves a much better pension. As a result of those surpluses and the negotiated settlement that the United Steelworkers had with Inco in Sudbury, the pension plans in Sudbury are pretty rich; they're pretty good. People are able to retire with a decent income at 55, 56 and 57 years old, depending on their years of service. That's good for the community. It means that not only does that person retire with dignity, with enough money in his or her pocket, but those people live and remain in the Sudbury area and spend those dollars from their pension plan in the community. So it has been a good thing for the employees. It has been a great thing for the community, because it has meant that people in retirement still have dollars to spend, and as a result Sudbury does fairly well. It's not just because of the pensions, obviously, but it's a large part of it.

In 1988, when Conrad Black came in and scooped the pension surpluses out, there was a huge cry across the province of Ontario. The NDP at the time—and I remember it was Floyd Laughren and Elie Martel who came to the Legislature day in and day out and basically demanded that the then Liberal government make some changes to the pension legislation so that type of raiding of pension surpluses was not allowed. To the credit of the Peterson government, some changes were made and that practice was abolished. I give credit to the Peterson government of the day.

When we were elected in 1990, the Bob Rae government at the time made some regulatory changes which much changed the way we do things. In effect, what our regulatory changes said was that if there are any pension surpluses that exist within a pension plan, the only way an employer, by way of partial windup or full windup, is able to draw money out of the surplus is with the consent of the plan members. What that did was effectively to force the employer to sit down and negotiate how to deal with that extra money.

I talked about Sudbury. The problem we had in Sudbury was that when we tried to safeguard the surplus within the Inco pension, the employer didn't want to do it, and there was no need for them to do it because no law required them to deal with those surpluses in a progressive way for the employees. In fact, they had the right to take the money out. So the workers there went out on strike for 10 months in order to achieve the ability to negotiate that that money not be taken out and be used to negotiate better pensions.

What we did in 1991, under the Bob Rae government, was to say, "Listen, we're going to change the rules. We're going to say that if there are any surpluses existing within a pension, if there are any changes in how to deal with those surpluses as far as withdrawals, you can only do so with the consent of the plan members." Since 1991, that has worked very well. What that has done is that employers who want to get their hands on the surpluses say, "Whoa, we can't get the money, so we've got to get to the table." So they sit down with the union or the association, whatever it might be, and try to negotiate how to deal with the surplus. I would say the more progressive unions have said, "Hey, we need to use this money to build better pensions," and by and large that's what happened in most cases. In other cases, where there has been a pension that is quite rich, the union has decided and agreed with the plan members, their membership, that a withdrawal from the pension should be allowed. Normally, that has been done by way of a 50-50 split. That pretty well has been the regime since about 1991, that basically no employer in this province would try to scoop the surpluses out of a pension plan because they knew by way of law and regulation that they didn't have the right to do so. Up to now things have been fairly good.

We've been hearing for about a year now some rumours that the government was looking at abolishing the NDP regulations that were put in place in 1991. It was first rumoured when Mr Flaherty was in cabinet. I remember at the time that I sat down with many people within the pension industry because this is an interest I've always had. Then we did some lobbying with Minister Flaherty. We had a letter-writing campaign going on and other things, trying to encourage the government not to go down that route. The argument we made was, "Do you remember what it was like before we had rules such as you're proposing? We had the Conrad Black situations." So we said, "Leave the regulations in place." At least this way they're negotiated settlements. If employees decide at the end that they want to cash out 50% of the surplus by way of negotiations, that's their business, but let's not let the heavy hand of government go in and tell people how they should do it and, more importantly, don't give the employer the right to do what they want.

That's where we thought things were at. I know, in speaking to people at the Ontario Federation of Labour, in speaking to the law firm of Koskie Minsky and others that I've dealt with in this particular area—and I'd like to thank Ari Kaplan, who works at Koskie Minsky, who spent a lot of time with me in order to deal with a lot of the pension issues. Many of our conversations, in meetings we've had and information he's given me, are going to be part of what I'm going to talk about today and also part of what we're going to talk about in the next election, when it comes to the need for pension reform.

But what the government now has done is surprise everybody to all get-out. Nobody believed that the government was going to move in this direction. We figured that we had done our job well in lobbying the government to get off this point. We were surprised to learn, when the bill was introduced a couple of weeks ago and I was leafing through it, along with our research people, that there were some changes to the part that dealt with the Pension Benefits Act. We started looking through it, and I've asked our research people to give it a really good look. We've actually gone out and talked to law firms that deal with this on a regular basis—not only Koskie Minsky but others—and we've dealt with people at the Ontario Federation of Labour as well as other labour unions out there that know far more about pension legislation than most, and we found that this government plans to turn things on their heads when it comes to how we deal with the issue of pensions in Ontario.

What this government is trying to do is quite sinister. They're saying, "Here we are." They're going to allow, by way of this legislation, the employer unilaterally to move on their own to remove pension surpluses from pension funds. We're saying that should not be allowed. So today our first demand to the government is that they withdraw this entire section from the bill. This is totally unacceptable. This is coming out of left field. Nobody saw it coming, and it is certainly not where most progressive people would want to go when it comes to pension legislation.

Let me walk through the bill and explain exactly what it does. The first section of the bill where it deals with the Pension Benefits Act says, "Amendments to the Pension Benefits Act relate to the payment of surplus out of pension plans, the authority of employers to take contribution holidays and the authority of the superintendent to permit refunds to be made to employers in specified circumstances."

When you read the relevant sections, they say that the employer, if he or she finds themselves with a pension surplus, will no longer have to go and negotiate with the employees, as was required under the rules set in place by Bob Rae in 1991. They will be able to just go on their own and say, "We're making an application to the superintendent of pension funds to withdraw," based on future regulations and rules the government is going to hand down after this bill is passed. Do you know what? At the end of the day, there's nothing the employees will be able to do about it, because we also lose the right to bring the employer to court and to appeal a decision to the courts in the case where there has been a decision to raid money from the pension funds.

I listened this afternoon and the minister said, "Oh, there's nothing like that in the legislation. We don't know what the hell you're talking about." I say, read your own legislation. This is out of your bill. I'm not making it up. It's under Bill 198. What it specifically says in Bill 198 is that it gives authority to the employers "to take contribution holidays and the authority of the superintendent"—that's the person who runs the pension plans for Ontario—"to permit refunds to be made to employers in specified circumstances."

Mr Peter Kormos (Niagara Centre): Bingo.

Mr Bisson: Exactly, "Bingo."

So now we're going to have this situation: we have all kinds of employers across the province where, because of what's happening with the restructuring of our economy, there are going to be basically surpluses that will be created in pension plans as a result of layoffs.

Mr Kormos: What about windups?

Mr Bisson: That's where I'm going.

In the case of surpluses by partial windup, there are going to be cases where employers are going to go through the process of layoffs and of reorganizing their plants. They're going to have a situation where they'll end up with possibly a surplus because of that, and also because hopefully their investments will do better than they did in the last eight months—but that's another issue. The employer's going to sit there and say, "Oh my, look at this. There's a $2.5-million surplus in the pension plan," or, "There's a $10-million surplus," or whatever the number might be. Then the employer's going to say, "Jeez, I'm going to scoop that money out of the plan to assist myself with the financial difficulties I'm having now." I'm saying we should not allow that.

Even if the employer paid that money out of their own pocket, my argument is that's money that's owed to the employees. If I go to work for an employer and I get paid $10 an hour or $20 an hour—it's irrelevant—and I go out and negotiate a pension plan with my employer where the employer says, "I pay all of your pension contributions," or 50%—I don't care; that's money that belongs to the employees; it doesn't belong to the employer. So even in the case where the employer pays the entire pension plan, my argument is that's not the employer's money. Those are dollars that should have gone to the employee by way of wages, that instead were negotiated to pensions. It's workers' money, pure and simple.

For the government to agree that you should all of a sudden allow an employer to scoop out pension surpluses by the argument, "I made the contribution because I paid 50% of the pension contribution," or, "I, the employer, paid 100%," is a bogus argument. That's the employees' money. The employer should not be allowed to take that money out of the pension plan. Those dollars need to stay there to build better pensions for workers who are currently in the plan and workers who are going to be in the plan as time goes on. For the government to say they're going to allow an employer unilaterally to go out and scoop pension surpluses out of the plan I would say is beyond the pale even for this government, because now what you're doing is, by way of legislation, allowing the employers to steal—and I want to use the word "steal"—the money out of workers' pockets. That's what this government is allowing to happen.

I say to the government, this is not something we're going to support. It's something that quite frankly we want you to withdraw from the bill.

There's another amendment to section 55, and this comes right out of the bill, that says, "An amendment to section 55 of the act permits employers to suspend or reduce their contributions to a pension plan in prescribed circumstances."

In simple English, that means they're going to be able to take pension holidays. What they're doing—and there's a case that happened in Timmins, and I want to talk about what happened at the Royal Oak mine—what they're basically saying by way of this legislation is that an employer sees there's a surplus in the plan, so you have an employer with, let's say, 250 members in the plan and they've made contributions, as they should have, every month into the pension plan. Then all of a sudden here you are, you're in a situation where there's a surplus in the plan. The employer is going to turn around and say, "Do you know what? I don't need to make pension contributions for the next six months, the next two years or whatever it might be, because of the surplus in the plan," and is going to stop making payments to the pension plan. It's what we call a pension holiday.

What we've got is the government, by way of section 55 in the legislation, saying that where an employer can determine there is a current surplus in a pension plan they will be able to apply unilaterally and go in and say, "We're taking a pension holiday." I'm saying that's wrong. Why? Because we know far too well there are many pension plans across the province of Ontario that are inadequate. Where there's a case where there's a surplus, the argument has to be made that the employer should continue making the payment and then we should be able to get to the bargaining table by building up the money in the pension plan to build a better pension for workers who are currently within the plan.

What this government is giving the employers, quite frankly, is carte blanche to say that any time there's a pension surplus, all you have to do is apply to the superintendent of pensions and basically take a pension holiday. Well, under that scenario, how are you ever going to build better pensions? You never will be able to. The only way you'd be able to build a better pension is if a union is successful in negotiating with their employer to up the contributions to the pension plan. That's difficult enough, but if you can't deal with surpluses, far too often you're not going to be able to negotiate better benefits for workers when it comes to retirement benefits.

So this government is basically allowing employers to renege on their moral obligation and their legal obligation to provide pensions to the workers who work for them for a period of years. I'm saying that is wrong. We should not be doing that.

Let me give you an example of just how destructive this could be. I represent the riding of Timmins-James Bay, the city of Timmins being one of the communities inside the riding. There was a mine called Royal Oak. It was originally a mine that was owned and operated by Noranda through the Pamour Group. This place operated probably for the better part of about 70 years. What happened is that Peggy Witte basically bought controlling interest in the Pamour Group, called it Royal Oak and basically went about operating the mines that were owned by Pamour.

The long and short of the story is that she basically high-graded the mines. For a period of five years she basically said, "I'm not going to spend any money when it comes to doing really major, advanced exploration. I'm going to rob the best I can find in the mines in order to maximize my profits so I can make as much money as I can." When the day came that she didn't have very many good workings that paid well, she started to get into financial problems.

One of the things she did, without the knowledge of anybody, is stop making pension contributions. When she stopped making those pension contributions, she put the pension plan in jeopardy. Now we've had to go to court to deal with a remedy on this particular issue. Thank God there is some remedy under current legislation. We were able to go before the courts to deal with that issue by way of the Insurance Commission of Ontario, to make sure we covered off the shortfall that existed within the pension plan because of her taking a pension holiday by way of what she did in the insolvency of that company.

What I would argue is that section 55 of the act should be renamed the Peggy Witte-Royal Oak section, because what you're going to be doing is allowing employers to make applications to stop making payments into the pension plan, and as a result of that, I believe you're going to have employers who will put their plans at risk. It's as simple as that.

The other section of the act which is quite interesting is section 78—there are new sections 67.1 and 67.2 and subsections 78(1) and (4). It talks about how you deal with terminated employees, and I'm just going to read it: "They also authorize the superintendent to consent to the payment of certain amounts out of a pension fund to an employer. If a pension plan provides defined contribution benefits, the superintendent may consent to a payment to the employer of the employer's contributions relating to a person whose employment was terminated before he or she became entitled to a pension" under the deferred pension plan.

What it basically means to say is that if I go to work somewhere and am not vested, and I am there under two years and get terminated for whatever reason, the employer doesn't have to give me my money back. I'm saying that's bizarre. Last time I checked, if I work for an employer for a period of a year and a half and I'm told I'll be paid 10 bucks an hour, the employer pays me 10 bucks an hour. When the employer fires me, I get fired, but I still receive the $10 an hour for the whole time I worked there. Well, the pension benefit is the same thing. That's money the employee got in lieu of wages.

Now we're saying in the legislation that if anybody who is not vested gets terminated by an employer, the employer will have the right to scoop not only his share of the pension contributions, but also the employee's share of the contributions. Boy, there's something wrong here. Giving employers the ability to take that money out is very wrong.

There's another section in here that's really something, and that's how they're going to deal with what they call "missing persons" in section 74.1 under the legislation. There are situations where an employee may have worked somewhere for a number of years, let's say 20 years, and moves on to another province, goes somewhere and nobody knows where that person went, but the person was entitled to a pension benefit. Normally what happens is that sometimes it takes 10, 15, 20 years for somebody to come along and say, "My father worked here for 20 years and he died in a car accident out in Alberta. As I understand it, he was entitled to a pension benefit." Because there was a will that willed that money to that individual, you're able to get the money back to the person's estate.

What the government is saying is that they're going to put a time limitation of 10 years on what they call any missing person's money. In other words, if you work somewhere from age 20 to, let's say, 45 years old, that's 25 years of contributions. You've still got 20 years of work before you're 65, so that brings you to 55. They're saying that after 10 years the employer will be able to—not the employer. This is even better. The government of Ontario by way of the crown will be able to scoop that money out of the pension plans.

I couldn't believe that one when I saw it, but let me read it. It basically says, "The new section 74.1 of the act concerns missing persons who are entitled to benefits and payments when a pension plan is being fully wound up....

The Lieutenant Governor in Council may order the superintendent to pay small amounts held in the fund for over 10 years to the Minister of Finance, and such amounts forfeit to the crown." Wow, that's something else.

What we're saying here is that I worked at a place from age 20 to 45 and I've got 25 years of contributions. I move to Alberta. I'm working in Alberta and I'm now 56 years old. I've been gone from my employer for 11 years. I'm counting on this money, by the way, to retire. I'm counting on this 25 years as part of my retirement, but it's 11 years later in Alberta and I don't happen to read the Timmins Daily Press when I'm in Alberta. My employer has been shut down and they're winding down the plan. If I don't make claim to that money within the first 10 years of the plan being wound up, I'm basically out of luck. The government's going to take my money.

I can't believe you guys are doing this. This is really scary stuff.

I understand there was a problem in this area because monies were left in pensions and people did not know how to deal with this because, for all kinds of reasons, people move away. They've got 20 or 25 years of contributions and they go somewhere else. Twenty years later nobody hears from them again. What happened? Did they die? Did they move to another country? Nobody knows what happened to them. The money ends up sitting in the pension plan and it stays there sometimes for quite a long period of time. But at one point the money's still there for the family or the individual to come back, or anybody who was named in the will if the person died, to get those pension benefits back because often a pension benefit is able to be willed to somebody else in the case of a spouse.

What the government is saying in this case is that if your pension plan is wound up, the government's going to make changes that will allow them after 10 years to take out the money you and your employer contributed to your pension plan if you haven't made contact. Like I say, it's very feasible that somebody who worked for 25 years in a plant and has gone away and worked in another province for 20 years wouldn't even know the pension plan was being wound up, and wouldn't even make claim to it and wouldn't find out until they retired at age 65, at which point they'd find out that Janet Ecker, or whoever the Minister of Finance was at the time, took their hard-earned money and used it for general revenues for the province of Ontario. I'll say this is really regressive legislation.

Let me talk about what I think we should be doing and what we, as New Democrats, suggest should be done when it comes to pension legislation. First of all, what you guys are proposing in this legislation comes out of nowhere. Nobody's been consulted. The minister got up today and said, "Oh, we consulted widely." No, you didn't. All of the people I've spoken to who are in the pension field have said there were rumours a couple of years ago or a year ago that you were going to make some changes as I described, but you guys backed off. At no time in your consultations over this bill did you sit down with somebody in the pension industry and say, "We want to have a situation where this kind of thing would happen." At no time did anybody ask for that from the Progressive Conservative side.

We know from a letter that we have here—and I just want to read a letter that was written to Peter Kormos from Don Menzies. This is from Baker Street in Peterborough and it reads:

"Dear Peter,

"I am writing to inform you that I represent many former employees of the Johnson & Johnson medical products plant that closed in Peterborough in 1998 and moved to Mexico, first partial winding down and further fully winding down the pension plan for hourly employees.

"I urge you not to support this legislation, as it would allow Johnson & Johnson to run away with the surplus of the pension plan that the workers' contributions helped build in the same fashion as Johnson & Johnson ran away with their jobs."

He's basically sending his best regards, and that's signed Don Menzies, who is a Canadian Auto Workers union person dealing with pension issues.

The last point on this is that where the government is going here is far beyond the pale.

I forgot to mention one thing about the changes that the government is doing on pensions—I just don't want to forget it—and that is, what the government is doing is making this legislation retroactive to 1988. So that means to say that anybody as far as a group who is trying to deal with the issue of pension surpluses who have not had their matters resolved as of yet will be caught up in this whole pension regime change. We know there's about 200-and-some-odd plans out there that are currently waiting for what was called the Monsanto case to be heard at the Court of Appeal.

The Monsanto case was an issue where Monsanto had taken his employer to court on the basis of what the employer was doing with his surplus when it came to a partial windup, because even under our regulation there was some concern in how to deal with the actual partial windup. While the Court of Appeal that was hearing the Monsanto case was dealing with that issue there was a whole bunch of people that sat back and waited to see what happens with the Monsanto case before moving forward. What this government is doing is saying, "We're making this legislation retroactive and we're going to allow the employers to use anything back to 1988." So it means to say that all of those people who are waiting for the Monsanto case to come in are going to get caught up in this.

I want to talk about what should be done when it comes to pensions. I would invite fully a debate by this government by way of committee hearings when it came to pension rules. I think we all can agree on one thing: the workplace of today is much changed from what it was 20 years ago. Twenty years ago it was not uncommon for somebody in a community somewhere in Ontario to say, "When I get out of high school, I'm going to go work for Kidd Creek Mines or Dome Mines or Mallett waferboard or wherever it might be and I'm going to work there 30 years, 35 years and that's where I'm going to retire." That was not uncommon 20 years ago.

Today, most people out there I think would agree: not very many people get to work in one place for 25 and 35 years. I would argue that probably about 80% of workers in the province of Ontario don't work for any one employer more than 10 years. I would argue that probably 60% of employees in Ontario don't work for one employer more than five years.

The difficulty with that is, nobody is able to really build up a good pension plan in the new economy of today. You go and work for one contract employer for two years; you move on to a full-time job somewhere else for five; you move on somewhere else for another three, and at the end of your work cycle you have, like me, a person who has worked for many different employers, some who had a pension plan and some who didn't, and you end up with no pension protection for the time that you retire. In the close to 30 years that I've been working, I'd probably have contributions that equal about eight years of work. That's the only pension time that I've got to show, and that's the time that I worked at what was then Pamour Mines. Even here in the Legislature, and members would know, the government cancelled the MPPs' pension plan. I don't even have a pension to show for the time that I was here. So I would argue—

Mr Ted Chudleigh (Halton): Did we cancel that?

Mr Bisson: If you think that's a good thing, you're dumber than I thought.

Mr Chudleigh: Why did we do that?

Mr Bisson: I think it's a pretty dumb thing, but that's another story.

Anyway, I would argue that most Ontarians today are like me and many other people across this province, and that is, not many of us are able to work for one employer for a sufficient amount of time to build up a good pension plan. That's why we're proposing, by way of our NDP caucus, that we move to a system of automatic vesting, that we should introduce changes to the Pension Benefits Act that basically says "Any worker who goes anywhere to work in the province of Ontario is vested on day one." That way if the employee works six months in one place, works two years somewhere else, works for whatever amount of time, at the end of 35 or 40 years of service they're able to accumulate all of those pension credits into one benefit so they're able to retire with some dignity.

That would deal with a lot of people. As you well know, Mr Speaker, many people in your community, as in mine, are contract employees; they don't work anywhere for more than two years. They get a contract for six months or a contract for one year, then the employer lays them off and brings them back under another contract. At the end of the day they might have been with the same employer or different employers for a period of 10 years but have never built up two years' consecutive service to be vested in the employer's pension plan.

That's why we're saying that at bare minimum the first thing we need to do is to vest employees as of day one: you walk in to an employer, and if a pension plan exists you become automatically vested, and you bring those benefits with you. We include temporary and part-time employees in that definition, so employers don't do what they're doing now—and the province of Ontario does this as well—where they say, "Oh, come to work for me. I've got a six-month contract for you." You go there for six months, they extend you for two or three months, you may get eight months, and then they say, "OK, now we don't need you for the next three or four days, so we're not renewing your contract." Four or five weeks later, they call you back and say, "Come back. I've got another six-month contract for you." You end up working for the same place over and over again on successive contracts but you can never build any pension time.

We're saying that the first thing we'd do as an elected NDP government is to reform the legislation to say you're automatically vested and have it include all temporary and part-time employees, so the employer can't play that game. It would say, "You worked here. I don't care how you worked here. As long as you got paid a wage or a benefit or whatever contractual arrangement, you were automatically vested within your pension plan." At least in that way it would recognize the workplace of today. Workers would be able to say, "I've worked a number of places over my work cycle, and at the end of the day at least I've built up some pension time."

The other thing we propose to do is to create something—it's very technical, and it's a longer argument than I could put in this debate today—called multiple-employer plans. The problem we have in the pension industry today is that for a large employer, it tends to be fairly effective for them to get themselves insured by some company to buy a pension benefit, but for smaller employers with five, 10, 15 or 25 people, it's difficult for them to go out and find somebody who will take on their company as a customer. It's because most employers don't think of it, and when they do think of it it's fairly complicated; there are no easy vehicles by which the employer can get into providing a good pension for the employees.

So we would create multiple-employer plans which would look at various types of sectors. Possibly for the industrial sector there'd be a multiple-employer plan where if you work for a welding contractor, an electrical contractor or anybody in the industrial construction field, there's a multiple-employer plan for you and there are various benefits the employer can buy. If you work in the hotel-restaurant-tourism industry, there may be another multiple-employer plan. There may be a different multiple-employer plan for people in the contract industry.

The point is that employers would have an ability to say, "If the employees, by way of negotiation, or I as the employer wish to buy a pension plan for my employees, there's a multiple-employer plan." They wouldn't have to go out and reinvent the wheel. All they'd do is pay a benefit and their people would become insured in terms of having a pension scheme. That would basically ease the burden for the employer in terms of pensions. They wouldn't have to get into the pension business; it would allow somebody else to underwrite the pensions for their employees and do that in a way that's not too cost-prohibitive for the employer. The other thing it does is it allows you to build portability much easier, because through the multiple-employer plan you would be able to do that.

The big decision we have to make, and I think it's one that we can only make after forming government when we have an opportunity to go out to committee to talk about this in more detail, is, should we make pensions mandatory? That's really the big one. A lot of people won't recognize that, but back in the early 1960s when we first went into the debate around pensions, there was an issue that we should make pensions mandatory. In fact, I think that's what it said in the original legislation. But that section of the act was never proclaimed and it always stayed as a voluntary system.

What we have to ask ourselves in the province of Ontario is, should we, by way of legislation, make it mandatory that all employees in the province of Ontario be covered by a pension plan? I would argue yes. I think that is not a bad thing; that would be a good thing. But recognizing that that's a debate where both the employer and employee community would have to come to the table and have some discussions, I'm saying we need to have a little more consultation on the mandatory portion to make sure that people understand what that means. It does mean for the employer, for example, that they would have to make those contributions. We all know that employers or employees don't like to pay for something if they're made to, so I think we need to get into a discussion about how you make that happen. For employees, if you do make it mandatory, it means that at negotiations employers are going to argue, "We're making a pension contribution. We can't afford to give you more money." So we need to get into a bit of discussion with the public about making them mandatory.

But at the very least, we argue two things. We argue that you need to vest employees on day one, with total portability of pensions. Number two is that we have to make sure we create multiple-employer plans so we allow employers to get into insuring their employees for pensions in the province of Ontario. The third point we would have to deal with is, do we make that mandatory? That's a decision we haven't made yet.

The other thing we believe is that we should be indexing pension plans. There was a provision put in place in 1988 when the Liberal government made changes to the pension legislation that called for indexing of pension plans across the province. Unfortunately, that never got enacted either. The government never proclaimed that particular section of the act, and we're left without indexing unless the union has negotiated indexing at the bargaining table. One of the things we believe, the other thing we'd want to do is index the pensions altogether.

The other issue is the whole issue of governance of pension plans. I want to recognize that there are some models out there and some pension plans that have a good structure of governance, where they give an equal voice to the employee plan members on the pension plan along with the employers. But that's only where it's been negotiated. I would argue that one of the things we would want to see in our legislation is that there would be actual requirements in the legislation that say you have to create a situation where employees have an equal voice on the pension board to deal with issues about their own pension. You don't want to end up in the situation I did; I was in a pension plan entirely paid by the employer, so the employer said, "You don't have any seat on our pension board because you've made no contributions." I'd go to the table as a union negotiator and say, "Hell, we're prepared to make contributions. At least that way we can build ourselves a better pension." The employer refused, basically, to negotiate that item off the table when it came to negotiations. So we're saying that one of the things you need to do is make sure, in terms of governance of the pension plan, employees are represented on the structure that governs individual pension plans.

As well, there is the whole issue of basically creating a new pension regime in Ontario. As New Democrats, we believe it's important that people in this province should be able to know that when they work for 35 or 40 years, they have an opportunity to build into a pension plan and that that pension goes with them wherever they go; that their pension plan is totally portable so that at the end of the day, when they're finished working, they are able to retire with some dignity.

I say to the members across the way that we, the New Democratic Party, will oppose the sections in the bill that deal with the Pension Benefits Act. We are calling on the government to withdraw that from the legislation altogether. Rather than going in that direction, we encourage you to get into a dialogue with us and the public of Ontario to make a huge reform in the pension legislation to say that all pensions should be automatically vested; that you should have total portability of pensions to recognize the workplace of today so that when people travel through their work cycle, with different employers throughout their work cycle, they have total portability; and that we index those benefits. That would make sure that people have a pension that at the end of the day makes some sense and they are able to retire with dignity.

As well, I want to take the opportunity on this particular debate to talk shortly about the issue of insurance. I know my colleague Peter Kormos raised this issue in debate, but I just want to say that the whole issue of insurance is rearing its head yet again. I think all of us, in our constituency offices, have been getting phone calls from our constituents that their auto insurance and their insurance for their households are going through the roof. We are seeing double-digit increases over the last couple of years, and people are really starting to feel, "Never mind hydro—that was bad enough—but look what's happening to my auto insurance," or, "Look what's happening to insurance generally in the province of Ontario."

I have had a number of instances this summer where people, especially people in the trucking industry, saw their rates increase by 200% over what they were the year before. In many cases, the small, independent operators have not been able to stay in business. I've got some cases where people were paying about $180,000 a year for insurance for a fleet of trucks. They found themselves with an increase up to $400,000 in total for their insurance for the new year. As a result of that, they have been unable to keep their doors open. A $200,000 increase in insurance has basically put them out of business.

There's a whole bunch of people in the logging industry—the Minister of Natural Resources will know this—who have been decimated by what's happened with insurance. The insurance companies, quite simply, do not want to underwrite people in the lumber industry. They're saying, "We don't want to insure haulers in the bush, let alone insure people on the highway." What they've done is got out of that business altogether, and what's left is that independent haulers of logs have to go to the facility market in order to get insurance for their trucks, and their rates are going through the roof.

I just want to say that what's in this act doesn't deal with that. There was an opportunity in this act, and maybe there still is if the government is prepared to work with us here, to try to find some mechanism to ensure that those people are able to buy insurance in a way that is reasonable when it comes to rates.

I met with a number of operators over the spring, summer and fall who are really—I'm going to use the word—pissed off about what's going on. They are at the point where they're saying they cannot afford to stay in business with the insurance increases they're getting.

Interjection.

Mr Bisson: I'm just telling it the way it was told to me. There is not a sugar-coated way of putting this. These people are really hopping mad and they're saying the government needs to do something about insurance.

I have also had the opportunity to meet with mill owners and mill operators in the sawmill industry over the last week. During constituency week I met with the owner-operators at the Opasatika mill in regards to Excel and talked to others, and they're telling me the same thing is happening in their plants. The insurance rates for sawmills went up by 30% last year. Figure out what that means to an operator of a sawmill somewhere in northern Ontario—and I'm sure it's not just sawmills; I am sure there are other industries that are faced with the same thing. Insurance costs for those people are going up by

30% and 40%, and they're expected to go up even more next year. They're thinking to themselves, "You know, at one point we are going to become self-insured, and we are going to hope that we don't get sued, because if we do, it's going to close our doors."

The government has yet to find a way to deal with the whole issue of how you provide regulation and legislation to deal with insurance. Maybe the time has come to bring back public auto insurance, something we should have done when we were in government, and I bemoan the fact that we didn't do it. Maybe we need to get back to public auto insurance.

Interjection.

Mr Bisson: Government members can laugh all they want, but if you take a look and compare auto insurance rates across the country, it's quite interesting. Guess how much they've increased auto insurance rates in Manitoba in the last four years. In the last four years, the total increase in auto insurance rates for Manitobans insured under public auto insurance has been zero. They have not increased their rates once—the same thing in Saskatchewan.

British Columbia for the first time has had an increase under the Liberal government of today. But prior to that I think they hadn't had an increase in their insurance rates for six or seven years, because the regime is a much different one.

Now the insurance companies here in Ontario are saying, "We have to raise it because we are not making money." If you're not making the money, get out of the business. Maybe what we need to do is take a look at the government having a role in providing auto insurance to people in Ontario.

I know some people would say, "Why didn't you do that when you were in government between 1990 and 1995?" Do you know what? You're right. Maybe we should have. Quite frankly, Bob Rae backed down on auto insurance. I was very uncomfortable with the decision, as I think were most people in our caucus. Nonetheless, he was the Premier, and as we all understand, Premiers have a lot of authority. Maybe it's something we should've done. Certainly, as I look at auto insurance rates going up today, I've got to say that maybe we should have done it, and maybe the time has come to take a look at that again.

I also want to deal with the issue of hydro, because the government, by way of this bill, is making a number of changes in the legislation that deal with the whole issue of hydro. I just want to say it's really interesting how the government has moved in this whole area over the last while. They came to this Legislature last spring and said to us, "Do you know what? Just trust us. We're going to open up the market to competition. We're going to deregulate so competition can happen in the province of Ontario. Trust us, hydro rates are going to go down." We stood here, Howard Hampton and the NDP—because we were the only ones saying this was going to be a disaster. The government members got up and the Minister of Energy at the time said, "Hey, you guys don't know what you're talking about. You're fearmongering. It's not going to happen. Hydro rates won't go up. Only Howard Hampton and the NDP are saying that." Nobody's going to believe you, because you were saying six months ago that rates were going to go down, and here we are some six months later and hydro rates have gone through the roof. It's not nice saying, "I told you so," but I'll tell you, we told you so. This whole thing has been a fiasco.

The government decided they were going to do a couple of things: first of all, they were going to open up the market to competition with the promise that competition was going to lead to lower prices. It has been nothing short of a disaster. In fact, prices have not gone down; prices have gone up. They then split Ontario Hydro into three parts. They now are moving to privatize two parts of the hydro grid. First of all, they want to privatize 49% of the hydro grid itself through Hydro One, and then they want to sell off the power plants that exist under OPG. I'm just saying that's a recipe for disaster.

What we've seen happen over the past while is hydro prices going through the roof. Basically, the government had to try to figure out what to do, because if they were going to survive the next election they couldn't afford to put themselves in a position of having hydro bills keep on increasing the way they were, because people would not have waited for an election. There might have been a mutiny in the province of Ontario vis-à-vis what was happening with hydro rates.

So the government thought it got smart. It announced last week on Remembrance Day—and I thought, boy, that was rather interesting: the government picks Remembrance Day to make a keynote announcement around hydro. You'd think they'd have the decency not to do that on Remembrance Day and, like the rest of us, respect and reflect on the contribution made by our war veterans. Instead, the government made the announcement on Remembrance Day. Nonetheless, the government announced that they were going to freeze the rates. Well, the government, quite frankly, has done the worst thing that it could have done in the way it has dealt with it. What they should have said was, "Yes, we'll freeze the rates, but we're going to basically re-regulate the industry. We're going to stop the privatization, stop the deregulation and bring the rates back to what they were in May of last year." Instead, the government says they're going to protect consumers from rate increases by providing a rebate and freezing the rates and keeping the market in the open system. I'm just saying—and it's not just me saying it; a lot of people are saying it—that's really a recipe for disaster, because now what you have is the taxpayers of Ontario on the hook to pay the difference between what the rate was in May 2002 and what it's going to be in May 2003.

Let's just think: if the rates happen to go up to even 6.5 cents or 7 cents per kilowatt hour, which is not unreasonable because quite frankly they've gone up way beyond that over the summer, the government could be stuck with being on the hook for over $2 billion. And what have you accomplished? All you're doing is using public dollars to subsidize the market.

This is only an attempt, in my view and in the view of our leader, Howard Hampton, for you to basically buy your way through the next election. You're trying to do what Ralph Klein did back in 2000-01, where he deregulated the market and started the privatization initiative, and rates started going through the roof. They went from 4 cents per kilowatt hour to 25 cents per kilowatt hour. People were hopping mad. The government was going into an election cycle. They said, "We have a response. We're going to freeze rates and provide a rebate." They did exactly what Ernie Eves has tried to do in this instance. Eight months after the election in Alberta, Ralph Klein basically made the rate cap disappear and has now left Albertans to the largesse of the market. As a result, people are now paying 80% more for hydro than they paid when the rates were deregulated and opened to the marketplace.

I'm just saying to people and to the members of the assembly that I don't buy for one second that if the government was to get another majority or the Liberals were to get a majority—they would take that rate freeze off in a minute and would basically allow the private sector to make as much money as they have.

It was interesting to note today the position that Dalton McGuinty took on the whole issue of deregulation. I was listening to the scrum outside and I'll tell you, it was more confusing by the minute to listen to what Mr McGuinty was saying. He comes into the House, purports to be the champion of the working people of Ontario and says, "We're opposed to all of this." Then he's out in the scrum saying that no, he thinks that deregulation is good, that the market opening is a fine thing and that he favours the rate freeze as a mechanism to allow privatization to happen. I just think it's kind of interesting, the position Mr McGuinty has taken on about three sides of the same issue at the same time.

C'est intéressant, l'aspect de ce que le gouvernement décide qu'eux autres vont faire avec l'hydro ici en Ontario. On sait que le gouvernement avait promis de trouver une manière de couper les tarifs à travers la province quand ça vient à ce qu'on paie comme consommateurs pour l'électricité. Ils nous ont dit que la solution était de déréglementer l'électricité. En effet, c'est ça qu'ils ont fait.

Ce qu'on voit aujourd'hui est que l'augmentation du coût de l'électricité était un désastre complet, que les tarifs que le monde a payé pour l'électricité depuis mai ce printemps ont augmenté à un point qui n'est pas supportable pour les contribuables, et qu'eux autres se trouvent dans une situation où ils disent, « Écoute, tout ce qu'on sait est que nos tarifs ont augmenté et on est fâché contre le gouvernement conservateur. » La réplique du gouvernement est de dire, « Ah, n'inquiétez-vous pas. On va tout arranger. Ce qu'on va faire est de s'organiser pour geler les tarifs à un point, puis on va vous donner un rabais. »

Moi, je dis, « Écoute, à la fin de la journée, ça ne va pas marcher. Tout ce que vous faites est que vous êtes en train d'organiser une situation où vous allez subventionner le secteur privé quand ça vient à ce qu'eux autres font dans le secteur privé avec le prix de l'hydro. » Ce qu'on a présentement est le gouvernement qui dit que n'importe ce qui arrive, après 4,3 cents le kilowattheure, ils vont garantir ça en gelant les tarifs, et que le gouvernement va payer la différence entre les 4,3 cents jusqu'à l'augmentation totale, ce que va coûter l'hydro. Je dis ça parce que, supposément, on est présentement à environ 6 cents le kilowattheure ou un peu plus. Si le prix de l'hydro continue à augmenter, tel qu'il a fait, et arrive à 7 cents ou 8 cents le kilowattheure quelque temps cet hiver, le gouvernement va être dans une situation où au-dessus de deux milliards de dollars vont être en danger d'être accumulés au déficit d'Hydro Ontario, et que le gouvernement provincial eux autres vont dire, « On va prendre l'argent du revenu général de la province de l'Ontario pour payer le tarif qui a été gelé. » Je dis simplement que le gouvernement a mis en place une situation où il essaie d'acheter les contribuables et les consommateurs de l'hydro en Ontario envers les prochaines élections.

We often find ourselves here in the Legislature dealing with matters that come before the House by way of the government. Far too often we find ourselves in a situation where the government is bringing in bills that are very large. In this case, Bill 198 amends sections in a whole bunch of other acts by way of hiding under the stealth of being a budget bill.

The government has sections in this bill that deal with everything from the Commodity Futures Act, the Business Corporations Act—makes changes to the Fuel Tax Act, makes changes to pensions and education acts and a whole bunch of other acts. The government is basically bringing many changes through this legislation. I just want to say that we've gotten into a practice in this Legislature where you're not giving the process of legislation ample time to deal with how you build better legislation. A good example of that is what has happened under the changes you're making to the pension act. The government said they're bringing in a bill to deal with budget matters. Instead, they've slid into the bill changes to the pension act and, as a result of that, the government is making changes to the pension act that are not, in my view, budget matters but more a gift to employers to be able to rob pension surpluses from pensions that exist.

I see the government members shake their heads. I know they're shaking their heads because I can hear them rattling from over here. I ask members to read their own legislation. The legislation is very clear: it says that the employer is going to get some ability to withdraw funds from Ontario pension surpluses under certain circumstances, and no circumstances specifically will deal with what to do with partial and full windups of pension plans. I make the argument, as I did at the very beginning, that a pension is money in lieu of wages given to employees for the work they do on behalf of the employer. When we go to the bargaining table to negotiate on behalf of members we represent in the union movement, often we say, "Rather than giving an extra 5 cents or 10 cents an hour over the next couple of years, we'd like to take that money and put it into a better pension plan."

So to suggest that the employer should be given a unilateral right to take a pension holiday or to withdraw pension surpluses in the case of a partial or full windup of pension plans is in effect taking money out of the pockets of the employees. I would say that the government is wrong-headed in doing so and what the government needs to do is withdraw that section of the bill and let that stand alone in its own piece of legislation so it can undergo the full scrutiny of the public. The problem we have with this is that this bill will become law after three days of second reading, minimal days at hearings and one day of third reading. Nobody's going to have an opportunity to do anything about it because of the way the government rams legislation through the House.

We cannot allow those types of changes to happen because, quite frankly, they're aggressive; they're changes that really tilt the balance in favour of the employers. I say again that you will rue the day you made those changes to the Pension Benefits Act because I know that in discussions I've had with many people within the pension field, especially members of pension plans, they don't take very kindly to people who decide, for whatever reason—in this case, the Conservative government—to allow people to scoop money out of pension plans that doesn't rightfully belong to them.

That's why I would repeat again that what we need to do is take a look at some of the ideas we're putting forward as the NDP, which basically say we should deal with pensions in a positive way. We should allow for full portability of pensions, that all workers in the province of Ontario have the right to a portable pension plan that says wherever you work in the province of Ontario or wherever you go, your pension comes with you. We should be allowing that to happen as a matter of dignity for workers, which recognizes that in today's workplace, people don't work at any one place for 25, 30 or 35 years; most people work for the same employer for less than a couple of years. So what we need to do is make sure that we change the pension regime in the province of Ontario so that workers, no matter where they work, on the first day they walk into their employer, are covered by a pension plan and they are automatically vested so when they retire, they're able to bring all of those pension credits, are able to accumulate them to build a better pension plan so they're able to retire at the end with some dignity.

With that, I'd like to thank you for this time to debate. I'm looking forward to the comments made by the members opposite with regard to what I've laid out today in my speech.

The Acting Speaker: It is now time for members to take up to two minutes for questions and comments.

Mr Chudleigh: The member suggests that we on this side of the House should read the legislation. I would suggest that the member opposite should also read the legislation, and not just the summary on the inside of the front page. I would direct his attention specifically to section 79.1 and 79.2, and don't confuse the two when you're talking about pensions.

The government is moving to protect the pension benefits of all current and former employees by protecting the long-term viability of pension plans and their surpluses. Nothing in this legislation affects the earned benefits of pension plan members or retirees. The purpose of the legislation is to provide more flexibility in how employees, employers and the plan members negotiate surplus-sharing agreements, which were severely restricted by a recent court case.

The new surplus provisions introduced by this budget bill provide that employers may withdraw surpluses from a pension plan only at a time when there is an agreement in place. If there is no agreement in place on how that surplus has to be withdrawn, then the current employers' employees have to vote by a two-thirds majority to agree to any surplus windup of a partial plan, plus former employees of the plan must also vote in a two-thirds majority in order to allow the windup and the removal of funds from any plan.

I can't see anything in there that would be detrimental to any employee or former employee of any pension plan in Ontario. Very, very few pension plans in Ontario do not have an agreement in place as to how those surpluses are dealt with. So I would recommend that the member spend some time reading the full document, not just the Coles Notes version.

Mr Dave Levac (Brant): I appreciate the opportunity to discuss what the member for Timmins-James Bay has been talking about. I compliment him on his passion and concern for the employees, past and present, regarding their pensions. I would assume that everyone in this place is deeply concerned about making sure that the people of the province of Ontario who have made contributions to any pension plan are protected in terms of anyone having the authority or the right to remove those funds without input from those particular employees who, over the years, have accumulated that pension under the promise to themselves and their families that that's why they're doing it, to protect themselves and their families down the road when they've finished their work careers.

I also compliment the member for Toronto Centre-Rosedale, who earlier spoke with passion about this issue to make sure we're doing the right thing in this particular piece of legislation. One of the concerns I have that I would like to express is that the members on the other side are saying, "Don't worry about it. It's taken care of. You're misinterpreting everything we're saying." The fact is, when they say, "Make sure you read the details," when we do go over them and point out some of the concerns we have, it's very few times that I've seen it when the government says, "Yes, we did make a mistake. It's going to be used for another purpose."

I saw evidence of that today, believe it or not, in the discussion at committee of Bill 179. After consultation with the people from the affected areas, they finally stepped forward and said, "The idea you're presenting is going to cause us some problems, and you need to withdraw it." Guess what? The government actually passed an amendment to withdraw the section that was offensive and actually was going to cause more harm and destruction. I'm hoping the same thing is happening with Bill 198, in terms of all of the stuff we've counted, and we know we've announced to the government time and time again the record number of time allocations—and I mean record; Guinness would be very proud of this government—that have been used and the lack of real analysis. I'm hoping they do that.

Mr Wayne Wettlaufer (Kitchener Centre): I'd like to direct my comments to the comments the member made insofar as automobile insurance is concerned. For more than a generation, the level of rhetoric that the NDP has raised toward the automobile insurance industry has designated automobile insurance to be an art form, under their interpretation. It's a very complicated subject, and it's one with which I am intimately familiar. I have travelled to Bermuda, I have spoken with international insurers and re-insurers about the problem facing Ontario automobile insurance companies. The member said, "Why don't they leave the province of Ontario if they're not making any money?"

Speaker, I submit to you that they are, in fact, leaving the province of Ontario. Some of them have actually gone out of business, and some of the foreign carriers are leaving the province of Ontario. It is impossible to purchase terrorism insurance in Ontario since September 11 because the insurance companies are losing so much money that they are not even providing terrorism coverage, not just on automobile insurance, but on homeowner's and commercial insurance. Anybody who's watching this is painfully aware how little the NDP understands about insurance. Unfortunately, their rhetoric has made it seem that anybody can understand automobile insurance in the province of Ontario. It is a very difficult and complex topic. If they had embarked on the level of rhetoric toward doctors in this province to the extent that they have automobile insurance, they would have everybody in Ontario believing that doctors are crooks. We know that's not true. The NDP should learn a little bit about from where they are speaking.

Mr Ernie Parsons (Prince Edward-Hastings): I'm pleased to speak to this. I would mention that I've noted a number of stories in the media lately from doctors in Ontario who are concerned about how this current government is treating them as crooks, coming in and saying, "You're not doing enough paperwork, so we'll take the money back." So now we have doctors filling out forms rather than serving patients. I can understand the need to simplify things, and I wish the government would start, but instead things get complicated in this world.

I look at Bill 198, a fairly massive document, and certainly we've had a lot of discussion about the pension portion of it. We need to get over the mindset from this government that working families are the enemy, that they don't know how to handle money and others will do it for them, because it is absolutely insulting and wrong.

I look at this bill, and there's one very intriguing comment in it under "Pension Benefits Act." I'm sure that we all, as politicians, are interested in hearing comments from the public as to whether part of an act is good or bad. One sentence in here—it's one paragraph consisting of one sentence—says, "An amendment to section 55 of the act permits employers to suspend or reduce their contributions to a pension plan in prescribed circumstances." What does that mean? It permits employers to suspend or reduce their contributions. We seem to be living in an era now where we can rewrite history, and this government seems to be focusing on rewriting legislation back 10 years ago or more. It's an absolute affront to justice when people make comments, participate in a pension plan and have negotiations, never imagining that 10, 12 or 14 years from now someone will come back and change it.

I don't believe it is sound practice or even morally correct to make things retroactive. What happened up to a minute ago is now history. We're now dealing with what happens today. This small portion of the bill very clearly needs to be put out for public consultation and public education on it as to what is being snuck in here.

The Acting Speaker: The member for Timmins-James Bay now has up to two minutes to respond.

Mr Bisson: The member for Prince Edward-Hastings responded to the point that I was going to respond to from the member for Halton, which is that we should take time to read the legislation. I just want to point out that we have taken time to read the legislation. That's how we found out what was in it in regard to pensions. Not only have we read the legislation, but we've given the legislation to people who are much more learned about these issues, I would argue, than any of us in the Legislature. We've given it to people in the legal profession who deal with pension legislation on a day-to-day basis, and their interpretation is exactly as we fear, which is that this legislation gives employers a right to withdraw pension surpluses out of pension plans in the event of a windup or partial windup.

I argue that if that's the case, we would never have been able to negotiate half-decent pensions for many people around this province, because the pension surplus often is what we use to be able to negotiate a better benefit when it comes to being able to pay for those better benefits.

The other thing this legislation does, under section 171 of the bill, is that it basically says an employer can take a pension holiday if there's a surplus in a pension plan. I argue that if you do that, you'll never be able to build a better pension plan and people will not be able to retire in dignity, as they should have the right to do. So at the bare minimum, we argue that this part of the legislation should be taken out altogether and the government should not include that in this particular bill.

The member for Kitchener Centre says the NDP should learn something about auto insurance. It seems that we learned quite a bit in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. What we learned was that when public auto insurance is in place, people pay less. That's what people have found out in the case of public auto. I agree that as a government we should have done it between 1990 and 1995; no argument. But don't make an argument to me that somehow what we have in Ontario is better, because all I know is that we pay far more than they pay in most provinces.

The Acting Speaker: The floor is now open for further debate.

Mr Chudleigh: The member opposite knows full well that publicly paid-for auto insurance is subsidized through the tax system one way or another. If the rates don't go up, the taxpayer is paying for it in other ways. But he knows that.

I rise very proudly to talk about Bill 198 today, because Keeping the Promise for a Strong Economy Act (Budget Measures), 2002, is a wonderful bill. I rise today on the great potential impact this vital piece of legislation is going to have. It is an act with a very broad scope. It is an act with a very broad vision and a broad range of beneficiaries. It is an act with the potential to improve the lives of Ontarians in all income tax brackets, in all business sectors, and in all regions of the province.

It is a necessary act so that our government can move forward with our commitment to our province, that of ensuring Ontario is the best jurisdiction in North America to work, to live, to invest and to raise a family.

Today I would ask for your support for Bill 198. I am asking you to support reduced pressures on auto insurance rates for Ontario drivers. I'm asking you to support better and faster treatment for auto accident victims, especially including children. I'd ask you to support tough new rules and penalties for malfeasance in our capital markets. I'd ask you to support new financing tools for municipalities through opportunity bonds and tax incentive zones. I'd ask you to support increased investment and job creation. I'm sure there isn't anyone here who wouldn't support that, as you would all want to support a robust economic growth in this wonderful province.

Your support of this act will ensure Ontario remains the brightest star among North American economies.

My colleagues will outline for you in greater detail some of the headline initiatives that Bill 198 would, if approved, implement.

I would like to take a broader view of this legislation. I would like to show you why it is important to support the Keeping the Promise for a Strong Economy Act, 2002, by highlighting how every Ontarian in virtually every corner and walk of life in this province stands to benefit from the measures that it proposes.

First, let's talk about auto insurance. To begin, Bill 198 would implement reforms to Ontario's auto insurance systems, reforms that would provide greater protection to consumers and help improve the system for everyone who uses it. If approved, the act would expand the legal rights of innocent victims with serious and permanent injuries to sue for damages in excess of no-fault insurance benefits. It would also expand the rights to sue for damages to cover health care costs for injured children. It would introduce treatment guidelines for minor injuries such as whiplash to help promote quicker access to proper treatment by eliminating the need for prior approval. It would also improve industry competitiveness by providing measures to streamline operating costs.

We are committed to keeping auto insurance premiums competitive, while providing more support for consumers. Quite simply, all Ontario drivers would stand to benefit from this commitment and from the measures proposed in this act.

Secondly, we would like to promote investor confidence. Bill 198, if approved, would implement reforms, among the toughest in Canada, to punish wrongdoing and protect investors in our capital markets. These measures would include tougher penalties to ensure compliance with Ontario's securities laws: maximum court fines for general offences would increase to $5 million from the current $1 million, and maximum prison terms would increase to five years less a day from the current two years; new powers that would give the Ontario Securities Commission the authority to impose administrative fines of up to $1 million for securities law violations and order that offenders give up the amounts they have gained through these violations; stronger powers for the Ontario Securities Commission to review the information that public companies disclose to investors; greater clarification of offences such as securities fraud and market manipulation, and for making misleading or untrue statements; broader rights for investors to sue if companies make misleading or untrue statements or fail to give full and timely information; and finally, new rule-making powers for the Ontario Securities Commission to hold CEOs and chief financial officers accountable for the accuracy of their financial statements. This will give investors much more confidence when doing business in Ontario.

Our government believes business and investors alike deserve a consistent framework within which to grow and invest. Through the measures announced in this act, if passed, we will ensure even higher standards of consumer protection and business practices, making Ontario a trusted destination for investment and business.

Thirdly, we're introducing in this bill opportunity bonds and tax incentive zones. Strong cities, towns and rural communities are vital for achieving continued economic prosperity.

Our government recognizes that. The challenges faced by the sprawling metropolises of this great province are quite different from those faced by small towns in rural Ontario. The financing tools traditionally available to each of these sizes of communities have not served them well or equally.

Among the many initiatives included in this act is legislation that would allow the province to provide opportunity bonds and create tax incentive zones for municipalities facing pressing infrastructure and economic development challenges. Both these initiatives complement the Smart Growth agenda of helping municipalities with their infrastructure needs and becoming more attractive to investment and as a place to live, whether you live in small-town Ontario or in the metropolises of Toronto, Ottawa, Hamilton, London or Thunder Bay.

Opportunity bonds are a tool to raise low-cost financing that would assist Ontario municipalities that need to make significant improvements to their infrastructure over the coming years. Opportunity bonds would allow municipalities to finance long-term capital projects with long-term financing. They would also benefit investors in that they would offer investors an income tax exemption on the interest earned on the bonds, as well as an attractive rate of return with a large degree of safety. The last municipality in Ontario that was insolvent was back in the 1930s, so it's a tremendous track record and a very safe investment tool. Opportunity bonds would provide Ontarians with an opportunity to invest in the quality of life in Ontario, thereby making an investment for themselves and their families.

Establishing tax incentive zones in Ontario is another important initiative that would stimulate investment in Ontario communities. By declaring an area a tax incentive zone, businesses would be encouraged to invest, locate or expand there to help support economic growth and job creation.

To develop the program, the government has been consulting with community and business leaders since early September on how to design and implement a program that works for communities experiencing challenges in attracting investment and jobs. It's been a very interesting process to travel across Ontario and listen to the people in small-town Ontario, in medium-sized Ontario and in large cities in Ontario and how they view the economic challenges they face. Small towns face infrastructure problems that large cities might take for granted. Large cities have no idea of the challenges faced by small communities. Designing a program that takes into account the needs of all those different-sized communities is one that has been truly challenging and extremely interesting, and we look forward to brining those regulations in and seeing how that balance between the large and small communities can be enhanced to ensure that the viability throughout Ontario for all sizes of communities and all jurisdictions can be met and indeed enhanced.

We recognize that many communities have been actively pursuing economic development opportunities and would welcome the opportunity to use a tax incentive program to further these efforts. Opportunity bonds and tax incentive zones are tools that, if approved, will support the implementation of the government's Smart Growth strategies to build strong, vibrant and prosperous communities across this province, from one end to the other.

This act would allow the province to put in place a program that would allow municipalities to invest prudently in improving and maintaining their infrastructure. The direct beneficiaries would be the people who live in these towns and cities, wherever they may be in Ontario, but we believe the broader positive effects, including economic growth and increased investment opportunities, will be felt by Ontarians across this province. I would urge your support for Ontario's cities, towns and rural communities, and I would urge all members in this House to support those communities from which they come by supporting Bill 198.

Fourthly, the delayed tax cuts are another aspect of this bill, and they've created some conversation and some controversy over the past few weeks. One of the measures included in this act is the proposal to delay certain tax cuts for one year. As you know, this proposal was first announced in the 2002 Ontario budget last spring and has generated its fair share of attention since that time. Some have questioned the motivation for delaying previously announced tax cuts and have also questioned the government's commitment to reduced taxes. I would like to make our motives and commitments very clear. The delay is in response to a temporary fiscal challenge resulting from last year's economic downturn and affects only scheduled cuts to personal and corporate income tax. This delay is for one year only. The planned rate reductions to personal and corporate income taxes and the phase-in of the equity in education tax cut would recommence January 1, 2004. I repeat: the planned rate reductions to personal and corporate income taxes and the phase-in of the equity in education tax credit would recommence on January 1, 2004.

By 2004, Ontario's additional 20% personal income tax cut would be delivered. Once it is fully in place, Ontario's marginal tax rate would be the lowest among all provinces for individuals earning less than $60,000 a year. By 2006, Ontario's corporate income tax rate cuts would be fully implemented. As a result of these cuts, Ontario will have the lowest general combined corporate income tax rate of any province or any state in the US.

Clearly, tax cuts continue to be on the province's agenda. The delay we are proposing is only a delay, and only for one year because of our short-term economic and fiscal situation. The province's long-term goal remains the same. The proposed one-year delay would not impair Ontario's tax cut plan. We abide by the proven notion that cutting personal income tax and business tax leads to significant long-term productivity and growth, and nowhere is that more evident than in the one million new jobs that have been created by the private sector in this province since 1995, the direct result of cutting taxes, both personal and corporate, along with the employer health tax as well.

We are pursuing the development of a new multi-year tax reduction plan that would include the next steps toward eliminating the capital tax and Ontario's income tax surtax. We are laying the groundwork for continued tax cuts for next year and the years beyond.

In the meantime, we are continuing with certain other tax cuts. Because nearly half of all new jobs are created by small business, we are continuing with already planned reductions in the corporate tax rate for small business. Due to the importance of mining to the northern Ontario economy, planned reductions in the mining tax rate will also go ahead on schedule. And in order to remove another 50,000 people—50,000 people—from the income tax rolls in Ontario, we propose to enrich the Ontario tax reduction program, bringing to 745,000 the number of Ontarians who no longer pay any provincial income tax whatsoever. We would challenge the federal government to match that number.

The next step in these tax cuts would be implemented as scheduled on January 1, 2003, a few short weeks from now. Of course we'll all have our Christmas shopping finished by the time that tax cut is implemented.

The current state of the Ontario economy is proof that past government policies are working well. Ontario's real gross domestic product increased by 1.7% in the first quarter of 2002. Private sector forecasters on average expect Ontario to grow by a robust 3.6% in 2002, accelerating to 3.7% in 2003. The unemployment rate is down to 7.3% and housing starts are up 15% from September 2001. Judging from the economy in the Halton area, I think most of that 15% has taken place in the towns of Milton, Georgetown, Acton, Oakville and Burlington.

Consumer confidence is up 21.9%—almost 22%—from October 2001. Since 1995, 613,000 fewer Ontarians depend on welfare. That number continues to grow as the number of people dependent on welfare continues to shrink in Ontario. The measures included in Bill 198 would help ensure that this positive environment of growth and prosperity continues.

Community small business investment funds: a very important aspect for job development in Ontario. We are proposing to extend the deadline for registering new community small business investment funds for an additional year, from December 31, 2002, to December 31, 2003. This would allow the program to continue to raise venture capital for small business, especially in the areas of university and hospital research commercialization where it has been very successful.

As well, this bill talks about school bus safety incentives. We've talked about Ontario's towns and cities, taxpayers of all income brackets, businesses, both large and small, and motorists. This act also addresses the needs of children who ride on certain school buses. Bill 198 would extend the Ontario school bus safety tax incentive from May 4, 2002 to December 31, 2005.

This incentive was first introduced in the 1999 Ontario budget as a result of the province adopting a new standard for school buses developed by the Canadian Standards Association. This incentive provides a 30% deduction for the capital cost of acquiring a new school bus for use in Ontario and has successfully encouraged school bus operators throughout this province to replace old buses with new ones that meet these new safety standards.

Our government is committed to providing the children of this province with the tools they need to grow into the leaders of tomorrow.

Among the measures proposed in Bill 198 are a number of administrative refinements to various acts and other general housekeeping amendments. The proposed housekeeping measures included in Bill 198 would repeal obsolete provisions, refine terminology, update references and clarify the application of definitions.

It is true that such measures are not the stuff of headlines, but they are the hallmark of a responsible, prudent and accountable government. Our government is committed to reviewing policies and procedures on a regular basis to ensure the efficient and effective use of taxpayers' dollars.

There you have it, Mr Speaker. I have stated my reasons for supporting the Keeping the Promise for a Strong Economy Act, 2002. As I mentioned earlier, it is an act with the potential to improve the lives of Ontarians in all income tax brackets, in all business sectors and all regions of the province. By supporting Bill 198, you will be supporting our province, our prosperity, our children and our future.

The Acting Speaker: Members now have up to two minutes for questions, comments.

Mr Pat Hoy (Chatham-Kent Essex): I'm pleased to rise and make some comments. I did note that the member opposite spoke about incentives for school buses. I suspect that is a good idea. There are some 16,000 school buses in Ontario and from time to time I'm sure they need repair. Those of us who live in agricultural communities and others recognize that one cannot repair machinery over and over again. There comes a time when upon putting the second, third and fourth motor in a bus, for example, you're going to have to replace it with a new piece of equipment.

I've talked to bus operators in terms of bus transit who have run into this exact problem for their local needs whereby they have repaired the bus so many times, two and three times over with motors, transmissions etc. That's very well and good, but at some time the buses need to be replaced in total and modernized for various reasons.

I would have liked to have heard the member opposite say that the government was going to enact Bill 112, a school bus safety bill that would have allowed for the identification of those who offend the law by passing a school bus when the red lights are flashing. Members here know that that bill has been brought to this Legislature five times, on two occasions, and currently has received second reading and support from all sides of the House. I would urge the government—and was hoping they were going to say, "Yes, we're going to replace school buses and provide some kind of incentive for the purchase or repair of school buses." But we need a law to protect the children who ride on the 16,000 school buses each and every day, and of course Bill 112 would provide the conviction mechanism that's required to protect the over 810,000 children who ride our school buses daily.

Mr Bisson: To the member for Halton, to get up and rhyme off that Bill 198 in no way, shape or form puts in danger people's life savings by way of pensions I think is really beyond the pale.

The member says, "If you only took time to look at the legislation, you'd see that what we're really doing here is protecting workers and their pensions." The reality is that if you'd read the legislation, you'd find out it does exactly the opposite. It does away with the current regulation in this province that says, "If there are any surpluses that exist inside a pension plan and the employer is in a position of having had a layoff or plant closure and a partial or full windup has to be done on the pension plan," it basically does away with current regulations that say, "You can't take any money out of the pension plan without the permission of the plan members."

What you're doing is putting in place a regime that says, "Under certain circumstances, the employer is going to be allowed, in the case of windups and partial windups, to take surpluses out unilaterally, provided they apply to the pension board."

Second, you're allowing the employer to have pension holidays. It means that if you work for an employer who happens to have a situation of a pension surplus, that employer will be able to unilaterally say, "I'm not making any pension contribution, because there is a pension surplus in the pension plan. I don't have to put any more money into the plan until that over-contribution, which is basically the surplus, is taken care of." I'm saying that if you allow that to happen, the effect of that is that employees will not be able to negotiate better pensions, because far too often the only way we can get the employers to agree at the bargaining table to increase a benefit is by way of the surplus that exists in a plan. If you're going to allow a mechanism for the employers to take away those surpluses, either by way of a pension benefit holiday or by way of taking out surpluses, you're not going to be able to allow those employees to get better pension plans. I say, that's wrong. I say, take it out of the legislation. If you do so, at least you'll do something right in this bill.

Mr Rob Sampson (Mississauga Centre): I'm pleased to spend a couple of minutes here to speak about the bill and, more specifically, the auto insurance components that our member from Halton and some members as well have already spoken to.

To the NDP, I must say they are at least consistent in championing public auto. At least, I think they're consistent in championing public auto. They championed it for a while and then, as you got closer to the election, unchampioned it, and now you're back on it again. That's all right. Their point is reasonably consistent: that somehow public auto is a cost-saver. "See the rates in BC, Quebec, Manitoba and Saskatchewan," they say. What they don't tell you is that of course you need to also take a look at the public health care system in those provinces as well, which picks up the lion's share of the health costs associated with auto accidents. That doesn't happen here, but it happens there and never shows up in the premium. You can't really see the full story by taking a look at just one of the chapters.

Mr Bisson: You want to subsidize the private sector.

Mr Sampson: I say to my colleagues across the floor that the initiative you see in this particular legislation is actually recommendations and suggestions that have come forward from a consortium of people involved in delivering automobile insurance: those selling it, those providing the health care system and services to those who are involved in accidents, and those who are actually charged with the responsibility of designing and implementing the various insurance products that we have in this province. It's a consortium that has been developing for a number of years. I dare say, in 1995 when we first looked at auto insurance, it was not there, but it is here now. That's why we have on the table here as part of this bill some interesting amendments that will actually benefit consumers, since that is where this group is now focused.

Mr Bruce Crozier (Essex): I want to direct my comments to those made by the member from Halton with regard to pensions. He would dismiss the changes this bill brings forward as something not to worry about. He would tell those employees who are fortunate enough to have pensions in this province, "Don't worry. This isn't going to hurt you. We're going to allow companies to take surplus money out of pension plans. That's OK. It won't hurt you."

I go to the point of one of my other colleagues. Many times over the years surpluses in pension plans were used to enhance those pension plans. I don't think those surpluses will be there any more to do that. We have changes in the economy. A few years ago there may have been surpluses in pension plans because the stock market was good. I take it that these days there are a lot of plans that don't have surpluses.

So what I think the government has to do, if they feel that way, is to communicate it and have public hearings so the public can address their concerns about it. For example, I know all of us are receiving a substantial number of e-mails, because I can see the addresses on the top of them, about the public's concern on this. I'll read just one letter of many from a concerned constituent who says:

"I am writing to inform you that I represent many former employees of the Johnson and Johnson medical Products plant that closed in Peterborough in 1998 and moved to Mexico, first partially winding down and further fully winding down the pension plan for hourly employees.

"I urge you not to support this legislation, as it will allow Johnson and Johnson to run away with the surplus of the pension plan that the workers' contributions helped build in the same fashion as Johnson and Johnson ran away with their jobs."

There is concern there.

The Acting Speaker: The member for Halton has up to two minutes to respond.

Mr Chudleigh: I'd like to thank the member for Chatham-Kent Essex for his reasoned response about supporting school buses. A very important part of our government and of this House is to protect the leaders of tomorrow, one of our most important resources, the children of this great province. I thank him for his comments, and of course the member for Mississauga Centre and his reasoned and level support for our auto insurance.

However, the members from Timmins-James Bay and Essex talked about my comments regarding the pension plan. I don't know, you can check Hansard tomorrow, but I don't believe I mentioned the word in my speech. Let me reiterate very clearly, and you have to read sections 79.1 and 79.2, those two sections and understand them, understand that they are different. There is nothing in this legislation that affects the earned benefits of pension plan members or retirees. Nothing. Sorry. There isn't any bogeyman hiding in the closet.

In fact, if you are going to remove or wrap up a pension plan, you can't do it under this legislation unless you have a two-thirds majority from the people in the pension plan—the employees—and a two-thirds majority from the people who are already on pension—the retirees. I think if you get a two-thirds majority from the employees and a two-thirds majority from the people already retired, I don't think they are going to be hurt too badly by that agreement. They're agreeing to it by a two-thirds majority. What could be safer for a pension plan than to have that in place to ensure that pensioners and people who are going to go on pension in the future are going to be protected? That's what this legislation does: it protects the future of those pensioners.

The Acting Speaker: The floor is open for further debate.

Mr Crozier: I am pleased to spend some time this afternoon debating Bill 198. I am particularly pleased to have the opportunity to debate this bill early in the process because I fully expect that within a very few days there will be a motion to limit debate on this. Very likely, part of that motion will be to minimize public hearings, if any, and I suspect part of that motion may be that there not even be any third reading debate, if that follows the pattern this government has followed recently. Therefore, in this Legislature these days, you have to get your name on the speakers' list early, because chances are you won't have the opportunity to speak to it.

Bill 198, An Act to implement Budget measures and other initiatives of the Government, certainly is a bill that's going to address other initiatives of the government, because it amends some 28 acts. It's a so-called omnibus bill of some 146 pages.

Interjection.

Mr Crozier: I heard a comment from over there. I'm sure what he said was, "It's not really an omnibus bill; it's an ominous bill," because we should be concerned about all that might be contained in this bill.

There are certainly parts of it that should be dealt with separately. I think the pension sections of the bill should be dealt with separately. The challenge I gave to the government—in fact, I didn't even comment at this point as to whether those amendments are right or wrong. What I said to the government was, "You should, number one, communicate what it is you want to do, because there are a significant number of people in this province who are concerned about those pension amendments. So through public hearings, you give them the opportunity to bring those concerns to you, and you have the opportunity to convince them that you're doing the right thing." I think therein lies the problem, because I think you might have a very, very difficult time convincing people that you're doing the right thing.

He says there are no bogeymen in this bill. Again, not being a gambling person, I still would be willing to bet that there are, that there are some hostages in this bill that, even through the work we've done on it up till now, we may not know about, but there certainly will be.

This Eves-Harris bill is called a "budget bill," which sets economic policy and general direction for the government. So, since I oppose the policy and direction of this government, I have no hesitation in saying that I won't support this bill.

The budget bill proves that the Harris-Eves Tories promised things they couldn't deliver. They promised tax cuts, the Taxpayer Protection Act and balanced budgets without cutting services. Let's look at what they plan to do. In the corporate tax cut area, this budget continues the corporate tax cut, but it adjusts and delays the cuts until after the election. What we in the official opposition want to do is simply take the $2.2 billion in tax cuts to profitable corporations and get rid of them altogether. We think it's simply a bad economic policy.

My colleague Gerry Phillips has said on a number of occasions in this Legislature that there's no point in racing to the bottom. We have competitive tax rates in this province now. What's the point in being 25% below your competition? I doubt that there are many retail businesses in this province that go out and knowingly and on purpose put their prices 25% below those of their competition. Should they be competitive? Absolutely. Should we be competitive as a province? Absolutely. But what we think you should do with those $2.2 billion in tax cuts to profitable corporations, I say again, is invest them in a high-quality workforce, high-quality education and high-quality health care—by the way, I think our health care system attracts more business to this province from other countries than do tax cuts—and not just go for bargain basement corporate taxes.

The Taxpayer Protection Act: the Harris-Eves government, without some changes, would be breaking its own law. This proves again what we've been saying all along, that Ernie Eves will do anything to cling to power.

The member from Scarborough Centre went on about job creation, if I recall what she said, that there's been an increase in jobs every month, every year that this government has been in power and it's all due to tax cuts. If that's the magic answer, we could go to the point of saying, why have any taxes at all? And then things would really be booming. But I'll go to what you're doing. You're saying that tax cuts are the answer to a great economy, a booming economy, and yet you're delaying your own tax cuts. There's something wrong here. Either tax cuts are good and you should continue with them, and in fact maybe increase them, or tax cuts are bad and now you want to delay them. It's a little difficult for the public to figure out exactly what it is you're saying when you're so proud of these tax cuts and yet you've now decided to delay them. We know what it is. They've gotten themselves into a financial bind. That's what these tax cuts have done.

I can remember, for example, when I came here in 1993 and Michael D. Harris was sitting over to the left-hand side here and he stood up and told the government of the day, "This province is bankrupt." He went on and on about it. What did Harris do when he first got in? He gave a tax cut. I was in a retail business, a private business, for some 22 years. I was the financial officer of that business. I can't imagine that we would have taken—we didn't in fact take money out of that business if there was any concern about having a loss. There was never a concern about being bankrupt, but certainly we had to look at that business and say, "Can it afford a dividend at this time?"

That's one thing I've never been able to figure out about Mr Harris's philosophy—and now Mr Eves's philosophy, although he's delaying it—and that is, if the province were bankrupt, like a business which might be bankrupt, why for goodness' sake would you ever start out by giving a dividend? Why wouldn't you first put your fiscal house in order, take care of those things that need to be taken care of, like health care, like education, like the environment, and then, when you have those things in order, give the dividend to the people of Ontario?

This bill, in my view, is anti-democratic. I started out by saying it was an omnibus bill—there I go; I almost said "ominous" again—that covers some 28 acts. In our democratic charter for Ontario, Dalton McGuinty's democratic charter, we pledge not to bring in omnibus bills that deal with substantive issues. Certainly in this case the delaying of the tax cuts I think you would consider as a substantive issue; the changes to the automobile insurance in the province as a substantive issue; the changes that this will make to pensions in Ontario as a substantive issue. So there are only three instances out of some 28 acts that we think should be dealt with in bills that stand on their own. The auto insurance part of this act deals with three acts, as a matter of fact.

This bill deals with everything from auto insurance to electricity restructuring to tax policy. The bill implements measures, as we've been told, that were contained in the 2002 budget. The 2002 budget was brought in I think in May. Here we are in November, dealing with issues that we are told were part of the budget. I don't know where the government was in June and in September and in October and early November. Wait a minute; I do know where they were. They certainly weren't on the agenda that they had planned for. I don't think that this government has dealt with any substantial issues that they had on their agenda, if there was one, because this fall has been one that's been completely taken over by a government that completely mismanaged an issue, and their agenda, quite frankly, has been taken away from them.

Principally, the delay in corporate and personal income tax and the delay in the increase in the private school tax credit are of note. Again, we want to see not just a delay in the corporate tax cuts, but we want to do away with them altogether.

We also oppose the private school tax credit. Our education system is in dire need of funding. I too, like my colleague from Chatham-Kent Essex, have recently met with school bus operators. That's something I hope to deal with over the next few days or a week with the government. But there are parts of our education system that are in such dire straits that it's almost—I'm trying to choose my words carefully. I can't think of why the government at this time would consider giving, over a period of time, up to half a billion dollars in credits to private schools when our public school system is so much in need.

Here again, it goes to my way of thinking that what you should do is fix what you are responsible for today before you start to try and fix something else. Get the publicly funded education system in order before you go off doing something else. As a matter of fact, there are any number of so-called private schools that could come under the umbrella of the Education Act if they would apply the same rules that apply to our publicly funded education today. So there's an area where we think that half a billion dollars could be much better spent now in publicly funded education and, later, you can consider some other initiatives that you might want to take under your wing.

The legislation delays the government's planned personal income taxes as well. It makes significant changes to the system of settling auto insurance in the province and settling auto insurance debates. The tax cut delays confirm what we have been saying for some time, and that is that we can't afford the tax cuts at the present time. There are probably even more significant areas, more important areas in this province that need the funding that could be provided by some of these tax cuts. When I go beyond the thought of our health care system, our education system, I can think of, for example, the environment.

The environment has been significantly underfunded under this government. In fact, the cuts to the protection to the people in this province is only evidenced by the absolute tragedy that took place in Walkerton. If some of these tax cuts were eliminated, as opposed to delayed, that money could be put into safe water in this province. Municipalities are amongst the leaders when it comes to protecting their citizens and certainly don't dispute the need for safe water in this province.

I take the example of Pelee Island. Pelee Island at the present time, as a matter of fact, has charges against it from the Ministry of the Environment when it comes to their water system. How, for goodness' sake, are they ever going to be able to fix this without help from the government? I suppose these charges may very well result in fines. How can you pay fines when you can't raise the money, you don't have the assessment base to raise the money to repair the system in the first place? Pelee Island is just an example of a small community that's going to need a great deal of assistance. I suggest that these profitable corporations need that money a lot less than do small communities like Pelee Island.

The government says it's delaying the tax cuts due to a short-term fiscal problem. I hope the government isn't trying to solve its short-term fiscal problem by selling some $1.8 billion in assets, for example, like Hydro One. Because that's not only a short-term fiscal problem, it's being short-sighted in the way that you're going to solve this problem.

I want to take the last few minutes of my time to speak about auto insurance. As has been mentioned by several of the members, auto insurances rates, as we know, are up across the province an average of about 10%. I have to laugh at that, because I sent my renewal in August to the finance minister, Mrs Ecker; my insurance was up 47.6%. At first blush, I said, "Obviously, this insurance company doesn't even want my insurance." My friends across the way will understand this very well. There was no change in risk; I hadn't had any accidents or claims, I hadn't had any tickets and I was driving the same automobile—absolutely no change. Mine went up 47.6%. I can assume that it was underpriced to begin with; I'll accept that. But certainly not all of that 47.6% was simply underpricing. There are some initiatives in this bill that are going to try and address that. It's going to try to address fraud, because it's going to have a process laid out for soft tissue injuries, for example, so that there's a protocol that's gone through on the treatment of certain injuries, so that we don't go through a long and drawn-out and expensive process of settling those claims.

I tell the people of Ontario, in its attempt to limit fraud, unfortunately there are going to be some good, honest people who are going to be hit by it. I don't know whether these are the out-and-out solution to the problem. I guess, like changes in the past, time will tell. We thought we had this fixed a few years ago. That obviously is not the case. So there are going to be some people who are going to be caught in this.

There's also another part in this bill that says under the Compulsory Automobile Insurance Act, "The Minister of Transportation may enter into agreements authorizing one or more persons to collect and keep information, provided under subsection (3) on behalf of the registrar, and require those persons to provide the information." It always makes me nervous when an act like this says that "one or more persons" may collect and keep this information. We know what happened with the Province of Ontario Savings Office, and that was that some private information got out where it shouldn't have.

My final word on the auto insurance part of this bill is, if the people of Ontario expect that their auto insurance rates will go down—they won't. Auto insurance rates are going to continue to climb until we get it right in this province. I'm not so sure that we have it right in this bill, and it should be a separate bill so that we can discuss that issue fully.

The Acting Speaker: It being almost 6 of the clock, this House will stand adjourned until 6:45 pm this evening.

The House adjourned at 1755.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Monday 18 November 2002

ASSEMBLÉE LÉGISLATIVE DE L'ONTARIO

Lundi 18 novembre 2002

The House met at 1845.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

CONSUMER PROTECTION STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 2002

LOI DE 2002 MODIFIANT DES LOIS EN CE QUI CONCERNE LA PROTECTION DU CONSOMMATEUR

Resuming the debate adjourned on October 31, 2002, on the motion for second reading of Bill 180, An Act to enact, amend or revise various Acts related to consumer protection / Projet de loi 180, Loi édictant, modifiant ou révisant diverses lois portant sur la protection du consommateur.

Hon Doug Galt (Minister without Portfolio): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I would request that we have unanimous consent this evening that one hour be divided equally among the recognized parties for the purposes of tonight's debate. At the end of that time, the motion for adjournment of the debate will be deemed to have been made and carried and the Speaker shall adjourn the House. For the purposes of standing order 46, tonight's debate will be considered one full sessional day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr David Christopherson): You've heard the request for unanimous consent to place the motion. Is there agreement? It is agreed.

You've heard the motion. The motion is deemed to have been moved. All those in favour of the motion please indicate. Any opposed? Good.

Interjection.

The Acting Speaker: You're usually the source of trouble. The House leader for the third party.

Mr Peter Kormos (Niagara Centre): I'm standing to speak to this bill, sir.

The Acting Speaker: And I was going to give you the floor so you could do just that.

Mr Kormos: This is the remnant of 20 minutes of the leadoff that we commenced, I can't even recall how long ago now. I do want to tell you, though, I was in committee this afternoon when the justice committee considered Bill 179, one of this government's omnibus bills, its latest omnibus bill. The bill has appendices A through P, some 15 or 16 different schedules, if you will, to the bill that amended a huge number of acts. Yet with time allocation this government caucus, the Tories, the Conservatives—

Interjection.

Mr Kormos: New Democrats certainly didn't support the time allocation motion—sent this huge bill to committee for about 30 minutes of clause-by-clause consideration. Thirty minutes. That's been done before, but what was remarkable this afternoon in committee—and I counted them—was that every chair in room 151, the televised committee room, was occupied by civil servants. At first I thought there were only 30 of them because I just did a guesstimate, but then I counted them and there were over 40 in the committee room, every chair occupied, all with their briefing binders and the tabs, their big black leather briefcases and books and papers. When I went and took a look outside, there was another dozen at least, if not more, waiting outside. There were over 50 civil servants. I figured roughly, doing some rough calculations, you had around $3 million a year in salaries there of civil servants sitting inside and outside the committee room for about 30 minutes of clause-by-clause consideration.

This is supposed to be a red tape bill? Those 50 civil servants couldn't have introduced themselves in the 30 minutes the government allowed for clause-by-clause consideration. One of the government members—I of course felt compelled to mention to government members this huge number of civil servants, at great cost to the taxpayer. From a government that purports to be the friend of the taxpayer, I saw this huge flock of civil servants inside and outside the committee room. I felt compelled to mention it to the government members, and the response was, "Well, they're here in case you have any questions to put to them," all with their own area of expertise in view of the fact that the omnibus bill covered so many different pieces of legislation in so many different policy areas.

It was a little embarrassing, I suspect, for the civil servants. It also marred what otherwise would have been a productive day, I'm sure, for most, if not all of them. And it was downright silly to watch; again, an illustration of a government that says one thing and does another, an illustration of a government that really may have lost the direction it might have had, if it had a direction. I'm sure it did back in 1995. Oh, it had a direction all right. But the rudderlessness of the government is illustrated in so many other ways.

Here we have supposedly, finally, a new Consumer Protection Act for the province of Ontario. I went through it at some length last time we were talking about it. I did. Most of it's recycled legislation—same old, same old, a little bit of fine-tuning and refining. But when you look for any sort of core of real, meaningful consumer protection that's new, even if it's not new in other jurisdictions, for instance concepts around plain language in contracts, concepts around print size so that an increasingly aging population can in fact read what they're signing, there was nothing, not even what have become some of the most basic consumer protection issues in—even jurisdictions, quite frankly, leading jurisdictions in the United States. So the bill is pretty much, at this point—a part of me would love to say, "Why should we support the bill? We should vote against it." Yet at the end of the day the bill in itself is benign, but benign to the point where it becomes offensive. If this is the government's kick at the can when it comes to consumer protection, when the story is finally told, there isn't a whole lot of regard for consumers there because the real test comes down to the ministry itself.

My colleagues in the NDP caucus and I over the course of the last several years have had time, from time to time, have had the occasion, to call that ministry to get information about a consumer protection issue, to report what we believe might have been a violation of the existing consumer protection legislation, to get information about appropriate standards or whom we might call to conduct an investigation, and we find a ministry, the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations, the new ministry name now—perhaps it should be named, because it's certainly not the ministry it used to be.

It's a virtual ministry. It has privatized the biggest chunk of the regulatory function that it originally historically had done. It has participated, not entirely inappropriately in many circumstances but entirely inappropriately in others, gone the road of self-regulation of any number of bodies and groups. As I say from time to time, a self-regulatory regime is desirable at other times, but when public safety is at risk—you've had occasion to talk about this yourself; other members of the NDP caucus certainly have—it is probably inappropriate to promote self-regulation. Self regulation/privatization has never demonstrated itself to be in the public interest but very much in the service of private interests.

What is the number one consumer protection issue out there in Ontario right now, November 2002, and will be for some good chunk of time yet? It's folks like the folks down where I come from in Niagara Centre, Welland, Thorold, Pelham and south St Catharines who are being shafted royally on their electricity bills, who are getting ripped off, scammed, conned by door-to-door private electricity peddlers. If they weren't being gouged by them, they were being gouged by their own government: debt repayment on an asset that they weren't going to own any more; taxes on debt repayment; and electricity prices that skyrocketed through the roof. The biggest hoax that could ever be perpetrated on consumers is the McGuinty-Eves solution of rebates. What's going to happen is that taxpayers are going to be paying themselves, out of their own pockets; paying from, or borrowing from, Peter to pay Paul. Taxpayers are going to be called upon to subsidize the private profits of private sector for-profit electricity generators.

Taxpayers are going to be called upon to contribute public dollars, which are oh, so sorely needed by way of investment, be it in education, be it in health care, be it in—well, earlier today there was a pathetic announcement by the Ministry of Community and Social Services, a pathetic announcement regarding funding for IBI treatment for kids with autism, funding that isn't going to be provided in its entirety until five years is transpired, funding for IBI treatment that is not going to address the huge waiting lists of young boys and girls now across this province, like kids in every one of our constituencies, every one of our communities, be it the youngsters down in Niagara Centre that I have talked about, be it kids in the Hamilton area that you've talked about, be it young people that Shelley Martel or any one of our caucuses talked about day after day after day it seems in this Legislature, whose families are paying out $25,000 and $30,000 a year or more for privately funded IBI treatment because, you see, the waiting list is simply too long. You're only good on the waiting list until you're six years old because the treatment is available only to kids under six.

So what we've seen over and over again is kids on that waiting list for a year, two years, three years, and then their folks realize that child is turning six years old and won't be eligible for treatment anyway, even if he or she has sort of climbed up the ladder on the waiting list. Those families then have to dig into their own pockets. Those families have exhausted their resources, second and third mortgages on their houses; they've borrowed. We talked about a family just a while ago that was selling the family home for what little equity there was in it, in a desperate move to ensure that their kid has access to IBI treatment.

You see, the real issue shouldn't be an argument over the adequacy of funding. The real issue is whether or not it is proper for the Ministry of Community and Social Services to be funding this IBI treatment with the envelope-style funding that they've employed. In British Columbia the matter has been litigated and the British Columbia courts have determined that, yes, IBI treatment is medical treatment that young people should have access to under OHIP.

It shouldn't be a matter of a waiting list, it shouldn't be a matter of how much money there is in the envelope this year so that maybe 40% or 50% of the kids who need the treatment, whoever is lucky enough to be there first in the lineup, get it. It should be a matter of regarding autism as a medical condition that requires appropriate treatment, IBI being that appropriate treatment that can have huge positive impacts. But this government, rather than facing the issue, facing their responsibilities, rather than accepting responsibility, treats these kids and their families with disdain, contempt. I find that a sad, sad scenario.

We know now that this government has to scramble to find anywhere from 500 million to a billion bucks a year out of its public coffers to perpetrate the scam of its phony hydro rebates, to use public money for private profits. I can't help but think and believe that the money that could have gone to ensure that every child in this province with autism gets IBI treatment, the money that should have gone to that, is being rerouted by this government in a pathetic Band-Aid exercise to cover up its privatization deregulation monster.

And that is sad, sad indeed. Kids aren't getting IBI treatment because this government is still hell-bent on privatization and deregulation, wants to use those scarce tax dollars not to treat those kids, not to give them access to IBI treatment, but to effect a phony rebate scheme that will do nothing to lower the price of private, deregulated electricity, that will do nothing to halt its agenda of privatization and deregulation of Ontario Hydro. There is no protection for those people in this legislation. There's not even a hint of sympathy from these government members.

Last week was constituency week. We were in our constituencies. I was with Mayor Cindy Forster down in Stevensville visiting CAW workers northwest of Fort Erie, locked out of their plant—Ronal—a small workforce: done a good job, not particularly high-paid. At the bargaining table their requests of their employer were relatively modest, but they got locked out by a German-based boss who wants to bust the union just before Christmastime. You see, the workers simply want to get back to the bargaining table, and that German-based operator of Ronal wants to starve these people out as we enter the winter months with new household costs like heating bills and with a family occasion like Christmas coming. So these CAW workers are out there on a picket line—not a whole lot of trees or buildings down there in Stevensville to harbour them from the cold wind.

The question to be put is, where is this government when it comes to protecting the workers at Ronal, or the workers at Atlas Steel down in Welland, whose corporate owner has told them they're going to be shutting down the 10-1 mill, with a loss of anywhere from 150 to 200 jobs? Where's the protection for those people?

Over the course of the weekend, Speaker, I was out with some friends of yours, some workers, some trade unionists, auto workers and others down in St Thomas—Talbotville—kicking off their campaign to restore anti-scab legislation here in Ontario. You see, the reason bosses like Ronal know they can lock workers out—let me be a little more specific: Ronal makes those custom mag wheels, again an incredibly good product, due in every way to the skill and commitment of the workers. As a matter of fact, they had the contract for the production of the wheels for the new Volkswagen Beetle that was very popular. They're now making wheels for the Ford F-150 truck, a very popular seller. But Ronal wants to crush that union and make them compete with low wages from eastern Europe or Mexico. So the kinds of jobs the Ronal workers or the Atlas Steel workers have, value-added manufacturing jobs, wealth-creating jobs, are incredibly important, not just to them and their families but to our economy.

Oh, I've heard the stuff coming from this government, from some of the local Tory members down in Niagara about the new jobs in Niagara. Well, let me tell you this: you don't buy houses and cars with the salary or hourly wage you make in the service industry or in the hospitality industry. A whole bunch of members of the hotel employees' and restaurant employees' union down in Niagara Falls told me that a couple of nights ago when I visited them, as they're in the midst of contract negotiations with the Sheraton Foxhead and the Hard Rock Cafe. You don't send kids to university, least of all with the deregulated tuitions of this Conservative government, on the salaries you make in the service industry or the hospitality industry or quite frankly in the call centre industry.

Those jobs are important, not just to those workers but to our economy, and this government has shown no interest in protecting those workers. This government, this Premier, has shown no regard for the important role those workers, be they the locked-out Ronal workers, be they the Atlas Steel workers at threat of losing their jobs—a very realistic threat, I might add. This government has shown no interest in protecting them.

I was out in Talbotville at the kickoff of the CAW's restoration-of-anti-scab-legislation campaign. One of the things that was noted was that during the period of time when the NDP's anti-scab legislation existed in Ontario, there were fewer strikes or lockouts and they existed for a far shorter period of time because scab labour wasn't an alternative for the boss. That meant there was serious negotiating at the bargaining table and that meant that differences got resolved and contracts got signed.

This government—nor quite frankly the Liberals—appears to be particularly interested in protecting our workers, our good, hard-working men and women here in Ontario, from scabs stealing their jobs. The New Democrats care. The New Democrats will stand there with those workers. New Democrats remain committed to anti-scab legislation here in the province of Ontario.

New Democrats remain committed to maintaining and restoring the value-added manufacturing jobs, the high-wage jobs that make this economy historically—although we have seen that historical role eroded significantly during the course of the last seven years of Conservative rule—a prosperous one, where that prosperity is shared and where there is a working middle class.

This government is hell-bent on destroying the working middle class. There is nothing coming from this government by way of policy or agenda or legislation that constitutes any protection for that working middle class, for the high-wage worker who earns decent wages but works darned hard to do it, pays good taxes, fair taxes, and builds schools, hospitals and other public things that everybody shares and enjoys.

I suppose New Democrats will vote for this bill at the end of the day. As I say, it is relatively benign; it's benign perhaps to the point of offensive. This bill's failings illustrate the failings of this government when it comes to protecting the interests of real Ontarians.

The Acting Speaker: The floor is now open for further debate.

Mr Joseph N. Tascona (Barrie-Simcoe-Bradford): It's my pleasure to speak today in support of the proposed Consumer Protection Statute Law Amendment Act, 2002, Bill 180.

As you know, the bill introduced on September 26 proposes to consolidate six core consumer protection laws, including three proposed sector-specific statutes, into a single act, cutting red tape, bringing more clarity and consistency to Ontario's consumer protection rules, and encouraging a level playing field for businesses.

The bill, if passed, would extend consumer protection to services as well as goods. The service economy has grown to the point where almost half of our transactions involve services; for example, cable, cell phones, lawn care, home repairs. This legislation would make certain consumers are protected in these transactions. It would extend to protect leases. Leases used to be almost exclusively business-to-business arrangements, but now many consumers lease items such as cars and computers.

This legislation would ensure that consumers know the true cost of these leases. It would require clear disclosure. Many unscrupulous operators hide important information in fine print or use ambiguous language that is hard to interpret. The proposed consumer protection act, 2002, would help combat this by requiring that information be disclosed clearly and prominently, not hidden in fine print.

The proposed legislation also specifies that if the language in a contract provided by a business is ambiguous, it would be interpreted in the interest of the consumer. While it is always important for the consumer to read the entire contract before signing it, this provision would put less of the onus on the consumer to read the fine print, and require the business to be clear and up front.

It would also extend protection to the Internet. The Internet has grown tremendously in recent years, providing incredible speed and convenience and revolutionizing the way we do business. Three years ago, the ministry didn't even track consumer complaints about Internet transactions because there were so few of them. Now we receive about 250 complaints per year. Many consumers are still not confident in the safety and security of on-line shopping, creating a barrier to the growth of e-commerce.

The bill would extend the protections enjoyed by those who shop in their local stores to those who shop on the Internet. For example, it would require a contract for Internet sales, which could be in the form of an e-mail, which the consumer could retain just like a regular paper contract. The regulations under the bill would strengthen disclosure requirements so that consumers have more information to make a more informed choice.

For example, the vendor would be required to list a bricks-and-mortar address so that the consumer would know if the business they are buying from is located across the street or around the world. It would allow consumers to use the same common sense they use when making purchases in a shop.

We want to make Ontario a trusted destination for e-commerce. When Ontario is more widely recognized as a secure place to do business on-line, consumers will be more confident in shopping on Ontario-based sites, and more Internet business would be encouraged to set up in this province.

It would invalidate the negative option billing. Many consumers have complained about the practice of negative option billing. This occurs when you are billed for a good or service simply because you did not contact the business to opt out of it. This proposed legislation would require positive consent.

Combining the six consumer protection statutes into one would also make it much easier for consumers and businesses alike to understand and follow the law. The bill also includes proposed changes to three sector-specific laws—the Real Estate and Business Brokers Act, the Travel Industry Act and the Motor Vehicle Dealers Act—that would strengthen the regulation of some of the most significant purchases most consumers ever make: vehicles, homes and travel. These changes would provide supportive tools to regulators of the travel, real estate and automobile industries. Currently, these industries are regulated by the following delegated administrative authorities: the Real Estate Council of Ontario, also known as RECO; the Travel Industry Council of Ontario, also known as TICO; and the Ontario Motor Vehicle Industry Council, OMVIC.

The Real Estate Council of Ontario registers real estate agents and provides educational programs for professionals as well as public information for consumers. If passed, the proposed Real Estate and Business Brokers Act, 2002, will arm RECO with a code of ethics in the regulations to help further promote a currently booming real estate industry.

TICO performs functions delegated to it, including registering travel professionals, investigating any consumer complaints and operating the industry-sponsored Ontario Travel Industry Compensation Fund. If passed, the proposed Travel Industry Act, 2002, will assist the Travel Industry Council of Ontario in performing regulatory functions assigned to it, in order to help cultivate a stronger travel industry.

The Ontario Motor Vehicle Industry Council is a delegated, not-for-profit organization that administers Ontario's Motor Vehicle Dealers Act. If passed, the proposed changes to existing legislation would provide OMVIC with stronger rules specifically pertaining to disclosure and enforcement to help foster the growing motor vehicle industry.

I would like to take a moment to talk about the incredible growth in the real estate industry that makes it vital that this proposed legislation come into force, as more and more resale homes are bought and sold in this province. We know that the Ontario population is getting older. In this quarter century it's estimated that the number of people aged 65 and over will double from about one million in 2000 to approximately two million in 2026. These facts tell us that a lot of existing homes are going to be bought and sold as consumers' needs and wants change over time.

Already the sales figures are very impressive. The Toronto Real Estate Board reported the most sales ever for the month of September this year. In the Toronto area alone in that month, 5,846 homes were sold through the Multiple Listing Service, MLS, system. That's up 16% from last year, a major increase in the demand for the services of real estate professionals. Part of the reason for pursuing this proposed legislation is that our government wants to assure the high standards of real estate and business brokers, so that Ontario's consumers will continue to live in homes they enjoy.

The government has worked with consumers and with entrepreneurs in the real estate industry to help make Ontario the best place in North America to live, invest and raise a family. Modernizing Ontario's Real Estate and Business Brokers Act to meet the needs of the people of Ontario is part of the government's plan for the ongoing support of a vital industry and the continuation of a tradition of excellence in providing protection for Ontario's consumers.

While the real estate market is booming, the travel industry is trying to pick itself up after an unfortunate rough patch over the last year or so. Due to the difficulties experienced by the travel industry since the tragic events of September 11 and the bankruptcy of the Canada 3000 group of companies, the Ontario government brought in accelerated reforms.

Our government acted to support consumers and industry business alike. The changes announced in January this year were designed to enable travellers to access the Ontario Travel Industry Compensation Fund directly and allowed for an increase, from $3,500 to $5,000 per event for each individual, in claim limits for the failure of an airline or cruise line. Our changes also provided for claims that resulted from any event that occurred in the six months prior to September 11, including the failure of Canada 3000, to become eligible for payment from the fund. These changes have a double objective: to help consumers regain their money in the event of a failure and to help prevent travel agents from being bankrupted by consumers' claims.

These recent changes also help travel agents by permitting agents who reimburse consumers or arrange alternative travel at their own expense to claim reimbursement from the fund. Making the industry-sponsored compensation fund directly accessible to consumers for such situations helps the travelling public and supports an important sector of the economy. That is why we have proposed amendments to the Travel Industry Act in Bill 180. The proposed changes would harmonize provisions for inspection, investigation and enforcement with those in other registration statutes, support industry growth and, finally, further protect consumers.

Proposed changes to the Travel Industry Act include strengthening the legislation underpinning the Ontario Travel Industry Compensation Fund. In current consumer law, the compensation fund exists through regulations, but in the proposed amendments to the Travel Industry Act in Bill 180, known as the Consumer Protection Statute Law Amendment Act, 2002, the fund would be entrenched in the statute itself. Bill 180 would also give the registrar the power to deal with false advertising more strongly than the current legislation allows. For example, if a travel agent advertises a trip special that promises beachfront accommodations but delivers property that is close to the beach but has a line of condos between it and the water, the current legislation could address this by allowing the regulator to order that the advertising be stopped. False advertising would become a specific offence for travel businesses under Bill 180, thereby promoting consumer protection and fair competition between businesses. The proposed changes to the Travel Industry Act in the Consumer Protection Statute Law Amendment Act, 2002, would permit the registrar to order the correction of the ads, and the registrar could request that future ads also be submitted for review and approval prior to release.

Another key component proposed to the Travel Industry Act in Bill 180 is the importance of ensuring that fines are paid. The proposed changes include the ability to report any unpaid fine to a credit bureau. Consumers who make travel arrangements and purchases through registered travel firms enjoy strong protection. The proposed changes to the Travel Industry Act in the Consumer Protection Statute Law Amendment Act, 2002, would also address the importance of using an Ontario-registered travel agent. The proposed changes are meant to crack down on unregistered travel agents.

Another important area I'd like to talk about is time-shares. Many scams cause serious financial loss for victims. This is often the case with victims of unscrupulous time-share or vacation home sellers. Time-shares is another area that the proposed Consumer Protection Statute Law Amendment Act, 2002, would address. Consider this scenario. A couple attends a time-share presentation and is bombarded by promises of a glorious location, access any time they want etc from a very aggressive salesperson. Exasperated, they agree to buy. They make a $2,000 down payment and commit a further $8,000. The next day, they read the contract in greater detail and realize they won't be getting the location or time entitlement they had understood they would get based on the sales presentation. They try to cancel the purchase, but the seller refuses. They hire a lawyer to help them out, but after paying $1,200 in legal fees, can no longer afford to fight the claim.

Under current consumer law, time-shares are not defined and consumers do not have cooling-off rights. Under the proposed Consumer Protection Statute Law Amendment Act, 2002, time-shares would be clearly defined and consumers would gain a 10-day cooling-off period within which they could reconsider their purchase. This would help those who have been caught off guard by high-pressure sales tactics.

In the real estate, motor vehicle and travel sales sectors, Bill 180 would provide greater enforcement powers to shut down deceptive practices and discipline the perpetrators as well.

Under the proposed legislation, there would be authority to establish a code of ethics for these industries, as well as a discipline committee and an appeals committee. Registrants found to be in breach of their code of ethics could be fined up to $25,000 or a lesser prescribed amount. Broader enforcement powers would be available to address contraventions of these requirements, including compliance orders, restraining orders and orders to cease false advertising.

Because automotive spending is one of the largest sectors of consumer spending, and an important part of the Ontario economy, significant changes to the Motor Vehicle Dealers Act have also been proposed in Bill 180. If passed, it would be mandatory for automotive repair shops to give consumers estimates before charging for their work, whether consumers request them or not. If they fail to do so, the shop would not be able to charge for repairs done unless the consumer authorizes, in advance, a maximum amount they would be willing to pay.

The proposed Bill 180 would also provide better protection to the many consumers who lease their personal vehicles by providing for more information on the final cost of leases. If passed, the Consumer Protection Act, 2002, would bring rules regarding 30-day delivery and a 10% estimate cap to fruition so that consumers in today's competitive marketplace can enjoy increased protection.

A 30-day delivery rule is proposed so that if a good is not delivered or a service has not started within 30 days of the delivery or start date in the contract, the consumer is entitled to cancel the agreement.

A 10% estimate rule is proposed so that the consumer should not be charged more than 10% above the amount estimated in the consumer agreement. Such a requirement already exists for motor vehicle repairs; this bill would extend it to all sectors. This proposed 10% rule would make it easier for families who are trying to budget for big-ticket purchases such as home repairs.

Bill 180, as a whole, includes some key provisions. One of them is disclosure. The proposed Consumer Protection Act, 2002, would require that information for general goods and services purchased be disclosed clearly and prominently, not hidden in fine print. It would also specify that if the language in a contract provided by a business is ambiguous, it would be interpreted in the interest of the consumer.

The new remedies and enforcement options proposed in Bill 180 are: (a) increased maximum fines for a person who is guilty of an offence under the proposed Consumer Protection Statute Law Amendment Act, 2002; and (b) maximum fines would increase from $25,000 to $50,000 for individuals and from $100,000 to $250,000 for corporations.

Uniform limitation periods for commencing a prosecution would be set at two years for all of the statutes proposed in the bill. This is another example of consistency, because in existing legislation this limitation period varies from six months to three years. The court would be authorized to order that a convicted person make restitution. Under the Consumer Protection Act, 2002, the ministry would have the power to freeze assets and order a business to stop using false or misleading advertising.

In short, Bill 180 would help protect consumers by ensuring that they have enough information to make informed decisions and by providing clearer laws so that consumers and businesses know their rights and obligations.

This proposed bill was developed to be fair to consumers and businesses, to be easy to understand and enforceable and to be flexible enough to stay current in our changing world.

By strengthening protections for consumers in sectors such as travel, motor vehicle and real estate, we are helping businesses, because consumers feel more comfortable spending their hard-earned money in a marketplace they know is safe and secure.

Strong consumer confidence encourages a strong, thriving economy where businesses can grow and create jobs, and that is a major goal of the Ernie Eves government.

In the last little bit of time I have, I just want to say that what we're focusing on here is consumer protection by bringing out a uniform system in terms of how consumers can be best protected in this changing business environment. What we're looking at is uniformity, we're looking for disclosure and we're also looking to actually put forth that legal maxim where the party that prepares the document should not have that contract interpreted in their favour; it should be interpreted against them. That's one of the great protections that this bill is putting forth. It is certainly making sure that the contract would be interpreted in the consumer's favour. On those big-ticket items that families face in terms of motor vehicles, the travel industry and in home purchases, we're putting forth greater obligations on those associations in terms of codes of ethics and requirements on them to monitor their own industry.

With respect to the Internet industry and also dealing with time-shares and home repairs, I think the requirement with respect to the 30-day rule in terms of the delivery of the goods or services is obviously in favour of the consumer. Also, with respect to the 10% figure and what is being quoted to you, that obviously is in the protection of the consumer to ensure that they get a fair price, but also to make sure that they get the goods or services they want, because now this bill is going to deal with services. I think consumers are better protected and better off.

Mr James J. Bradley (St Catharines): I appreciate the opportunity to speak on the issue of consumer protection and, peripherally, on the provisions of this particular piece of legislation. First of all, I would say that when you are looking at a number of areas where people are concerned about being gouged or treated unfairly by others, particularly in businesses, one of the areas we looked to immediately is one that my colleague Bruce Crozier has raised a number of times in this House, and that is those who are retailers of gasoline. Really, they're at the mercy of the wholesalers of gasoline at the pumps in the province. No matter how many times I hear the representatives, the higher-ups in their organizations, tell me that there is true competition in gasoline retailing—and wholesaling, for that matter—I find it very difficult to believe. It's always interesting that, in your community or mine, all the gas prices seem to go up to the same amount. Nowadays, of course, everyone is conditioned to think that 68 cents is cheap, whereas four years ago when the gas busters were around, we would have thought that was very expensive.

So it seems to me that one area where we could be of much more assistance would be that area related to gasoline prices at the pump. I've watched them in my own community. You'll see them at 67.9—it's always at .9 when they start out—then all of a sudden they'll jump to 74.9 and people will wonder what rationale there could be for that. They'll read in the newspaper or hear through the electronic media that the price of petroleum in the world price has gone down, yet they'll see the price going up in their particular community. Where people are particularly vulnerable—that is, where there is not a great choice of gasoline stations—again, we see some drastic increases, and those prices are often sustained. Anyone who tries to tell us there isn't a co-operation at the very least, if not actual price fixing, in the gasoline field simply has no one out there who will believe them.

I know that case is made. And I'll get letters, as will some others who'll speak on this, from the people who are responsible for the gasoline companies. I feel sorry, I must say, for the retailers, the people who actually sell the gas to the consumer, because they are instructed as to the amount to charge for their gasoline. The people who are really in a vulnerable position are the people who are genuine independents that face some unfair competition. All of this is something that is concerning to people who are facing many new, additional and increasing charges for basic needs. We're not talking about frills here; we're talking about basic needs.

Now, I notice this particular bill deals with false advertising, and I'm pleased about that because I have seen emanating from the government of Ontario—I wouldn't say any member of this Legislature, because I would be in contravention of the rules of the Legislature—I have seen government advertising coming from the government that is represented by people on the other side which I would consider to be in a personal sense, as would many people in the province, false advertising. I hope that we could use the provisions of this legislation to in fact challenge that advertising.

We know that this government has now spent well in excess of a quarter of a billion dollars on government advertising. The latest is to advertise their new policy on hydro. We see the full-page ads in the newspaper. We see the television ads. We'll hear it on the radio. It'll be a multi-million dollar program designed to promote the government's position using your tax dollars—though you are, in another sense, a member of the New Democratic Party when you're not sitting in the chair. Members of the Liberal Party, people who have no affiliation, all must contribute to government advertising costs. That advertising is, for the most part, self-serving advertising, something to make the government look good in the eyes of the consumer or in the eyes of those who are watching the advertising.

Interjection.

Mr Bradley: This is from a government, I say to my good friend from Kitchener, that has a war chest that no one has ever seen. In other words, it is my understanding that the Conservative Party of Ontario has more money in its political war chest than any federal party does at this time. That of course is understandable, because their policies have been geared to the most powerful and the wealthiest people in the province.

Interjection.

Mr Bradley: The payback is the contributions that come in to the various constituency associations and to that huge fundraiser you have in Toronto where you have to open the additional walls of the convention centre so that you can get all those corporate types in to pay homage to you and to thank you for policies which have helped them at the expense of the consumer and the poor in this province. I know everybody on the other side would agree with this, otherwise I would expect during a two-minute response that I would be challenged on this, and somehow I don't think that's going to happen.

I see my friend the Minister of Health and Long-Term Care here with us today. He was a member—you'll remember this—of the gas busters. I remember this group. It was a photo opportunity. Somebody got a Polaroid camera out, took pictures of these people. CFTO made sure they were there; don't worry. Ken Shaw was there to be cheering you on, saying, "Look at the gas busters." The gas busters are out there somehow protecting the consumers. I was surprised to see that the price of gasoline did not come down, that there was a lot of barking that took place, like the dogs snapping at the vehicle as it's pulling away, but I didn't notice the price of gasoline come down. My friend Bruce Crozier tells me there was a report that came forward and some recommendations on what the provincial government could do in terms of gas prices, but—

Mr Bruce Crozier (Essex): It's gathering dust.

Mr Bradley: It's gathering dust, he tells me, at the present time.

I know those who were members of the gas busters team will be deeply disappointed that all of their photo opportunities and all of their hard work—because I know they worked very hard at getting those photo opportunities set up—turned out to do nothing for lowering the price of gasoline in this province. It was simply a public relations sham that a few media outlets fell for.

Hon Brad Clark (Minister of Labour): Name names.

Mr Bradley: I can't name names because I don't want to offend those media outlets, but I can tell you there were some of them that fell for it, and others who didn't. But it was a good photo opportunity. If one wants to sit on this side of the House and say, "Do you think that was a good public relations idea?" you'd have to say, if you wanted to be fair, "a good public relations idea." It produced nothing, but it did have some nice photos, and I'm sure in the constituency newsletter of the gas busters they were all there to protect the consumer. And yet the price of gasoline is consistently now above—except for today, when it got lowered for some reason—70 cents a litre.

This bill is not going to solve that. This government has steered clear of that. The barons of the oil industry are saved from any sharp teeth to be found in this legislation, although I have to say, and I'm a very fair-minded person, there are some provisions in this bill, in fact many provisions, with which I would find myself in agreement. I think there would be a consensus on it in this House. We might ask why this government didn't do it six years ago, which does beg another question I won't ask. They were probably contemplating it but never got around to doing it.

Interjection.

Mr Bradley: Well, it took somebody from the Niagara peninsula to do it, which it always does, I have to say.

Insurance rates: it doesn't seem to deal with skyrocketing insurance rates. Not only automobile insurance—and that's going up considerably—but other forms of insurance are going up under the pretext, I am told, of the unfortunate incidents of 9/11—the disaster that happened, the terrorist acts in New York and Washington. One has to wonder how many in the insurance industry are using that as a reason to jack up the rates, and how much of it is legitimate. From time to time—for instance, if you have an ice storm and there are a lot of payouts from that—I understand that you may see some premium increases as a result. I'm not being an unreasonable person, but the suspicion is always in the back of our minds that somehow this is going to increase.

Now I know how the government is going to deal with the automobile situation. They will simply decrease benefits to bring down the price of automobile insurance. I put that out there because I think there are a lot of people who are living on the margin and require an automobile who are finding it difficult. They have to have much larger deductibles. Some may even be encouraged, and shouldn't be, because it would be very wrong—but I have been reading about people who don't even have automobile insurance in some cases. Most of us here might find that reprehensible. But there are people out there in that predicament, and others end up paying that tab.

I think of another situation this doesn't protect. It doesn't protect the patients in this province from some of the charges that are being levied against them because of the delisting of services provided under the Ontario Health Insurance Plan. For instance, patients sometimes have to pay for forms that doctors fill out. It is probably much better for doctors to be able to charge that against OHIP, a legitimate cost against OHIP, than having to charge individual patients for that particular service. There are other charges now, the PSA tests for instance, the prostate specific antigen—Hansard will pick that up—test. It costs $20 at the present time, and there are many people who are concerned about that particular cost. I thought the Minister of Consumer and Business Services might have tried to include that in his bill by doing a bit of an end run around the Minister of Health, but he has not been able to do that.

I look at these kinds of charges that are not covered by this legislation. Perhaps the Minister of Health, when he has some pangs of conscience, will want to ensure that people are compensated for those costs, which are incurred through no fault of their own. It isn't as though they've gone out to purchase something; these are essential services this government has delisted. While wealthy people can afford it, those who are at the lower end of the pay scale or are on fixed incomes have a difficult time with it.

I wish I could fit ambulance dispatch service into this somehow, but I don't know if I can, other than to say that people who have to take ambulances have to pay a user fee for those ambulances. This does not protect them against that particular user fee. Often it's very onerous on them. You and I know, Mr Speaker, because you represent an area that's had problems with ambulance dispatch as well, that that problem is far from solved at the present time. It has been alleged that there are people who have actually died because an ambulance has not arrived in time. The poor people working in the dispatch centre are working under very, very difficult circumstances: antiquated equipment, a workload which is far too high, often training which is not adequate and often lack of compensation that would keep people there in a stressful job for a period of time. This bill does not protect that particular service.

Another thing I'm worried about—I want to put this bug in the minister's ear. I suspect this is happening—you heard it first here; actually you heard it first in the committee. I think this government is secretly preparing to get into the business of Internet gambling. I really happen to think that's the case.

Hon Tim Hudak (Minister of Consumer and Business Services): Is Mike behind it?

Mr Bradley: No. The new minister will now be behind it. I noticed when I was sitting in my impartial position as Chair of the government agencies committee when we were reviewing people who are coming before us, I think the last two people appointed to—you would know the name. It is the gambling commission, or the gaming commission, as you call it. I call it gambling. Both have had some expertise in the field of Internet gambling, and I think this is the next initiative. This government is now desperate for money because you have to pay all those rebates after you totally bungled your policy related to—

Hon Mr Clark: You believe in the X-files, do you?

Mr Bradley: —totally bungled your policy related to hydro. You're going to need some money now and I suspect that what you're going to do is find yet another way to bleed money out of the most vulnerable people, the most desperate people, and that's those who are often addicted to gambling and can easily avail themselves of gambling opportunities, thanks to this government at this time.

I really wonder about the family coalition over there. The family values crowd that I remember used to speak with some authority within the government caucus. The cat seems to have their collective tongue on this one, because those gambling opportunities continue to spread. What I think you need now is a moratorium, that no more communities out there should have these gambling opportunities thrust upon them by this particular government. Just as when I opposed originally the Sunday shopping, it's now of course a fact of life. Virtually everybody is Sunday shopping. I have even shopped on Sunday.

Interjection.

Mr Bradley: I have. I must confess to that. I have found that all the issues I thought the family coalition over there stood for—Bill isn't one of them; he's not one of the family coalition. But I'll tell you, a lot of the people there who portrayed themselves as the family values crowd have had to rethink their position as members of this government.

One thing I will say is that those of us on this side were successful in preventing you from doing what you really wanted to do, and that is put video lottery terminals, the crack cocaine of gambling, into every bar and every restaurant and every corner store of every hamlet and village and town and city in the province of Ontario. We prevented that from happening. You wanted to do it. There was a lobby group out there that was in favour of it. You wanted to do it and it didn't happen.

Once again you see the pressure of the opposition coming to bear on the government, just as we forced you to give funding now for Visudyne treatments, even though you haven't done it properly. It's still skewed so that people have to pay a lot themselves. But you were forced into that. Today I see that you were forced into assisting another group: children with autism. The minister made an announcement after a barrage of criticism from the public and the opposition.

Mr Bill Murdoch (Bruce-Grey-Owen Sound): This would mean that you should stay in opposition.

Mr Bradley: My friend Bill is in opposition—on the government side, but he's in opposition. I don't think we'll have to do that, Bill. You are from time to time—at least back when you were in Owen Sound, in that part of the province—very independent-minded with this government. When you get down here, you're a bit of what we call a government man. But when you're up there you do a great job.

I wanted to say a couple of good things about the bill too. I think the telephone solicitation provisions offer some help. I think the door-to-door provisions, the cooling-off period, certainly offer some help.

I know the Niagara group that is part of the realtors' association had some concerns about the bill. They probably directed those concerns to the minister, who no doubt would have given them fair consideration.

I see under "Officers, directors" the word "may" used, and that concerned me. It says, "the director may disclose the name of the defaulter" and the director may also create a lien against the property. I would have thought "will" would have been superior to "may," but perhaps earlier when the minister spoke, he gave a reason for that.

So all in all, I think the bill falls considerably short of what it should be. Union Gas customers and the Ontario Energy Board, of course, are good examples of that. I see that you've attacked Floyd Laughren, the former NDP finance minister, when everybody knows you appoint the Ontario Energy Board and you set the rules for the Ontario Energy Board, and then you attack it.

But there is sufficient in this bill, I think, that even I could support this legislation. I know my friend the minister will be delighted to hear that.

The Acting Speaker: By previous order of this House, I now declare this House standing adjourned until tomorrow at 1:30 pm.

The House adjourned at 1946.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Tuesday 19 November 2002

ASSEMBLÉE LÉGISLATIVE DE L'ONTARIO

Mardi 19 novembre 2002

The House met at 1330.

Prayers.

MEMBERS' STATEMENTS

PREMIER OF ONTARIO

Mr Rick Bartolucci (Sudbury): The Premier of this province is going to be making a visit to Sudbury this coming Thursday for the annual PC fundraiser. We welcome him to Sudbury because it's the first time he will have been there since he became Premier. The people of Sudbury are going to want to know from this Premier why he would not meet with the Crash 69 committee to discuss the appalling state of Highway 69; why he won't meet with people like Ron Henderson, who has lost his sister and his twin nephews; why he won't meet with people like Rita Pulici, who lost her son; why he won't meet with people like Mario Grossi, who lost his mother and two cousins.

The people of Sudbury also want to know why the Premier, the Minister of Transportation and the Minister of Northern Development and Mines have not taken advantage of the Canada strategic infrastructure project to make Highway 69 from Sudbury to Parry Sound the number one priority. In fact, if this government thinks that the people of Sudbury will be fooled by their rhetoric, you're sadly mistaken. We want the Premier to come to Sudbury, commit to a start date for Highway 69 four-laning from Sudbury and give us the timeline for the entire project, and then we want him to show Sudburians the letter he sent to the federal minister asking the federal minister to make this project the number one priority of this particular infrastructure program.

ALLISTER JOHNSTON

Mr Norm Miller (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I rise today to recognize an extraordinary individual, Allister Johnston, on the occasion of his 94th birthday. Mr Johnston's commitment and dedication to both our province and our country have been unwavering. He served our country proudly, retiring from the Canadian army in 1945 with the distinguished rank of major. During World War II, Major Johnston served as the commander of the north armoured regiment, the Algonquins.

Following his service in the armed forces, Mr Johnston founded an insurance company in South River, which is still operated by his two sons, John and Peter.

Among his many endeavours, Allister Johnston was a municipal councillor, the chairman of the South River school board and a past president of the Canadian Legion.

Mr Johnston was also elected as MPP for Parry Sound in 1948 and served his constituents with dedication and enthusiasm for 24 years. In 1964, Mr Johnston was appointed to the Ontario Northland Transportation Commission. To the railway's employees he was affectionately known as "Major Ally." His many accomplishments include spearheading the expansion of the successful Ontario Northland communications division.

Mr Johnston is predeceased by his wife, Margaret, and together they have three children, John, Lynne and Peter.

Allister Johnston resides with his daughter, Lynne, and remains active in his community. I would like to stand and congratulate Mr Johnston on reaching this significant milestone and express my appreciation for his contributions over the years to his community, our province and the country.

VISUDYNE TREATMENT

Mr James J. Bradley (St Catharines): In May of this year, the Ontario Minister of Health, after months of questioning in this Legislature and horror stories in the media forced him to capitulate to demands to meet the needs of individuals afflicted with macular degeneration, finally announced that funding would be provided from the Ontario government for the treatment known as Visudyne. What the minister neglected to mention in his announcement was that the new policy included strict eligibility criteria that effectively exclude 80% to 90% of the patients who are candidates for the treatment.

A 53-year-old resident of St Catharines who suffers from macular degeneration was informed that she does not qualify for funding from the Ontario government because her affliction is not age-related, even though she will have to endure the same sight loss that someone of a more advanced age would experience.

What the minister left out of his announcement was a stipulation that potential candidates must have 50% membrane loss in order to be eligible for the Visudyne treatment. In effect, this means that patients in Niagara and across the province must suffer from this debilitating disease until their eyesight reaches a so-called acceptable state of disrepair.

I call upon the Minister of Health of Ontario to change his unfair restrictions on macular degeneration patients and allow them to receive treatment in a timely fashion, and to reimburse those who have received treatment in the past and have had to pay for it from their own pocket.

DOCTOR SHORTAGE

Mr David Christopherson (Hamilton West): The Eves government is directly responsible for the severe doctor shortage that is jeopardizing the lives of people all across Ontario.

Hamilton is one of the largest cities in this province, and our citizens have been especially hard hit. On December 9, two more doctors from the Hamilton area will be retiring. One doctor alone serves more than 1,500 patients. Many patients are seniors with chronic health problems who require the ongoing services of a family physician. They've tried to find a new doctor in Hamilton and they've tried to find a new doctor outside Hamilton, but the reality is that doctors simply aren't accepting new patients.

Incredibly, at the same time as thousands of patients in my community need a doctor, there are 3,000 internationally trained doctors living in Ontario who are willing to work. It is unbelievable that the Eves government has allocated only 10 spots for family medicine and only three out of a possible 10 candidates have been accepted to fast-track into family medicine.

Flu season is upon us, and this winter hundreds of sick kids and frail seniors will be forced into already overcrowded emergency rooms in Hamilton. Your incompetence is pushing an already dangerously overloaded health care system to the breaking point.

Timely, effective medical services are the very heart of our medical system. No one should be without these life-saving services. Stand up today and tell the thousands of seniors and families in Hamilton who need a doctor today how you're going to resolve this crisis.

SAUBLE SANDPIPERS

Mr Bill Murdoch (Bruce-Grey-Owen Sound): I rise in the House today to recognize a long-standing club in my riding, since 1977, the Sauble Sandpipers seniors club. I would like to congratulate president Marjorie Lipka and all the countless volunteers who make up this outstanding organization.

I had the pleasure of attending their 25th anniversary in October. The organization works countless hours to help the different causes in our area and is made up of over 160 members. The committee members and volunteers are to be commended for their hard work and dedication throughout the year in preparation for the various events.

Over the years, the club has generously supported all the area hospitals, as well as many other community groups requesting funding. They have supported the Salvation Army, the daycare centre and recently donated $6,000 to the local fire department for a new truck.

The Sandpipers hold two large craft shows a year and a smaller Christmas craft show that supports the Sandpipers club and the lawn bowling club.

The association is to be praised for their ongoing contribution and dedication to local initiatives. A project they have recently taken on is offering full support to the new medical clinic in Sauble Beach. They are also hoping to make repairs to the local community centre they use, where they play bridge, shuffleboard and euchre.

This is an excellent, much-needed organization in our area, and I'm proud to be able to partake in their events. Again, I congratulate the Sauble Sandpipers on their 25th anniversary.

SCHOOL BOARDS

Mr Bruce Crozier (Essex): The Windsor-Essex Catholic District School Board has petitioned the Ministry of Education for $140,000 in emergency transportation funding to cover unexpected increases. The Greater Essex County District School Board is over-budget on transportation by about $90,000.

The boards have done everything they can. They've staggered school hours. They've shared all the bus routes possible. Minister of Education, last June's budget stated that your government was committed to "investing an additional $20 million to assist with student transportation costs and support the development of a new approach to student transportation funding that will ensure school boards work together to provide safe and efficient transportation for their students."

These two school boards, along with the Conseil scolaire de district des écoles catholiques du Sud-Ouest, have been leaders in bus route sharing and creating flexible school hours for optimal bus use. Yet they can't make ends meet. School bus funding has been frozen at 1997 levels despite increasing wages and skyrocketing vehicle, gasoline and insurance costs.

You have to put your money where your mouth is, Minister. I insist that you act today to ensure that no school board in Ontario goes without the funding it needs and that every student who requires a bus ride is able to get to school in a timely manner.

POLICE ASSOCIATION OF ONTARIO

Mr John O'Toole (Durham): I rise in the House today to introduce members of the Durham Regional Police Association who are here at Queen's Park visiting members. They are among the many delegates from the Police Association of Ontario attending the sixth annual legislative day. The representatives from Durham region include the association's new president Doug Cavanaugh; vice-president-elect Tom Bell; secretary-Treasurer Mark McConkey; and director Rick Walsh.

It's a privilege to once again meet representatives of Ontario's 20,000 front-line police personnel at Queen's Park. Legislative day is an excellent opportunity to discuss specific concerns such as courthouse security recently in Durham.

Some of the general issues of interest to the Police Association of Ontario, I'm sure, include centralized recruitment, the DNA data bank issue, staffing, funding and of course policing standards. The association also supported Bill 191, the Highway Traffic Act amendment regarding the protection of police and other emergency workers stopped at the shoulders of Ontario's highways in the course of their duties.

I understand the association is also urging the federal government to overhaul their prison and parole systems to ensure there are meaningful consequences for offenders and to reinforce public confidence in our criminal justice as well as youth justice system. In other words, they are calling for an end to the so-called Club Fed prison environment. I'm sure we applaud them for their initiative and efforts and the work the association does on behalf of front-line officers and the communities they serve. I have visited the new provincial jail in Lindsay and can assure you it is anything but Club Fed.

I commend Police Association of Ontario president Bob Baltin; chair, Brenda Lawson; administrator, Bruce Miller; and the board members for all they have done in their organization of this legislative day. I recommend all members who attend to meet with their association to respect the work they do for our communities.

Mr Rick Bartolucci (Sudbury): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: Today I seek unanimous consent to have all members in the House wear the Club Fed pin so that the PAO and all the police forces under that umbrella will clearly know that everyone in this House believes criminals who do a crime should be placed in the appropriate institution to do their time.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): The member has asked if we can wear the pin he referred to today. Is there unanimous consent? Agreed.

Mr Tony Martin (Sault Ste Marie): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I'm asking for the unanimous consent of the Legislature to support a resolution that the Ontario Legislature oppose the federal government's changes to the disability tax credit and support the Canadian Paraplegic Association's request that the former rules governing the tax credit be restored.

The Speaker: Is there unanimous consent? I'm afraid I heard some noes.

Mr Dave Levac (Brant): I rise in the House today to speak on behalf of Dalton McGuinty and the Ontario Liberals to recognize the Police Association of Ontario day here at Queen's Park. Today the members of the PAO have joined us including President Bob Baltin, Bruce Miller, Brenda Lawson, Jim Mauro, Walter Tomasik and Byron Smith, who met with Dalton and myself earlier today, as well as Len Ellins and Dianne Careswell from my riding of Brant. The three of us grew up in the same neighbourhood in Eagle Place. We welcome them and all PAO members and thank them for joining us today.

We are pleased to have this opportunity to highlight the important work of the Police Association of Ontario. The PAO was formed in 1933 and represented constables in 25 communities across Ontario. Today, the Police Association of Ontario represents more than 20,000 front-line police officers and civilian members of police services in more than 66 police associations across Ontario. The PAO is the unified voice of front-line police personnel across Ontario and an integral part of policing in our communities.

We just want to stress the importance of our front-line police officers, who put their lives at risk for the safety and security of Ontario families. We want to thank them for their dedication and commitment to policing in Ontario.

We would also like to take this opportunity to thank the families of the courageous officers who support them as they carry out their important work in our communities to keep them safe. It is vital that we recognize the value of these officers who work with the police association and work to uphold the honour of the police profession and elevate the standards of policing.

We also recognize the important role our civilian staff play in keeping our police services running smoothly and effectively, especially communication and dispatch personnel.

Once again, on behalf of Dalton and the Liberal caucus, thank you to the PAO for keeping our communities safe and secure.

DIWALI

Mr Bob Wood (London West): I rise today to draw to the attention of the House that over 350 London area Hindus celebrated Diwali on November 16 with a dinner and show. Diwali or Deepawali, the most pan-Indian of all Hindu festivals, is a festival of lights symbolizing the victory of righteousness and the lifting of spiritual darkness. It commemorates Lord Rama's return to his kingdom Ayodhya after completing his 14-year exile. Twinkling oil lamps, or diyas, light up every Hindu home in India, and fireworks displays take place across the country. The Goddess Lakshmi, the symbol of wealth and prosperity, is also worshipped on this occasion.

The festival also marks the start of the Hindu New Year. At this time, most Hindu homes worship Lord Ganesha, the symbol of auspiciousness and wisdom. Spring cleaning and decorative designs for homes are the order of the day. Family members come together to offer prayers, distribute candies and light up their homes.

Diwali's message of the triumph of light over darkness and of good over evil gives hope and encouragement to everyone. I know that all members of this House will join with me in wishing Hindus across Ontario and the world a Happy New Year and a warm "Namaste."

SPECIAL REPORT, ENVIRONMENTAL COMMISSIONER OF ONTARIO

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): I beg to inform the House that today I have laid upon the table the special report of the Environmental Commissioner of Ontario, entitled Climate Change: Is the Science Sound?

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

MUNICIPALITY OF CHATHAM-KENT ACT, 2002

Mr Beaubeien moved first reading of the following bill:
Bill Pr12, An Act respecting the Municipality of Chatham-Kent.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion carry? Carried.

Pursuant to the standing order 84, this bill stands referred to the standing committee on regulations and private bills.

Ms Marilyn Churley (Toronto-Danforth): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I'd like to take this opportunity for all members to welcome members of the provincial council of women who are in the member's gallery today. It's their 79th year of bringing their valuable insight to Queen's Park. We all want to say thank you.

MUNICIPAL AMENDMENT ACT (PROHIBITING USE OF PESTICIDES), 2002

LOI DE 2002 MODIFIANT LA LOI SUR LES MUNICIPALITÉS (INTERDICTION D'UTILISER DES PESTICIDES)

Mr Patten moved first reading of the following bill:

Bill 208, An Act to amend the Municipality Act, 2001 to permit municipalities to prohibit activities or the use of substances to protect the health, safety and well-being of inhabitants of the municipality / Projet de loi 208, Loi modifiant la Loi de 2001 sur les municipalités pour permettre aux municipalités d'interdire des activités ou l'utilisation de substances afin de protéger la santé, la sécurité et le bien-être des habitants de la municipalité.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion carry? Carried.

The member for a short statement?

Mr Richard Patten (Ottawa Centre): This bill amends the Municipal Act, 2001, to enable municipalities that wish to pass bylaws to prohibit the non-essential or cosmetic use of pesticides on a precautionary basis if the municipality is of the opinion that there is a threat to the health, safety and well-being of its citizens. There is a growing body of evidence that exposure to pesticides can cause acute or chronic effects on health, with children representing the most vulnerable population. I look forward to the debate on this bill on December 5.

ORAL QUESTIONS

HYDRO DEREGULATION

Mr Michael Bryant (St Paul's): My question is for the Premier. The Minister of Energy has been meeting on a regular basis with the chair of Ontario Power Generation. In 1998, Energy Minister Wilson said in the House, "I meet with Mr Farlinger ... every week at a set time, as did my predecessor Norm Sterling, as did my predecessor Brenda Elliott." Your current energy minister confirmed that regular meetings are provided between the energy minister and Mr Farlinger.

I presume that some information is exchanged between the government of Ontario and the chair of Ontario Power Generation. Is it your position, Premier, that at any time the government of Ontario received bad information from Chairman Farlinger?

Hon Ernie Eves (Premier, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs): I'd refer that to the Minister of Energy. I'm sure he'd be happy to answer it.

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, minister responsible for francophone affairs): When I became Minister of Energy in August 2002, the very next day, my first full day on the job, I went to see Pickering A for myself to underline the importance I place on the issue. We are tremendously concerned with the timetable of the project. We're also tremendously concerned with respect to what the anticipated cost was, versus what the actual costs are.

I received an update on that date and asked for more information, which I received in two weeks' time. I asked for more information, and we had a rather prolonged meeting on that issue.

Mr Bryant: Minister, your parliamentary assistant said last week on TVO, "We"—the government—"had bad information from Ontario Power Generation and I think that has directly impacted the whole supply-and-demand equation on which we originally predicated opening the market."

I asked you yesterday whether you had full confidence in Chairman Farlinger, and you certainly did not answer in the affirmative. Published reports are out today suggesting that bad information was provided by Mr Farlinger to the government of Ontario. If that is not true, it needs to be cleared up now. If it is true, why is he remaining the chair of Ontario Power Generation?

Did the energy minister—you, your predecessor or his predecessor—and the government of Ontario receive bad information from Chairman Farlinger with respect to when Pickering A would be refurbished?

Hon Mr Baird: Certainly in my three months on the job I have not. I can indicate to the member opposite that there indeed was bad information with respect to when the project would be up and running. It was initially indicated that the first reactor, reactor number 4 at Pickering A, would be on-line well before it certainly will. That's no secret; it's quite open. It's in OPG's third-quarter statement. Mr Osborne has spoken very clearly with respect to the project and his views on it, and my views would not be dissimilar to those expressed by the president and CEO.

Mr Bryant: Well, here is the problem: energy ministers were meeting with the chair of OPG on a regular basis, week after week after week, before the marketplace opened, and yet Ontario Power Generation had put out in a press release on January 30 that Pickering A was not going to be on-line in May. It wasn't going to be on-line, it says, until the third quarter of 2002. Then another report, also before the market opened, said that "OPG currently expects to return the first unit of Pickering to service in late 2002 and early 2003."

Are you to have us believe that the energy minister didn't raise this with the chair? Are you to have us believe that he didn't read these press releases? You say you received bad information. I say the government of Ontario didn't receive bad information; they received information that they didn't want to hear. You were getting the truth about the Pickering refurbishment and you couldn't handle the truth. As a result of it, you started up the marketplace before supply was ready. My question to you is, when you knew—when the government knew—that in fact Pickering wasn't going to be on-line and on time, why did you open up the marketplace in May?

Hon Mr Baird: The member opposite undoubtedly took grade 13 drama in high school and failed, but I guess they didn't provide an F back in those days either. We're tremendously concerned about the delays that have happened at Pickering A. Obviously the information that had been given when we first embarked on this process in the late 1990s has not come to fruition. I can say that in the three months that I've been the Minister of Energy, I've always received a good amount of information that I've requested from OPG.

I think the member opposite is trying to go down another road, because his own leader has changed policies on his back. If you go to energy on the Liberal Web site—I wanted to find out what their policy on energy was today and I plugged into the Liberal Web site, and you have here, "Update coming soon," which is really remarkable. When Dalton McGuinty went out and had the scrum of his life, I saw the leader of the NDP standing like a proud father, knowing that Dalton McGuinty is a Howard-come-lately on this issue.

EDUCATION FUNDING

Mr David Caplan (Don Valley East): I have a question for the Minister of Education. Later today, your appointee is going to reveal a long list of cuts to the Toronto District School Board. Your strategic leaks to the media admit that you're going to be cutting certified supply teachers. Cutting the number of certified supply teachers means that when regular teachers get sick, uncertified people will be teaching kids more often. It means that when a teacher takes maternity leave, more often her students will spend the rest of the year with an uncertified person. The question is simply this: why does your government want more classes taught by uncertified people?

Hon Elizabeth Witmer (Deputy Premier, Minister of Education): The member opposite obviously has much more information than we do. If I take a look at what I've been reading in the media, it looks to me like the supervisor has perhaps done the job he was asked to do of balancing the budget, despite all the fearmongering that we heard from you and others in the city of Toronto.

Mr Caplan: You're cutting the number of supply teachers; you know it, I know it and parents and kids know it. Fewer supply teachers means even more unqualified people leading classes. But I can think of a better way to help the Toronto District School Board and other boards of education balance their budgets. Instead of giving half a billion dollars to private schools, invest that money in public education classrooms. You're putting more uncertified people in front of classrooms while you hand out millions of dollars to private schools, and that's wrong. My question for you is simple: will you cancel your private school tax credit and invest that money in our public schools?

Hon Mrs Witmer: This is unbelievable. I don't even know what $500 million he's talking about. Furthermore, let's go back to the fearmongering. Do you know what Gerard Kennedy said? Schools are going to cut out rec, they're going to cut special-needs programs. Do you know what? It's all been fearmongering. As far as the $500 million for private schools, it's not here. Do you know what? You're going to have to check your facts and your figures. You've got it all wrong, like you have on Hydro.

Mr Caplan: The minister is right in her answer that she doesn't know what she's talking about. Minister, 3,100 kids are waiting for special education assessments in the Toronto board alone; 36% of kids have no phys ed teacher; 35% of kids in Toronto have no music program. The quality of education in public schools is failing, but you have half a billion dollars for private schools. Under your government, funding for private schools is going up $3,500 per student, but for kids in public schools it's going down over $2,100 per student. That's a betrayal of everything you said you stood for when you were a trustee and when you were the chair of a board of education. Minister, how can you possibly defend handing private schools half a billion dollars when you're cutting public education in Toronto and elsewhere in the province?

Hon Mrs Witmer: This government since 1995 has done more to support students in Ontario in order to ensure that they have the resources, they have the services. We are providing funding in order that our teachers can provide the best education possible. In fact, this year we increased funding by 3%. We are now paying and supporting education to the tune of $14.26 billion. We are proud of what we've done for students, and we would recommend that you get on board and fight for students too.

HYDRO DEREGULATION

Mr Howard Hampton (Kenora-Rainy River): My question is for the Premier. You are a former Finance Minister. You're a former Bay Street investment banker. You should know your numbers. Maybe you can help the people of Ontario out with this problem. Tell us, Premier, when it comes to hydroelectricity, who has flip-flopped more, you or Dalton McGuinty?

Hon Ernie Eves (Premier, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs): I will give him this: he is very consistent. He believes that everything should be socialistic, everybody should be—

Interjections.

Hon Mr Eves: Don't confuse him with the facts. His mind is made up. I'm still waiting for the financial part of the question.

Mr Hampton: I realize that's a very tough question. People in the province say, "There's Flip and there's Flop—no, there's Flip and there's Flop."

It's like this, Premier. You've changed your position on hydro so many times it's making people's heads spin. In October 1998 the Conservatives announced you were going to privatize and deregulate Hydro—

Interjections.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Would the leader take his seat. The members for Windsor West and Windsor-St Clair, please come to order. Sorry for the interruption, leader of the third party.

Mr Hampton: I realize that the Liberals' position on hydro causes them great pain, so I'll be gentle here. In October 1998 the Conservatives announce you were going to privatize and deregulate hydro. Then you spend the next three years on propaganda advertising, telling people that this will be good for them, that prices will go down. In December 2001 the Conservatives announce that you were going to privatize Hydro One. On April 30, 2002, you say that maybe you won't sell off Hydro One.

On May 29 you introduce a bill that you say will allow you to sell off Hydro One. On June 12 you say you'll only sell off up to 49% of Hydro One. Then last week, when it becomes painfully obvious to consumers that privatized and deregulated hydro is too expensive for them, you rolled out your scheme to hide the cost.

Premier, with all those flip-flops, why should any person in Ontario trust you with our hydro system?

Hon Mr Eves: We have taken steps to protect the consumer in the province of Ontario. As you know, we have capped the rates at 4.3 cents a kilowatt hour. That is why consumers in the province can trust us. They certainly can't trust a party who in five years increased the public debt in the province by $63 billion and increased the debt of Hydro $3 billion on top of that; $66 billion in five years you increased the debt of Ontario taxpayers. They certainly aren't going to trust you.

Mr Hampton: Premier, I can tell I've struck a nerve. Don't feel bad, because you're not the biggest flip-flopper. In 1998, Dalton McGuinty voted in favour of Hydro privatization and deregulation. For the next three years, the Liberals trolled up and down Bay Street looking for money from investors, and they said, "Dalton McGuinty and the Ontario Liberals have been consistent supporters of the move to open Ontario's electricity market." When Hydro One was put up for sale, Mr McGuinty said, "I am in favour of privatization both in terms of the transmission and the generation." In September, Mr McGuinty said Liberals would close all the coal-fired plants. Yesterday he flip-flopped on that too. Like some others, I went to the Liberal Web site to see what their hydro strategy was, and there is none.

Premier, I repeat my question: why should anyone in Ontario trust you or Dalton with—

The Speaker: I'm afraid the member's time is up. Premier?

Hon Mr Eves: I certainly can't answer for Mr McGuinty. His Web site speaks for itself; it's a blank piece of paper.

We indeed do have a nine-point plan that we outlined on November 11 with the people of the province of Ontario which we believe will protect consumers as we go forward and develop a generation free market here in the province. I think our nine-point plan addresses all the issues that you've covered in question period today.

The Speaker: New question. The leader of the third party.

Mr Hampton: Premier, I told you and the Liberals over two and a half years ago that hydro deregulation and privatization would be a fiasco; it would drive up the price so that consumers couldn't afford to pay it and it would create electricity supply shortages. Now that this has become evident to both you and the Liberals, you want to endorse a pre-election price cap rebate scheme to cover, to hide, the cost of privatized hydro from the consumers.

Premier, rather than you and the Liberals engaging in a cover-up, a pre-election bribe designed to hide the true cost of privatized hydro from the people of Ontario, why don't you finally admit that privatized, deregulated hydro always costs more? It cost more in California, in Alberta, in Montana, in Pennsylvania and in Ontario. Why don't you do the right thing? Kill hydro privatization and deregulation now.

Hon Mr Eves: First of all, the leader of the third party knows that hydro is not being privatized. Second, he knows that to ensure a future supply of energy in the province of Ontario, we are going to have to have a competitive marketplace and we're going to have to encourage other players to produce energy in the province of Ontario. That is part of our nine-point plan.

At the same time, we are protecting consumers while we're doing that. We have a plan. You don't have any plan except the plan that you used when you were in office for five years: increasing debt to the people of Ontario by $66 billion. That's your plan. Do you think the people of Ontario are going to accept your plan in the next provincial election, Howard?

Mr Hampton: Premier, the people of Ontario know that right now you are planning to sell off a major chunk of Hydro One. And who are you talking to? The same highway robbers, SNC-Lavalin, that came in, scooped Highway 407 for pennies, then sold it off at three times that value, and drivers of Ontario are paying prohibitive and exorbitant rates for driving on 407. You want to make the same deal with the same highway robbers. We know from the experience of Highway 407 that those people will want higher and higher hydro rates.

Premier, there is an alternative. Hydro Quebec is following it: public power at cost, public ownership. Manitoba is following it. Saskatchewan is following it. In fact, a number of jurisdictions in the United States have voted to end deregulation.

Instead of trying to cover up the cost with your Liberal friends, instead of a pre-election bribe, admit hydro privatization and deregulation is too expensive for consumers and kill it now.

Hon Mr Eves: You really have gone a step too far now. You're the last party that should be standing in the Legislature talking about Highway 407. Your policy on Highway 407—you were a member of the cabinet that approved this policy—was to privatize Highway 407, saying that if the private sector operator made any money, they got to keep it, and if they lost any money, you would reimburse them through the taxpayers' dollars. What a great NDP socialist scheme that is. That's why you were so successful in the 1999 election, and that's just as successful as you'll be in the next election.

HYDRO ONE

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): My question is to the Minister of Finance, and it has to do with the sale of 49% of Hydro One. A phone call I made late last week to your ministry indicated that the sale is proceeding, I gather, quite quickly, and it's planned to occur over the next several weeks.

I think if there's a message that the government has heard over the last few weeks it's that the public do not want that. It will also be a fire sale designed to get quick cash into the government's pockets before the end of the fiscal year. It sells off part of a very major public crown jewel.

The question is, why in the world are you proceeding with these plans to sell 49% of Hydro One?

Hon Janet Ecker (Minister of Finance): First of all, I would like to assure him, if he had been paying attention, that there's been no change in the timing of what we're doing with Hydro One. Secondly, we were very clear that what we were looking for were ways to bring market discipline to the day-to-day operation of Hydro One, to make sure that we had private sector investment to help improve the transmission lines. As this government has made very clear, what we are looking for is a partnership that's in the best interests of Ontario consumers, Ontario taxpayers, Ontario electricity consumers, and that will remain this government's bottom line as we decide how to proceed.

Mr Phillips: Well, you are proceeding, I gather, to sell off 49%. It's a dumb idea. You shouldn't do it.

I'm also very concerned about the secret process. It was just two weeks ago, Minister, that you told the public it would be a public process.

We again phoned your ministry. They told us it's all private. It's all done behind closed doors. The request for proposals will not be made public. It's all done behind closed doors. So I say to you again: the public have spoken. They do not want you selling off part of their major crown jewel, this enormous public asset. They don't want you doing it behind closed doors.

Mr Eves made the same mistake when he sold the 407 just before the last election.

Back to the sale of Ontario Hydro, 49%: firstly, you said it would be public; we find out from your ministry it's not. We find that you're now selling it as a fire sale before the election. Why don't you do the right thing and simply cancel the sale of 49% of Hydro One?

Hon Mrs Ecker: The objectives that we laid out for seeking a private sector partner with Hydro One are the same today as they were several months ago. The timing is the same today as it was several months ago. We are publicly accountable for the arrangements they may make, as we were on Highway 407.

The honourable member likes to bring up Highway 407. I'm glad he does. We have a brand new highway in Durham region because of the deal the current Premier, the former finance minister, made. That's a benefit for the consumers in Durham region and across the top of the GTA.

We are looking for an acceptable private sector partner for Hydro One. At the end of the day, it is the best deal we're looking for. If there is no good deal, we do not proceed. We've been very clear about that. Do you know what? There is more public accountability in how we have proceeded with 407 and Hydro One than we have with the Ontario Liberal energy policy. There's nothing there. We're prepared to be accountable. We table our accounts. We go to public audit committees. Where are they?

KARLA HOMOLKA

Ms Marilyn Mushinski (Scarborough Centre): My question today is for the Attorney General. Many of us in this House have read with serious concern—certainly with great concern in my constituency of Scarborough Centre—the recent media report surrounding a new book written with the participation of Karla Homolka. According to these reports, it seems that she corresponded to the writer and shared some of her own experiences and thoughts.

My specific concern is that her participation in this project may have violated the plea bargain that was agreed to for her role in the infamous Paul Bernardo case. It's an agreement that some have called a deal with the devil.

Minister, can you please inform this House of what actions you will be taking to ensure that these serious concerns are being addressed?

Hon David Young (Attorney General, minister responsible for native affairs): The honourable member has referenced today a very painful chapter in the history of this province and, indeed, of this country. The wounds of the communities and, of course, particularly the families who are so directly involved in this series of great tragedies, haven't yet fully healed. I anticipate they will never fully heal.

In my role as Attorney General, I asked the Niagara regional police force to conduct an investigation into the matter that the honourable member has referenced. I understand they are looking into this matter as we speak, and in due course I will have their report.

Ms Mushinski: Thank you for that answer, Minister. I believe that is indeed the right thing to do to get to the bottom of these concerns. As you have noted, this was an extremely painful chapter for many people in our province. In particular, there were some in my own riding of Scarborough Centre who were very seriously impacted. I feel they deserve no less by your actions.

Can you advise this House when the investigation may be completed and what actions you believe the government should take after that?

Hon Mr Young: I think it's important that we allow the Niagara regional police force to do their job. I think it's important that we allow them to do so without political interference of any sort. I think it's important that we not jump to any conclusions as to what the result of that very important investigation may be.

By the same token, I say to you and the members of this honourable assembly, I don't want to rush this investigation. I want it to be done in a comprehensive manner. I have the utmost confidence that the officers who have been assigned this very important task will do so.

DOCTOR SHORTAGE

Mrs Sandra Pupatello (Windsor West): My question is for the Premier. I'd like to read a quote of yours in a national paper: "Mr Clement will be making an announcement about foreign-trained physicians in underserved areas in the next week to 10 days."

You said that at the end of October—October 27. You promised thousands of foreign-trained physicians that you were prepared to help, keeping in mind that you have been the government going on eight long years. Nothing has happened to get rid of barriers for foreign-trained physicians. Nothing has happened to help our own Canadian-born—people who are from Ontario who have studied abroad—to come home, practise and assist the many families in Ontario who do not have a family doctor and where we have communities without many, many specialists. Why are you denying this help to Ontario families?

Hon Ernie Eves (Premier, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs): Obviously the honourable member would want the ministry and the Minister of Health to have a full and comprehensive announcement when he makes it, and he will be making it in short order.

To sit here in the House and listen to the honourable member say that it's our fault that foreign-trained physicians are not being recognized—

Interjections.

Hon Mr Eves: Try seven years and five months; you never were very good in math over there. You increased the debt of the province by $10 billion, not the $66 billion, I'll admit. You increased the debt of Ontario Hydro by another $7 billion on top of that. You pretended to balance the books and, after an independent review was done, we found out you were really $700 million in the hole. So I don't need any lectures from Liberals about economics, you who ran up the debt by $17 billion when you were in government.

Interjections.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Just before the supplementary, to the member for Kingston and the Islands, this is his last warning. If I have to warn him again, he'll be removed.

Mrs Pupatello: Premier, you do not have a stellar record on debt or on many matters that you're in charge of. You have been the Premier for months and you have been in the government for seven years and five months, and in that time you have done nothing for foreign-trained physicians. We have 122 communities now that are designated underserved.

This is an unbelievable and very unremarkable record for you, Premier. You have had the opportunity. You were given the report by the task force that you called for. They've had this report since the beginning of October. They have listed many recommendations to remove barriers to have foreign-trained physicians practising in Ontario. Those include people we've accepted as Canadians here and also people who are from Ontario and trained abroad whom we want to come home to work.

Please don't make excuses and talk about all of these matters. We are talking about the very important work of needing doctors practising in Ontario. We expect barriers to be removed and you've done nothing. What do you have to say about this today?

Hon Mr Eves: The barriers will be removed. We will solve part of the problem that your government created by reducing the number of medical graduates in the province of Ontario when you were in government. We will solve the problem that your federal cousins in Ottawa have created through their immigration policy by not giving foreign-trained physicians a chance in this country. We're going to do it in the province of Ontario, even if your country cousins in Ottawa don't have the guts to do it federally.

Interjections.

Mr Mike Colle (Eglinton-Lawrence): On a point of order, Speaker: I would like the member from London West to apologize for giving the finger to the opposition.

The Speaker: Would the member take his seat.

Interjections.

The Speaker: Order. Come to order. Member for Eglinton-Lawrence, I didn't see anything. It's impossible. I was looking for the person. I'm sure if the member did anything wrong she, would do the honourable thing.

Interjection.

The Speaker: She's saying she didn't.

Interjections.

The Speaker: Come to order right now, everyone. Order, right now. We've had our little fun. The temperature is starting to rise; it always does on caucus day. Just be warned that we're going to pick people out if it gets carried away, and right now we're at the stage where it isn't one or two persons, it's a group of people. So just rest assured that if I get up again, people will be going out from any side, it doesn't matter whose it is.

I believe the member for Simcoe North had the floor.

Hon Dianne Cunningham (Minister of Training, Colleges and Universities, minister responsible for women's issues): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: [Inaudible] accused me of doing, I'm very sorry.

The Speaker: I appreciate that, Minister.

The member for London West on a point of order.

Mr Bob Wood (London West): I'm the member for London West. I have no idea what the member is referring to.

The Speaker: I see. I understand from the clarification that he's the member for London West.

The member for Simcoe North has the next question.

HEALTH PROTECTION LEGISLATION

Mr Garfield Dunlop (Simcoe North): My question today is for the Minister of Public Safety and Security. Earlier this afternoon you announced the proclamation of my private member's bill, Bill 105, An Act to amend the Health Protection and Promotion Act. Bill 105 allows front-line emergency workers, victims of crime and good Samaritans access to a blood test of those who may have deliberately or accidentally exposed them to bodily fluids leading to many communicable diseases such as HIV or hepatitis C. Can you tell the members of this House why this piece of legislation is important to your ministry?

Hon Robert W. Runciman (Minister of Public Safety and Security): I want to thank the member for Simcoe North for his question. I'd like to take this opportunity to congratulate the member for his hard work and dedication. The passage and proclamation of this legislation is an outstanding example of how private members can have a real and measurable impact on the lives of our citizens.

Bill 105 is the first of its kind in Canada and perhaps North America. Bill 105 will further protect police officers, firefighters, ambulance workers, correctional officers and the thousands of good Samaritans who come to the aid of others every year in Ontario. It will allow local medical officers of health to order blood samples from individuals who accidentally or deliberately expose front-line emergency service workers, victims of crime or good Samaritans to bodily fluids. It's a sad fact that quite often those who take it upon themselves to help and protect complete strangers are not given every mechanism possible to help and protect themselves in return.

Mr Dunlop: I too am glad that I was able to do my part in our government's efforts to protect those who work to protect others, as well as providing another step toward further enhancing the rights of victims.

In creating this legislation, I heard from many front-line workers and victims of crime who thoroughly supported the legislation. I know there are some obvious concerns surrounding privacy, but I would like to ask the minister if he has heard the same support, because I think the members of this House should know who is really going to benefit from this legislation.

Hon Mr Runciman: I too am glad that the member made this significant contribution. Today, as we all know, members of the Police Association of Ontario are with us, and I know they've been strong advocates of this legislation. Not only will Bill 105 be an important piece of legislation in the lives of Ontario's police officers and other front-line emergency workers, but today we're also joined by Natalie Hiltz and her family. Natalie is not only a Peel regional police officer, but she is also a victim of crime who was tied up in mounds of red tape to find out whether she'd been exposed to a life-threatening disease.

I'm proud to support Bill 105 not only for people like Natalie and members of the PAO, but for the thousands of individuals like them who should always have the right to know.

PENSION PLANS

Mr Howard Hampton (Kenora-Rainy River): My question is for the Premier. Very deep within your latest omnibus budget bill, Bill 198, there is a very nasty surprise for all the hard-working pension contributors across this province. It amounts to giving employers the capacity to unilaterally take money out of their pension plan when there is an apparent surplus. It amounts to government-sanctioned pension plan robbery. Under your legislation, employers, but not employees, will be allowed to withdraw any apparent surplus from ongoing pension plans. Secondly, employers will be permitted to use any apparent pension surplus to reduce their own contributions.

Premier, this legislation is grossly unfair and is bitterly opposed by employee and pension groups across the province. Will you sever it from Bill 198?

Hon Ernie Eves (Premier, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs): I think the Minister of Finance can explain the legislation to the honourable member.

Hon Janet Ecker (Minister of Finance): I appreciate that the honourable member, based on what he's obviously been told, and it's not accurate information, is concerned. This is not providing employers with an opportunity to raid pension funds. As a matter of fact, it's quite the contrary. It says that where an employer has clear entitlement, they must apply to the regulator in terms of whether they can have any surplus. The regulator's priority concern is the viability of the pension plan, because in this day of reduced investment income we have to make sure that pension plans stay viable.

Secondly, it also clearly entitles the majority of employees. It gives them an additional right to say whether an employer should be able to do anything with surplus on windups. So it is actually giving employees additional rights. It's making the pension plan legislation consistent with other provinces. At the end of the day, it does nothing to interfere with the earned benefits of any pensioner; it does everything to protect the financial viability of our pension plans. I would think the honourable member would be very supportive of initiatives that protect the pension benefits of workers out there.

Mr Hampton: In short, balderdash. The Minister of Finance knows that the law in Ontario, as it now stands, says that where there is a surplus in the windup of a pension plan there must be a negotiation between the employer and the potential pension recipients, that there is no unilateral authority for the employer to appeal to a pension board and say, "I want all of the surplus."

You'll also know that as the law stands now, when an ongoing pension plan has an apparent surplus for a period of time, employers have no authority to unilaterally take that apparent surplus for themselves or to have a holiday by themselves without the employees at the same time being able to share in that apparent surplus. What you're saying is that wherever there is an apparent surplus in a pension plan, it all goes to the employer, it all goes to your corporate friends.

This is grossly unfair, Minister. I'm asking you and the Premier to withdraw it before you create a real war out there in workplaces across Ontario. Do the right thing. Recognize how grossly unfair this is. Recognize it amounts to pension robbery. Sever this from Bill 198.

Hon Mrs Ecker: With all due respect to the honourable member, this has been consulted on, this has been publicly available.

Mr Hampton: No, it hasn't.

Hon Mrs Ecker: The honourable member is saying, "No, it hasn't." Do you know what? Then whose people for the Ontario Federation of Labour and the unions were sitting in the room—

Mr Hampton: That's a bunch of crap.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Order. Minister, take your seat. I'm going to ask the leader of the third party to withdraw that comment.

Mr Hampton: I withdraw, Speaker.

Hon Mrs Ecker: There has been consultation on this, as there should be. Secondly, we will be meeting with all the stakeholders on the development of the regulations to make sure the appropriate checks and balances are there, as they should be. But this in no way is allowing anyone to walk away with surpluses, because the protection of pension rights for workers out there, the protection of the financial viability of pension plans, is foremost in our minds.

CHILD CARE

Mrs Leona Dombrowsky (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): My question is for the Minister of Community, Family and Children's Services. For nearly two years your government has received additional money from the federal early child development accord for the purposes of supporting programs for children and their families. One area specifically highlighted for support was child care, yet your government has not spent one additional penny of that money on child care. Today in the Globe and Mail, Jane Stewart, the federal human resources minister, was critical of this inaction by your government. She indicated that most provinces did invest in child care and that the Eves government's resistance to improving access to child care is making it difficult for federal and provincial ministers to agree on a national child care policy.

Minister, will you commit today that your government will direct a portion of this year's allocation from the federal early child development accord to increase your support in the area of child care in Ontario?

Hon Brenda Elliott (Minister of Community, Family and Children's Services): I thank my colleague across the way for the question. First of all let's be very clear: this government thinks that good child care is important to the people of Ontario. That's why we have made a very significant investment in child care; in fact, over $700 million. We have a particular program, the Ontario child care supplement for working families. This is a tax credit program where $215 million is directed exclusively to low- and modest-income families for child care.

Having said that, I referenced the document that talks about the federal and provincial agreement on early childhood development. I want to be very clear on what was said, and I will quote this: "Quality early childhood development, learning and care have been shown to promote physical, language and motor skills; social, emotional and cognitive development." We completely agree. "This priority includes supports that promote healthy development, provide opportunities for interaction and play, help prepare children for school and respond to diverse and changing needs of families. Possible examples include"—and of course in that is child care.

We have more than made huge investments—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): The minister's time is up.

Mrs Dombrowsky: Minister, when it comes to child care, your government has been called the ABC government, anything but child care. If you look at your own government estimates for this year, you are spending less on child care than when you came to office in 1995. Dalton McGuinty has a plan. Our Best Start plan will support 300,000 children with child care costs. We believe this is an investment in our future and sound economic policy, and so do Charlie Coffey and Margaret McCain. It is shameful that Ontario is seen to be blocking the national child care agenda.

Minister, will you work with the federal government, and will you commit today to use some of the accord dollars to invest additional money in child care in the province of Ontario?

Hon Mrs Elliott: I thank my colleague for the question. I would ask her what program she would like us not to deliver with the money we've invested. How about autism or infant development; children's mental health; or learning, earning and parenting programs? What about the Early Years centres we've invested in? How about the early literacy programs? Are those programs she would like us to cut because we choose to put it in child care? I am glad she is beginning to talk about a number of programs, but I would reference one of her very own letters where she says to me, "I urge you to include additional resources for children with autistic spectrum disorder." Nowhere in your letter do you reference child care.

But more importantly, if the federal government is interested in putting together a national child care program, we will wait until we see the details. This is a program they have talked about for 10 years, and I say "talked about" only. We'll wait for some action, because clearly here in Ontario we know what it is to create programs, fund them and, more importantly, deliver. Yesterday I added an additional $58 million to—

The Speaker: The minister's time is up.

SCHOOL ACCOMMODATION

Mr AL McDonald (Nipissing): My question is for the Deputy Premier and Minister of Education. In recent weeks there has been coverage in the media and from our friends in the opposition regarding the overcrowded schools and the need for new schools. Every student in Ontario deserves a quality education, which includes effective and safe accommodation. Could you tell us what this government is doing and has done to accommodate the growing number of students in this province?

Hon Elizabeth Witmer (Deputy Premier, Minister of Education): Our government recognized that it was important to fund new student places because we do have a growing population and many of our students were in portables. So there is now the flexibility and the ability to build schools where and when they are needed throughout the province of Ontario. I am very pleased to say that our funding has actually supported the construction of approximately $3.6 billion in new projects, which means that since 1998 school boards have built 183 new schools and 247 additions or major renovations.

Mr McDonald: Minister, that's great news. I know, for instance, in my riding of Nipissing there have been new construction and renovations taking place in a number of boards. In fact, I've heard from constituents commenting on the new construction. I just want to know what your experience is. Have you heard from local schools on this issue?

Hon Mrs Witmer: There certainly has been a tremendous amount of opening of new schools in recent months and years, and major renovations, and I can tell the member from Nipissing that parents are grateful, trustees are grateful and teachers are grateful. In fact, all of the stakeholders appreciate the fact that we are building new schools.

Last week I participated in the opening of a new school in Waterloo, the Lester B. Pearson school. Recently I was down to Strathroy. They have a very unique arrangement between Thames Valley District School Board and London District Catholic School Board. They actually have a joint facility between Strathroy District Collegiate Institute and Holy Cross Secondary School. I can tell you, it's good news. People in the province are happy with the funding they have to build schools when and where they're needed.

ONTARIO SUPERBUILD CORP

Mr Joseph Cordiano (York South-Weston): I have a question for the minister responsible for SuperBuild. According to this SuperBuild document, $13.2 billion has been committed to projects as of September 2002. Three years and $13.2 billion later, and still you have failed to produce an audited financial statement as you are legally required to do by the Development Corporations Act. Minister, I raised this question four months ago and still you have failed to comply with the law. As a result, you are failing the public by not being accountable for these huge sums of taxpayer dollars.

My question to you is this: of the $13.2 billion committed to date by SuperBuild, how much of that has been actually contributed by the private sector?

Hon Janet Ecker (Minister of Finance): We are quite prepared and do on a regular basis—we're audited.

Ministries put their information out about what plans are going forward for capital plans. We announce publicly when there are public-private partnerships. We list on a Web site the projects that are out there, that are going on under the greatest capital infrastructure investment this province has ever seen, under this government, where we are actually putting new investments—whether it's roads, whether it's sewers, whether it's hospitals—important infrastructure investments that not only improve the quality of life in our province but also help us keep economic prosperity.

Mr Cordiano: She hasn't answered the question. I asked how much has come from the private sector. We know that of the $13.2 billion, $11 billion has come from public sources—federal, provincial and municipal governments—and only $2.2 billion has come from the private sector.

Hon Chris Stockwell (Minister of the Environment, Government House Leader): Only?

Mr Cordiano: That's right, only $2.2 billion.

Minister, when SuperBuild was announced three years ago, you stated—with great fanfare, I might add—that $10 billion was to come from the public sector and another $10 billion was to be leveraged from the private sector. Only $2.2 billion has come from the private sector. That means you are $7.8 billion short of your stated $10-billion target that was to come from the private sector.

My question is this: would you not agree that after almost three years and 3,000 projects, SuperBuild has failed to attract enough private sector funding and that SuperBuild is a super bust?

Hon Mrs Ecker: Only the Liberals would think that 3,000 projects is not successful. Only the Liberals would think that the new construction at our hospitals, at our schools, on our highways, on our sewage and water plants and on our post-secondary institutions is not a success.

The capital investments of this government are duly accounted for. We have numbers in the budget; we have a Web site that lays it out. We are publicly accountable for this, as we should be, and we will continue under SuperBuild, with the co-operation and the working of all the different ministries, to make new investments in important economic infrastructure in this province, as we promised we would do.

LONG-TERM-CARE FACILITIES

Mr Toby Barrett (Haldimand-Norfolk-Brant): My question is for the Associate Minister of Health and Long-Term Care. I know how hard the associate minister and our government are working to make sure that the high standards of our province's long-term-care facilities are met. That's why I want to ask the associate minister about the current situation of Royal Crest Lifecare Group. I understand that Ernst and Young has currently been appointed interim receiver of Royal Crest Lifecare Group as trustee in bankruptcy for all of Royal Crest's nursing and retirement facilities in southern Ontario.

One of these facilities, Norcliffe Lifecare Centre, is located in my riding of Haldimand-Norfolk-Brant, in Hagersville. For the benefit of my constituents who are residents at Norcliffe, as well as for the benefit of their families, could you please provide an update on the facilities formerly operated?

Hon Dan Newman (Associate Minister of Health and Long-Term Care): I'm pleased to respond to the honourable member for Haldimand-Norfolk-Brant. I want the people of his riding to know how hard my colleague works on their behalf at Queen's Park and just what an effective member he is.

The financial creditors of Royal Crest Lifecare Group have received approval from the court to appoint an interim receiver—in this case, Ernst and Young—to operate the long-term-care facilities and retirement homes owned by Royal Crest. During this period of transition, the ministry's role hasn't changed at all. Our role as government, and my job as minister, is to ensure that the safety and well-being of the over 61,000 residents receiving care in long-term-care facilities in Ontario continue. Regardless of who owns a long-term-care facility, we will ensure our regulations and our strict standards for resident care are met or exceeded. That's exactly what we do each and every day of the year, and that's what we're doing in this situation.

Mr Barrett: I certainly thank the associate minister for his response. I'm very pleased to hear the Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care is keeping the health and well-being of facility residents as their number one priority. I know the residents of Norcliffe and their family members are very pleased to hear this as well.

I would like to ask the associate minister if he could provide some additional detail as to how the ministry has monitored and will in the future be monitoring these facilities once owned by Royal Crest to make sure the residents receive the care they deserve. I know my constituents would like to know that.

Hon Mr Newman: I'd like to inform my colleague, and indeed this House, that Ernst and Young has advised the ministry that it has chosen Extencicare (Canada) Inc to assume responsibility for the day-to-day management of their homes as agent of the interim receiver. We're working very closely with Extencicare to ensure that residents receive the care they need. I want to reassure the residents and their families that we have every confidence our strict standards will be met or exceeded. The ministry has enhanced our monitoring at all long-term-care facilities owned by Royal Crest. Our staff has been in every one of the 11 affected facilities, and monitoring will continue throughout this transition period.

I would also like to thank the ministry staff, and especially Paul Tuttle, the director of the ministry's long-term-care branch, who have been putting in the extra hours required during this challenging time. They are true professionals.

WOMEN'S SHELTERS

Ms Marilyn Churley (Toronto-Danforth): I have a question for the Minister of Community, Family and Children's Services. Demand for women's shelters is soaring, yet we hear that in Thunder Bay you are going to shut the Community Residence Women's Shelter, the biggest shelter in town. Police, city council and the community are demanding with one voice, "Don't close that shelter." I'm demanding, "Don't close that shelter." Promise today that you will not close that shelter.

Hon Brenda Elliott (Minister of Community, Family and Children's Services): It's very important to us that facilities are available for women who find themselves in a crisis situation and need a safe refuge at a terrible time in their lives. We've made a tremendous commitment to women's shelters across this province, adding new ones this year.

My understanding of what is occurring is that my ministry's northern region is working with the city of Thunder Bay and the Community Residence Women's Shelter to explore options that will best meet long-term needs. It's my understanding that, yes, there is a plan that's being discussed as to what will happen with the shelter beds in the city of Thunder Bay. It's my understanding that a consultant has actually been hired by the city of Thunder Bay. It's my understanding that conversations are occurring as to what is in the best interests of the region and that no decisions have been made at this time.

Ms Churley: Let me tell you the plan: shut the shelter and ship women and their children three and a half hours away to another shelter, where you're shutting eight out of 10 beds, while occupancy jumped 42% in 2002. Minister, that's the plan. Murders of women by their spouses are up 25% in Ontario in only one year. Mothers, daughters, sisters and their children need protection, and you're throwing them on the street and playing with their lives. Stop. Listen to the police, city council, the community, and listen to me today: withdraw the plan to close the Thunder Bay women's shelter now.

Hon Mrs Elliott: Let me try again. This is not our plan. A community plan is being devised as to what would be the best way to place these shelter beds within the community so that it works for the community. It's a decision to be made by the community, in the best interests of the women who need help.

Mrs Leona Dombrowsky (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I'd like to correct the record with regard to my question on federal dollars for child care in which I have asked the minister to commit. I did put that in a letter to the minister. I think the minister indicated otherwise in her remarks that in fact my letter suggested—

The Speaker: You can correct your own record. You can't correct somebody else's record.

PETITIONS

HIGHWAY 69

Mr Rick Bartolucci (Sudbury): This is the continuing petition to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario regarding the multi-laning of Highway 69 from Sudbury to Parry Sound.

"Whereas modern highways are economic lifelines for the north; and

"Whereas the stretch of Highway 69 from Sudbury south to Parry Sound is a treacherous road with a trail of death and destruction; and

"Whereas the carnage on Highway 69 has been staggering; and

"Whereas in the last three years 46 people have died needlessly along that stretch of highway; and

"Whereas so far this year, 10 people have died on that stretch of highway between Sudbury and Parry Sound; and

"Whereas the Harris-Eves government has shown gross irresponsibility in not four-laning the stretch of Highway 69 between Sudbury and Parry Sound; and

"Whereas immediate action is needed to prevent more needless loss of life; and"

Whereas the Premier of this province is going to Sudbury this Thursday for a fundraiser; and

Whereas the people of the community of Sudbury and northeastern Ontario want the Premier to announce a start date for the four-laning of Highway 69 from Sudbury to Parry Sound; and

"Whereas," as he knows, "it is the responsibility of any government to provide safe roads for its citizens and the Eves government has failed to do so;

"Be it resolved that we, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario to urge the Eves government to begin construction immediately and four-lane Highway 69 between Sudbury and Parry Sound so that the carnage on Death Road North will cease."

Of course, I affix my signature, and give it to our new page Evan to take to the table.

CHARITABLE GAMING

Mr Tony Martin (Sault Ste Marie): "To the Legislative Assembly of Ontario:

"Whereas charitable organizations are now being required to obtain licenses for small in-house raffles, such as 50/50 draws; and

"Whereas the small amount of revenue charities are allowed to retain to cover necessary expenses is arbitrarily defined by government officials; and

"Whereas increased competition from the provincial casinos and commercial gaming establishments for local money is constricting the ability of local charities to raise funds vital to the life of the local community;

"We, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario as follows:

"(1) Immediately direct responsible officials to meet with affected charities to work out a mutually accepted agreement which permits the charities to accomplish the charitable objects of the organization and defines reasonable and necessary expenses allowable in the management and conduct of a lottery;

"(2) Conduct a review of the impact of large casinos and commercial gaming and lotteries on small, non-profit charitable organizations dependant on charitable gaming for their existence;

"(3) Review the criteria used to define reasonable and necessary expenses allowable for the operation of fundraising events by small, charitable organizations;

"(4) Develop new policies to guide the licensing system that recognizes local needs, particularly those of small, charitable organizations."

This is signed by 200 of my community residents over a period of two days, and I sign it as well and send it down with Garnet this afternoon.

NATURAL GAS RATES

Mr Michael Gravelle (Thunder Bay-Superior North): Despite the government's mess on hydro, we still have the problem with the retroactive delivery charge with Union Gas. I want to continue to read petitions related to that.

"To the Legislative Assembly of Ontario:

"Whereas the Ontario Energy Board has consented to allow Union Gas to retroactively charge $40 per month for a three-month period to recover additional system operation costs that occurred during the winter of 2000-01 totalling approximately $150 million; and

"Whereas Union Gas will recover accrued costs over the peak heating season, causing undue hardship; and

"Whereas this retroactive charge will affect all customers who receive Union Gas, including new homeowners and new customers to Union Gas;

"Therefore, we demand that the Ernie Eves government issue a policy directive under section 27.1 of the Ontario Energy Board Act disallowing the retroactive rate hike granted to Union Gas, and we further demand that the Legislature examine the Ontario Energy Board, its processes and its resources, and make changes that will protect consumers from further retroactive rate increases."

I am in full agreement with this petition and I sign my name to the petition.

SCHOOL BUS SAFETY

Mr Pat Hoy (Chatham-Kent Essex): "To the Legislative Assembly of Ontario:

"Whereas some motorists are recklessly endangering the lives of children by not obeying the highway traffic law requiring them to stop for school buses with their warning lights activated;

"Whereas the current law has no teeth to protect the children who ride the school buses of Ontario, and who are at risk and their safety is in jeopardy;

"Whereas the current school bus law is difficult to enforce since not only is a licence plate number required, but positive identification of the driver and the vehicle as well, which makes it extremely difficult to obtain a conviction;

"Therefore, be it resolved that we, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario as follows:

"That the measures contained in private member's Bill 112, An Act to amend the Highway Traffic Act to protect children while on school buses, presented by Pat Hoy, MPP, Chatham-Kent-Essex, be immediately enacted. Bill 112 received the unanimous all-party support of the Ontario Legislature at second reading on June 13, 2002.

"Bill 112 imposed liability on the owner of a vehicle that fails to stop for a school bus that has its overhead red signal lights flashing...."

We ask for the support of all members of this Legislature, and I too have signed this petition.

ONTARIO TEACHER QUALIFYING TEST

Mrs Lyn McLeod (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): I have a petition to the Legislature of Ontario.

"Whereas the Ontario government in accordance with the teacher qualifying test (OTQT) sets out to standardize the teaching profession, we the teacher candidates feel that the OTQT is part of an ongoing attack on public education and would like to take this opportunity to make our voices heard. We believe that there are some fundamental problems with the OTQT established by the Ontario government and the Educational Testing Service (EST); and

"Whereas the Ministry of Education has failed to be accountable in providing consistent and equitable access to information regarding the registration, content, format and evaluation of the Ontario teacher qualifying test to all teacher candidates; and

"Whereas the Ministry of Education has failed to subject the OTQT to sufficient assessments of validity and reliability; and

"Whereas the Ontario College of Teachers that oversees the profession standards, development and accreditation of all its members has not been involved in the development of the test; and

"Whereas a strong body of research demonstrates that standardized testing such as the OTQT program is an inadequate indicator of ability and performance and does not keep with the principles of equity and social justice; and

"Whereas the Educational Testing Service (ETS), the company contracted to develop the OTQT on behalf of the Ministry of Education, has predetermined 'correct' choices that may be subject to discriminatory practices;

"We, the undersigned, petition the Legislature of Ontario as follows:

"Teacher candidates implore the Legislature of Ontario to make the Ontario teacher qualifying test a pilot test and for it not to be considered a requirement for certification by the Ontario College of Teachers."

As you will see, this has been signed by a large number of people training to be teachers in Ontario, and I affix my signature in agreement with their concerns.

LONG-TERM CARE

Mr James J. Bradley (St Catharines): I have a petition that's addressed to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario and it reads as follows:

"Whereas the Eves government has increased the fees paid for by seniors and the most vulnerable living in long-term-care facilities by 15% over three years or $3.02 per diem in the first year and $2 in the second year and $2 in the third year, effective September 1, 2002; and

"Whereas this fee increase will cost seniors and our most vulnerable more than $200 a month after three years; and

"Whereas this increase is above the rent increase guidelines for tenants in the province of Ontario for the year 2002; and

"Whereas the long-term-care funding partnership has been based on government accepting the responsibility to fund the care and services that residents need; and

"Whereas government needs to increase long-term-care operating funding by $750 million over the next three years to raise the level of service for Ontario's long-term-care residents to those in Saskatchewan in 1999; and

"Whereas this province has been built by seniors who should be able to live out their lives with dignity, respect and in comfort in this province;

"We, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario as follows:

"Demand that Premier Eves reduce the 15% increase over three years in accommodation costs to no more than the cost-of-living increase annually and that the provincial government provide adequate funding for nursing and personal care to a level that is at least at the average standard for nursing and personal care in those 10 jurisdictions included in the government's own study."

I affix my signature. I'm in complete agreement with the sentiments expressed in this petition.

HIGHWAY 69

Mr Rick Bartolucci (Sudbury): I continue to submit petitions to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario dealing with the four-laning of Highway 69 between Sudbury and Parry Sound.

"Whereas modern highways are economic lifelines for the north; and

"Whereas the stretch of Highway 69 from Sudbury south to Parry Sound is a treacherous road with a trail of death and destruction; and

"Whereas the carnage on Highway 69 has been staggering;" and

Whereas in the last three years 46 people have needlessly lost their lives on that stretch of highway; and

Whereas so far this year 10 people have died tragically between Sudbury and Parry Sound on that dangerous stretch of highway; and

"Whereas the Harris-Eves government has shown gross irresponsibility in not four-laning the stretch of Highway 69 between Sudbury and Parry Sound; and

"Whereas immediate action is needed to prevent more needless loss of life;" and

Whereas the Premier of this province, Ernie Eves, is going to Sudbury on Thursday for a fundraiser; and

Whereas the people of the community of Sudbury in northeastern Ontario want the Premier of this province to announce a start date and an action plan for the four-laning of Highway 69 from Sudbury south to Parry Sound; and

"Whereas it is the responsibility of a government to provide safe roads for its citizens, and the Harris-Eves government has clearly failed to do so;

"Therefore, be it resolved that we, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario to urge the Harris-Eves government to begin construction immediately and four-lane Highway 69 between Sudbury and Parry Sound so that the carnage on Death Road North will cease."

I affix my signature to the petition and again give it Evan, our new page, to take to the table.

HYDRO RATES

Mr Gerry Martiniuk (Cambridge): I have a petition signed by 720 good citizens of Cambridge which reads:

"A petition to the Parliament of Ontario:

"Whereas the government has stated its commitment to ensuring affordable hydro rates for the citizens of Ontario;

"Whereas the past summer's unusual demand for hydro and the failure to bring all plants up to operating capacity has resulted in a significant increase in hydro rates;

"Whereas these hydro rate increases present a great burden to many young families, seniors and those on fixed incomes;

"Whereas the province still owns Ontario Power Generation that produces most of" Ontario's "electricity and it has stated that a review of hydro rates and its regulating agency, the Ontario Energy Board, is necessary;

"We, the undersigned, petition the Parliament of Ontario as follows:

"That the province be directed to immediately freeze hydro rates to last year's levels during its current review of the Ontario Energy Board's mandate, that the province work with the federal government to eliminate the GST on Hydro One's debt retirement charges and that the province ensure stronger consumer protection for all citizens of Ontario against such hydro rate increases."

I sign my name thereto.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION FUNDING

Mrs Lyn McLeod (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): I have a petition to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario:

"Whereas average tuition fees in Ontario are the second-highest in Canada; and

"Whereas average undergraduate tuition fees in Ontario have more than doubled in the past 10 years; and

"Whereas tuition fees for deregulated programs have, in certain cases, doubled and tripled; and

"Whereas Statistics Canada has documented a link between increasing tuition fees and diminishing access to post-secondary education; and

"Whereas four other provincial governments have taken a leadership role by freezing and reducing tuition fees;

"Therefore, we, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario to:

"Freeze tuition fees for all programs at their current levels, and

"Take steps to reduce the tuition fees of all graduate programs, post-diploma programs and professional programs for which tuition fees have been deregulated since 1998."

This is a concern of hundreds and hundreds of students attending Lakehead University in Thunder Bay.

I affix my signature in full agreement with their concerns.

Mr Michael Gravelle (Thunder Bay-Superior North): I want to read a similar petition to my colleague from Thunder Bay-Atikokan.

"To the Legislative Assembly of Ontario

"From the Lakehead University Student Union, Local 32, Canadian Federation of Students:

"Whereas average tuition fees in Ontario are the second-highest in Canada; and

"Whereas average undergraduate tuition fees in Ontario have more than doubled in the past 10 years; and

"Whereas tuition fees for deregulated programs have, in certain cases, doubled and tripled; and

"Whereas Statistics Canada has documented a link between increasing tuition fees and diminishing access to post-secondary education; and

"Whereas four other provincial governments have taken a leadership role by freezing and reducing tuition fees;

"Therefore, we, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario to:

"Freeze tuition fees for all programs at their current levels, and

"Take steps to reduce the tuition fees of all graduate programs, post-diploma programs and professional programs for which tuition fees have been deregulated since 1998."

As my colleague said, we have hundreds and hundreds of names on these petitions. I'm happy to add my name to the petition.

HIGHWAY 69

Mr Rick Bartolucci (Sudbury): These are some more petitions with regard to the four-laning of Highway 69.

"To the Legislative Assembly of Ontario:

"Whereas modern highways are economic lifelines for the north; and

"Whereas the stretch of Highway 69 from Sudbury south to Parry Sound is a treacherous road with a trail of death and destruction; and

"Whereas the carnage on Highway 69 has been staggering; and

"Whereas, in the last three years 46 people have died needlessly along that stretch of highway between Sudbury and Parry Sound; and

"Whereas so far this year 10 people have been tragically killed in motor vehicle accidents between Sudbury and Parry Sound on Highway 69; and

"Whereas the Harris-Eves government has shown gross irresponsibility in not four-laning the stretch of Highway 69 between Sudbury and Parry Sound; and

"Whereas immediate action is needed to prevent more needless loss of life; and

"Whereas it is the responsibility of a government to provide safe roads for its citizens, and the Harris-Eves government has failed to do so;

"Therefore, be it resolved that we, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario to urge the Harris-Eves government to begin construction immediately and four-lane Highway 69 between Sudbury and Parry Sound so that the carnage on Death Road North will cease."

I, of course, affix my signature to this petition and give it to Jared to bring to the table.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Mr Hudak has moved government notice of motion 63. The minister.

Hon Mr Hudak: I'm very pleased to speak to Bill 180 and the motion that's before the House today. In fact, I have enjoyed the debate to date on Bill 180. To refresh those watching at home, Bill 180 is the consumer protection for the 21st century legislation, CP21 for short. This is groundbreaking legislation to help bring into modern times our consumer protection legislation in the province of Ontario.

The last time this legislation was overhauled in any fundamental way, the time when many of these bills were brought forward, was a time, in the 1960s and 1970s, when computers were the size of transport trucks, when the only people who had computers were NASA scientists and the Internet was simply the figment of a science fiction writer's imagination. In today's day and age, 2002, we have come a long way in terms of the way we do business in the province, the way contracts are signed and the tools we use to communicate, to research and therefore, through e-commerce, to purchase goods and services as well.

CP21, the consumer protection for the 21st century legislation, addresses those areas. It makes sure that our laws are up to date so that consumers, whether they be a senior citizen or a student away at the University of Western Ontario for the first time, will have protection if they're targeted by unscrupulous business operators.

I think every member of the House probably feels the same way as I do. I said in my remarks that I believe the vast majority of these businesses that practise in these fields are honest operators with legitimate practices, and they are careful to make sure that their product is described accurately. They try to maintain good relationships with their customers. After all, they would like their friend or neighbour or fellow student or somebody else in the senior's complex to similarly buy their product. Unfortunately, in many areas we do have unscrupulous operators who target the vulnerable, try to take advantage of them and often abscond with the money and set up a scam operation somewhere else.

In fact the ministry, every year, puts out its list of top consumer complaints. This year our top five scams in the province of Ontario to help to alert consumers about some of the issues out there that they should be aware of—the first lesson is always to exercise common sense. If something sounds too good to be true, it probably is too good to be true. Secondly, you should always read the fine print. I think, always in dealing with areas where you are making a significant purchase—a house, auto repairs, buying a new car—it is important to ask a lot of questions and look for advice from people who are in the consumer industry, your friends, your neighbours, somebody whom you trust to make sure you are dealing with an operator who has a good reputation in the community. But, of course, those types of precautions don't always work.

That's why we need laws like CP21. If passed by the House, it will help protect consumers in vulnerable situations. I have had the pleasure of being here through, I think, the vast majority of the debate, through second reading on this bill. It seems to me that I have heard significantly a weight on behalf of supporting the bill. I know that the opposition parties, as well as the government, of course, voted in support on first reading. I hope we'll have similar support across the floor on second and third readings as well. In fact, when I have listened to the debate when I have been sitting here in the afternoon or evening House sittings on Bill 180, I tend to hear general support from across the floor. I know a lot of my government members and colleagues have spoken in favour of this legislation. Many of the ideas, quite frankly, they have brought up in caucus. They've encountered senior citizens, for example, who are targeted by an unscrupulous driveway paving operation that does a shoddy job and takes off with the money and leaves the senior citizen in the lurch, or a telemarketing operation that calls a student saying, "We can get you a loan at a very low rate, below the bank rate. We have some patient money that is coming in from overseas. Only if you give me $1,000 up front, if you write me a cheque, I'll get you this low-interest loan." You write the cheque, the money disappears and there is no loan as a result. I know many members of the assembly have encountered this on the part of their constituents and have done their best to try stamp out these operators.

Our legislation, if passed, will help us do an even better job of prosecuting and tracking these people down and putting these illegitimate businesses out of business. I've been pleased with the support that I have heard from the government members and from those across the floor.

I look forward to an opportunity, as the motion reads, to take this to committee for consideration. There have been some issues that have been brought up—some that I'll address here today, others that I believe will be addressed through the committee process and then put to a vote for second and third reading. Certainly, as the minister responsible in this area, with the work of my predecessors, particularly Minister Sterling, who did a lot of work in this area—Tsubouchi and Runciman as well—we're all looking forward to seeing this project completed, to be brought to its final fruition and then giving our prosecutors, our investigators, the ability to go out there and do an even better job than they are currently doing to crack down on these operators.

I want to say too, I think we have a very enviable record at the Ministry of Consumer and Business Services, whether it's co-operating with other provinces or states, working with police forces to crack down on these types of scam artists. In fact, as I mentioned in the House yesterday during question period, over $2 million in the last little while was returned to consumers, over $1 million in penalties, as well as months and years of jail time have been assigned by the judges in the cases that our prosecutors have brought forward. In fact, our staff have been recognized with international awards for their work, particularly in shutting down telemarketing scams that may use Ontario as a base and target seniors in other provinces or states. There were many great victories in that area.

Nonetheless, our view here in the Ernie Eves government is you don't rest on your laurels. You try to improve; you try to do a better job on behalf of those who pay the bills, the taxpayers, on behalf of our constituents. Certainly Bill 180, if passed, will allow us to do so.

One area that I know has come up for discussion during debate has to do with the Internet. As I mentioned in my earlier comments, for the first time consumer protection legislation under Bill 180 will take into account the new economy, the new e-commerce, and give consumers the same protections on the Internet that they would receive from regular face-to-face contacts that we customarily associate with consumer protection laws. We will expand consumer protection into e-commerce. We do this in a number of ways. For example, we are bringing in a 30-day delivery rule that says that if you ordered goods, the goods would have to be delivered or the service provided within 30 days of when you were told you would get that good or service. If you don't, you can cancel the contract, no questions asked. That type of rule exists for goods and services. We are now expanding it to the Internet for that type of protection.

Similarly, we are bringing forward rules that allow for contracts through the Internet that will describe the goods accurately and, secondly, are either in e-format or any kind of printable format so the consumer, when making that purchase, will have a permanent record of what he or she had purchased. Just like if they walked into a store and made a purchase, they would have that contract describing the goods; they would have some standing in a court of law or working with the ministry if something had gone wrong.

Thirdly, we ask for a bricks-and-mortar address so that a consumer will know where they can go for face-to-face contact if something has gone awry with a product that they had ordered.

This is all part of a harmonization strategy as well across the various provinces. I think all provinces have signed on to this. Ontario happens to be quite advanced now in the legislative process to actually put the principles into law. But the goal is that, from one ocean to another to a third, we would have similar laws across Canada. So we could work with British Columbia, for example. If there's a scam artist at work in Ontario who uses the Internet to take advantage of somebody in British Columbia, we could work with each other to prosecute that individual and put them out of business. Similarly, we want to work with the States and other jurisdictions in that area.

Obviously, you're not going to solve all the problems overnight. There will be operators at work in other countries where we don't have these agreements. That's true, and that's why the bricks-and-mortar law is important, so that you know where the business operates from. If the country is far away and it may not have the best reputation for lawfulness, you should probably be cautious in terms of buying a good or service from that country via the Internet.

Nonetheless, this is an important step forward, at least within the North American context, that now is expanding to other parts of the world to help have similar laws and support each other's prosecutions if people have been taken advantage of. I think that will respond to many of the concerns I've heard today. I think it's an important step forward.

Certainly many members have brought up, I think because it was a hot issue at the time, how hydro prices are impacted by this bill. But as I said during debate and I'd remind members today, the previous Bill 58 that was passed by the assembly takes many of the same principles that we have in Bill 180 and puts them into force. That was Bill 58, the Reliable Energy and Consumer Protection Act. Just like Bill 180, it eliminates negative renewal options, taking away negative-option billing, often an odious process that takes money from people for things they didn't order and they didn't want. Bill 180 eliminates that across the board for goods and services, and similarly Bill 58 with respect to energy prices includes that.

We also have in Bill 58, already passed, replacing a 10-day right to cancel with a 30-day period; I had mentioned in our legislation a 30-day delivery rule. People could get out of contracts if not delivered within 30 days of the contracted delivery date.

Bill 58 has a 15-day cooling-off period before a new contract can be reaffirmed. Similarly in this legislation, we expand the cooling-off period. For example, if an individual feels pressured by high-pressure sales tactics—vacation clubs are an example of that—this cooling-off period gives them a chance to rethink, to maybe get in contact with and get some advice from somebody they trust and get out of that contract, no questions asked, if they were the victim of these types of high-pressure sales tactics, which we certainly get complaints about at the Ministry of Consumer and Business Services.

That was one area, the e-commerce, that I think I've responded to. Bill 58 includes similar provisions with respect to the hydro market that are included in Bill 180 for e-commerce for goods and services outside the hydro side.

As well, I want to say that we have made every effort, to some comments from members, to do a broad-based consultation on this piece of legislation, CP21. In fact, this is not something that we did overnight. This is something that came about after several years of work by ministry staff and some of my predecessors. In fact, a blue paper—

Interjection.

Hon Mr Hudak: Well, it was a document with a blue cover. Maybe it's not technically a blue paper, but a document was put out some time ago and dispersed broadly and we had a great deal of response. It was also posted on the Internet and given to all members of the assembly, I understand. Through those consultations, including hearings, I believe, in eight or so different communities, we received over 1,200 different submissions from consumers, from business groups and other interested parties. As I mentioned, these proposals came about because we analyzed 40,000 different sets of information, whether they were complaints, calls, inquiries or other pieces of data, to bring forward our recommendations to the assembly for changing and modernizing the laws.

Let me give you some examples. Here are some third-party quotes: "Having participated in your department's consultations two years ago, we have been eagerly awaiting this legislative initiative." Now Mr Michael Janigan, the executive director of the Public Interest Advocacy Centre, should be happy because the consultations have come forward with a bill that is before the House and to date has received support from all parties.

Another quote from the Public Interest Advocacy Centre: "We are writing to congratulate you on the excellent and much-needed consumer protection law reform initiative Bill 180," CP21, "that you tabled in the Legislature last week." They "are particularly pleased to see that the right to access the publicly funded justice system, in particular via class actions, will be protected" through this legislation.

The Consumers Council of Canada, some folks I had in my office just two weeks ago to discuss consumer issues, are very pleased with this legislation and with progress through the assembly. I'm sure they would like to see it passed into law. Joan Huzar, the president of the Consumers Council of Canada, said, "Our organization has been involved with the development of this proposed legislation to provide better consumer protection since its initiation and applauds the government for its interest in helping promote fairness in the marketplace." So an important constituency group is supportive that has as their sole mandate the protection of consumers and getting information to consumers on how to deal in the economy.

There are some other issues that have been brought forward, one last night. Some may not be best put in a consumer protection piece; they're issues that we all react to, I know, but sometimes they have other homes. My colleague from St Catharines talked about the PSA test last night, the prostate test, which probably, on consideration, wouldn't belong in a consumer protection bill. I think it would belong in the Ministry of Health reviewing what tests work. It is a valid point. I think it's important for us to try to help those who have prostate cancer, obviously, or to help anticipate developments so we can treat them early on. But I think that's something that is best done through the health process rather than CP21. I appreciate the member's input on this important issue but, upon review, I'm not going to move any changes to the bill with respect to the PSA.

I know there are other members on the government side of the House who are in rapt attention and who want to speak to this bill. I will just finally summarize some of the highlights as we go through this motion and then, hopefully, into votes for second and third reading, some of the major changes that I think will be important to constituents and taxpayers.

The 10% rule in this legislation basically says that if you get an estimate, for example, for a home repair, the final price would have to be within 10% of that estimate. So a situation where you were getting a home repair, for example, for $2,000 and you get a bill for $20,000 would not be allowed under this legislation. The maximum price would be $2,200. Of course if you as the owner, as part of the contract, agree to—say you wanted to add a roof. If you're agreeing to that, then that would allow an increase in the price. But you'd have to agree to consent to that; no more lowballing the price and then coming back with a much higher bill. It's an important consumer protection. It currently exists in the auto repair sector. We're expanding it to other areas. Most importantly, I think, home repair is one area.

I had mentioned the 30-day delivery rule. It's common, currently under door-to-door direct sales, that if you feel intimidated by a salesperson at your door and sign a contract, then you would, as I mentioned, have a cooling-off period and the final good would have to be within, now in the legislation, 30 days of the delivery date. Previously it was two weeks for door-to-door sales; now it's to 30 days and, as I mentioned, for the first time Internet sales are going to 30 days. So regardless of when the contract was agreed to, if a delivery or performance commencement date is missed by 30 days without the consumer's consent in writing, then the consumer has a right to cancel that contract.

Time-sharing is a hot issue that we deal with often in our constituency offices. For example, a couple attends a time-share presentation and is bombarded with all kinds of promises of a glorious location, access any time they want, by a very aggressive salesperson. Exasperated and somewhat exhausted, they agree to buy, sign the contract and make a $2,000 down payment and commit to a further $8,000 down the road. But the next day, when they get home and read the contract in greater detail, they realize they will not be getting the location they had wanted or the time entitlement they had been promised based on the sales presentation. When they try to cancel the purchase, the seller refuses to allow the purchase to be cancelled. They hire a lawyer to help them out, but after paying thousands of dollars in legal fees, they can no longer afford to fight that claim.

Unfortunately, under the current consumer law which I mentioned, most of which was developed in the 1960s and 1970s, this really wasn't anticipated, and as such, no specific concerns can be addressed through that legislation. Time-shares are not defined, and that leads to confusion in the law, which is not of great benefit to somebody who is scammed in this particular area. Consumers do not have cooling-off rights under current legislation in that situation.

Under the proposed legislation that is before the assembly today, CP21, time-shares would be clearly defined and consumers would gain a 10-day cooling-off period within which they could reconsider their purchase and get out of that contract with no questions asked. Basically, it helps them to escape being victims of high-pressure sales tactics.

Mr Bart Maves (Niagara Falls): I've been in those sales meetings. They are high-pressure.

Hon Mr Hudak: You've seen that before. The member for Niagara Falls has been in them, but he outwitted them, obviously.

Mr Maves: I just said no.

Hon Mr Hudak: He's a clever fellow. But often people do fall victim to these types of scams, and we try to do our best to help. This legislation, if passed, will go a lot further toward addressing that particular issue.

Finally, as always, the enforcement side is very important. This legislation will help to more than double the fines. Whether it's individuals or a corporation, the fines will at least double. As well, jail times that can be assigned by judges will go up to the provincial maximum of two years less a day. We also bring some consistency to the time periods for prosecution. What often happens is that a consumer will bring a complaint forward about how they have been taken advantage of in some of the areas I've mentioned here before the assembly today, but by the time they take it forward to the complaint level and we begin to investigate, the time period expires to bring forward an effective prosecution. We are advancing and bringing consistency to that time frame to two years. That gives our prosecutors much greater ability to do their investigations and get retribution for the consumers who have been taken advantage of.

Lastly, we deal with three areas that the ministry has had a very strong relationship with, some of the biggest purchases people make in their lives: automobile, home, or a big vacation. This legislation deals with REBBA, the Real Estate and Business Brokers Act, as well as legislation dealing with the Ontario motor vehicles incorporation that helps to set the rules in terms of who can enter into automobile sales and the high standards that must be set to ensure there is confidence in that industry. As well, there are some enhancements to govern the travel industry. After all, if consumers are making large purchases in these areas, we want to make sure they are dealt with in a professional way and that if they are taken advantage of, they will have some sort of retribution, that there are disciplinary possibilities, codes of ethics, in these important areas.

Most importantly, having high standards will reinforce the confidence that people have in these industries. These strong councils, these strong administrative authorities, then will lend their reputation so that consumers will know that if they are going to buy a car or a house and they don't get what they asked for, they will have some opportunities to get some retribution in those areas, and similarly for vacations. We've enjoyed our relationship with these authorities and we look forward to this legislation passing, strengthening their ability to deal in these areas and strengthening their relationship with the Ministry of Consumer and Business Services and the Ernie Eves government.

My last point in that respect is that this is also good for business. By ensuring that consumers have confidence in businesses and by weeding out those who take advantage and often bring unwanted media attention to an industry, it helps strong, legitimate operators to grow, to prosper and to hire more people. If you have a car dealer who is an unscrupulous operator who keeps selling poor vehicles to consumers, that hurts other dealers in that community and in the whole province. By having high standards, a code of ethics and such, we can help existing businesses, the vast majority of which are strong, legitimate operators, to grow, to flourish and to hire more people.

I hope we will see this motion pass today and it would be nice to see all-party support for Bill 180, CP21, consumer protection for the 21st century. There was a lot of effort, a lot of consultations. It's a good piece of legislation that will take a giant step forward in helping consumers deal with the top five scams in Ontario.

Mr Rick Bartolucci (Sudbury): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: To your right, one of the pages sitting down is Michael Schonberger from Sudbury, and I'd like to point out Michael's mother, Mrs Deb Schonberger, who is in the members' gallery today, and welcome her to the Toronto experience.

The Acting Speaker (Mr Michael A. Brown): That, of course, is not a point of order, but we welcome you.

Further debate.

Mr James J. Bradley (St Catharines): I was wondering whether the minister would get around to a couple of clippings I saw in the paper. He was quoting third-party commenters on his legislation. There's one, Jacob Ziegel, who is a professor emeritus at the University of Toronto faculty of law. He is not quite so complementary as some of the interventions the minister mentioned before.

Another one, from Bob Aaron, says, "Pointing Out 'Hudak's Folly.'" I don't know how he could come up with that. But he has this final paragraph, probably very unfair. The final paragraph says, "Hudak may go down in Ontario history as the minister who protected consumers from smooth door-to-door renovators, but in the real estate community, his failure to implement meaningful changes to the law is destined to be forever known as 'Hudak's folly.'"

I don't know why he would say that. I'll leave these for other Liberal members, since I know the member and I don't want to insult him personally with these other references. But I knew he had mentioned a couple, so I thought I might share with him a couple of other comments.

As well, since we're talking about a time allocation motion that allows a little bit of flexibility, I was pleased to see the member for Niagara Falls here. I was down at Niagara Falls just this past week when they were announcing the Liberal policy of proceeding with Beck 3. I remember it: I was down with Dalton McGuinty at the edge of the Niagara River. The mayor of Niagara Falls was there at the time. We were saying—once again—that we should proceed with the tunnel project and, ultimately, probably the full project at Beck 3. I want to tell my friend from Perth that government members were dismissing it. They said, "Well, we can't afford to do that; it's not practical at this time," and so on—many negative comments.

A few weeks later I'm down there and the government is announcing the same policy. I'm glad to see that conversion. The media asked me on that occasion, "Are you annoyed with them? What do you think of all this?" I said, "I'm always pleased to see them take the good ideas from the Liberal opposition and implement those ideas." So I want to compliment them on that particular project.

The Minister of the Environment has reappeared after his conference call on Kyoto that he was just involved in. I hope that in that conference call he was talking about matters of great importance and actually quoting the Environmental Commissioner of Ontario, who today—I know that Minister Hudak, who was purported at one time to be the potential Minister of the Environment and would have taken a different stance from the present Minister of the Environment, would be delighted to hear the Environmental Commissioner of Ontario, Gordon Miller, this morning say that the science is sound. Of course, the implication is that Ontario should be implementing provisions which would help reduce greenhouse gases. I agree—

Interjection.

Mr Bradley: We're in a time allocation motion, in case you're wondering.

I was very pleased as well that the minister extolled some of the virtues of the bill, because what happens is that people from radio stations or newspapers and so on phone us and say, "Isn't there anything the government does that's good that you would agree with?" I always say, "Call Tim Hudak. Call Bart Maves. They will tell you what a good job the government is doing. I'll help you out with the other side of it."

It's not as though we think everything the government does is wrong; it's just that I'm confident the government itself will tell us what a good job it's doing. In fact, Bob Aaron, who was writing this article for the Toronto Star, talked about "Hudak's publicity machine," so there must be something to that. No doubt once this bill is passed, as it will be because the government will rush it through, there will be government advertising to follow to tell everybody what a good job the government is doing. That will be at the taxpayers' expense and add on to over a quarter of a billion dollars that this government has squandered on self-serving, clearly partisan government advertising.

By the way, I attended the other night a meeting in St Catharines of the Council of Canadians with Maud Barlow as guest speaker. Maude, as always, was very good, and there was a suitable, large group of people there who wanted to protect health care in the province. Again, when I think of consumer protection—it's a bit of a stretch, I realize that. The Associate Minister of Health is here at this time, so I can say this. People were concerned that there was going to be even more privatization of the health care system in this province. I hope that those on the government side, though they may be few in number, will counsel against this.

They worried, of course, that instead of providing money to Sunnybrook Hospital, money was provided to a private firm to provide radiation services. We notice that in eastern Ontario it's a private firm providing kidney dialysis services. We notice that the government now wants to have the private sector building and leasing back hospitals, and now the MRI machines and the CAT scan machines. So we're moving, in my view, step-by-step—not one huge leap but step-by-step—into privatization. I would call upon the consumer minister of this province to protect us from this movement toward privatization of the health care system.

I would also hope that there would have been something in this bill—the Toronto members will understand this and the member for Barrie who may take this route from time to time. The gouging that's going on on Highway 407 is something to behold. I looked through the bill carefully and I thought, "Where is the section on Highway 407 preventing the constantly increasing costs of using Highway 407?" I am told by people that it would cost you less in tolls to go from St Catharines, Ontario, to New York City than it would to go across the length of Highway 407.

And then there are the billing practices. I keep paying these bills and I'm wondering, "Didn't I already pay that bill?" They keep sending you a bill and you can never find the last bill. We all know you can never find the last bill. So you pay it, because if you don't pay it they charge you $30 in addition to that and when it comes time to renew your licence they're using the hammer of the Ontario government on you.

I can tell you that my constituents phone to complain often about the gouging on Highway 407, the billing practices and so on, and I looked completely through this bill to try to find anything to protect the consumer and I can't find it. So I when I visit the member for Barrie and I have to take the 407 to avoid some traffic, I get gouged. Barrie is a wonderful place to visit, I know that and I know he believes that to be the case as well.

Interjection.

Mr Bradley: I say to my friend from Peterborough, I would like to use Highway 401 except it's totally clogged. One of the reasons for that is the lack of public transit that this government is responsible for. You will remember that consumers have to pay a lot more for public transit today because this government withdrew its support for a number of years from public transit that provides an alternative for people who, not on every occasion, want to use their personal vehicle to get from one place to another. They would like that public transit that would reduce the traffic on the highways, that would stop gridlock and it would of course reduce the need for expenditures for widening such highways.

I note as well other consumers out there are people who are on the Ontario disability support program. Someone in my caucus will correct me, but I know that Mrs Dombrowsky has raised this issue in the House, that there has not been an increase since 1993 in the basic money or pension—whatever you want to call it—the support payments that are provided for people on disability. It's most unfortunate that that's the case, because they are facing all of these increased costs that are not protected in this bill. Though I want to tell the minister there are some good provisions in the bill, there are a number that are absent from this bill.

An increase in the Ontario disability support program is long overdue. I hope the government will announce this in the near future. Indeed, I ask them to announce it in the near future.

I want to note as well that there is a need to protect those who need Visudyne treatment. You will remember that I wrote letters to several Ministers of Health and raised it in questions in the House, in statements and speeches. Finally, the Minister of Health capitulated and said, "We're going to cover Visudyne treatment." This was two years after Health Canada approved it.

I was somewhat delighted on the first day of the announcement until I examined the restrictions that are placed on those who are to receive the treatment. First of all, it has to be age-related or you can't get the treatment. Obviously you can't be covered for that. Eighty per cent to 90% of the people I thought would be covered are not eligible, and you have to have lost 50% of your eyesight before you're eligible. Rather than taking preventive action early on, they wait until a person has lost at least half their eyesight. Those people, from the period of time Health Canada approved that treatment for use to the time the minister announced it, are out of pocket. Many of them had to sell or remortgage their homes. Many had to deplete their personal savings to be able to pay for that. I think the government has an opportunity to correct that. I hope they do.

I mention as well, as I must in every speech in this House, that there's a need in the Niagara Peninsula—and I heard Mrs Papatello, the member for Windsor West, raising the issue on behalf of the Liberal Party once again—and that is the dire need for family physicians and other physicians in the Niagara region at this time. People are retiring. They're departing from the Niagara Peninsula. Sometimes they pass on and are unable to receive treatment from a doctor. We desperately need them. In terms of consumer protection, there are a lot of consumers out there who are not getting the protection of having a family physician available to them. Those young people who have gone abroad to medical schools and are now coming back, we have to find a way to speed up the process of allowing them to practise in Ontario without causing any problems, without lowering the quality, and I call upon the government to do that.

I now relinquish my time to the New Democratic Party and, I think, my friend from Hamilton West.

Mr David Christopherson (Hamilton West): It's an honour to follow my friend from St Catharines. Indeed, many of the broader issues he speaks of affect our geographical area in this large province, and I'll touch on those.

But let me just say at the outset that this is an awfully big bill to change very little, quite frankly. The proof of that is the fact that you don't hear either one of the two opposition parties clinging from the ceiling, going crazy about the bill. The only time that ever happens is when it's really not that important.

You're making some changes that are positive. Any steps you might take toward consumer protection would, by definition, have to be somewhat popular because supposedly you're protecting the public, but I'm not going to go on at great length because they're not that big; they're not that radical. It's not going to make that big a difference.

As my friend from St Catharines likes to point out, once a member becomes a backbench member of the government, they grow a third arm, and that third arm is of course to pat themselves on the back. I'll leave all of that up to you guys. You've got all the canned speeches and all the talking points for how wonderful you are. I'll leave it at that.

What I want to do in relation to this bill and in relation to the issue of consumer protection is talk about what you're not doing.

Hon Robert W. Runciman (Minister of Public Safety and Security): Come on.

Mr Christopherson: One of the ministers across says, "Come on." What did he expect when the government tables a bill of 162 pages that really doesn't do an awful lot?

I'm going to talk about what you're not doing, because those are the issues that really matter. The number one consumer issue in Ontario is what? It's hydro.

The other day after they made their announcement, I heard one of the other ministers say, when he came into the House and somebody said, "How's it going?" he said, "My phone stopped ringing." That's about the level of concern the government has with regard to consumers.

I want to say a couple of things about your wonderful nine-point program. It should be called a nine-step program. First of all, people do appreciate the fact that the crisis you caused seems to be somewhat abating in that the bill in front of them is now not going to require people to make a choice between paying their hydro bill and food, paying their hydro bill and buying medicine, paying their hydro bill and maybe having any kind of family Christmas.

Do you know what's interesting about this? A couple of things.

First of all, people know that you're not doing them any favours, that this is full-fledged damage control and that you only did this because you had to.

Secondly—and it's an argument that often is difficult to make, my experience has been, but people have got this one, and they got it in one. That is that the cost differential between 4.3 cents and whatever the market dictates is still going to be paid to those private generators. They still get the money. It's not going to show up immediately on the hydro bill until—what?—2006, but people understand fully that that money has got to be paid. You've got private entities—if they aren't private now, you're planning to make them private—who are getting full market price, only it's coming from our general taxation. That money is going to be paid. But one thing you're not going to do is stand up and say, "We're going to deny any private entity making a profit off the backs of any potential suffering by the people of Ontario." You're not going to do that. So rather than make those private entities rich from the monthly bills, you're going to cap it, but that money has got to come from somewhere. People understand that you're either going to go into debt or you're going to have to find the money somewhere.

Mr Bert Johnson (Perth-Middlesex): That's where you're wrong.

Mr Christopherson: I hear one of the backbenchers barking that I'm wrong. Well, you may have a chance to speak after me; you stand up and look in the cameras and you tell the people of Ontario how your plan is not going to cost them one dime and that nobody's going to profit by it. I guarantee you, it's not going to happen. The fact of the matter is, that profit margin has to be paid for from somewhere.

Up until now, Ontario Hydro was in the hands of the public. Yes, it ran a debt, and yes, there's enough blame to go around as to where that debt came from and how we got into that position. But do you know what? At the end of the day, the raison d'être, the purpose for which that organization exists, is to provide power at cost.

Now, before you say, "It wasn't at cost," I acknowledge that part of that cost is the resulting debt that was there. No question. But the benefits of Ontario Hydro, notwithstanding the changes that needed to be made as time went on and as it got bigger, and one of the reasons that we in Ontario and we specifically who live around the Golden Horseshoe—the reason it's called the Golden Horseshoe and one of the reasons we are so successful and that that part of this province is one of the industrial-economic engines of the entire nation is because of the affordability and the reliability of hydroelectric power, through whatever means it's generated—the generic term of hydro power.

That's when you succumbed to the siren call of those who saw all that money and wanted a piece of it. And do you know what? It's the same kind of folks, because that's the kind of system we have, who are standing out there in the private world drooling over getting their hands on workers' compensation, because there's billions of dollars there. The same with our health care system. It's still relatively foreign to us—although I have to acknowledge that appears to be changing a bit—that there would be hospitals whose primary responsibility is to make a profit for the shareholders. I mean, we still don't think of hospitals that way.

Mr Joseph N. Tascona (Barrie-Simcoe-Bradford): Bill 180.

Mr Christopherson: Pardon me? Yes, Bill 180. It's called consumer protection, and I'm pointing out why this bill is inadequate. You just don't like what I'm saying. There's a difference between you don't like what I'm saying versus its being out of order. The fact of the matter is, you don't like it. Too bad. It's my time, and I'm going to say what I think needs to be said on behalf of my constituents. That's the way this place works.

Mr Tascona: I'm listening.

Mr Christopherson: Well, that's good. The member now says he's listening. That's good, because a minute ago he wanted to shut me up. Now he's listening. We're making progress. There is hope—not much in this bill, but there is hope.

There are reasons why workers' compensation is within the public domain, why our hospital system and our health care system are within the public domain, and there are reasons why the hydro system has been within the public domain. If you sat back and wrote this story, one could never imagine that at the end of the day, where we are now, there could be an argument at all that this government could give that would in any way attempt to explain what you've done, the damage that you have done to individuals. You scared a lot of my senior citizens, a lot of vulnerable people, virtually everybody. You scared them. And do you know what? They don't have a lot of inherent faith that you get up every day and say, "What can I do for the majority of the citizens of this province?" People don't believe that. They can believe mostly what they know. They know from their hydro bill that you weren't looking out for them.

So while you want to stand up and say Bill 180 is this wonderful consumer protection bill, what people really want to know about is, when are you going to start dealing with the issues that affect people on a day-to-day basis and start protecting them instead of selling out to your corporate interest pals? Because that's what happened. Now there are some of you over there who like the idea so much that you want to do the same thing to our hospitals and our schools and WSIB, workers' compensation.

You don't have to be a raving leftie to accept the fact that it is in the public interest that certain aspects of our society and certain aspects of our economy should be there for the good of the broader public. You did this because your friends saw a chance to make a whole lot of money. It's not the first one. There are plenty of examples. Just take a look at your whole tax cut strategy, if you want to call it that. Now you stand up about how many people are affected, but you know what? At the end of the day, the wealthier you are, the more money you get from the policies of this government. Only this one blew up in your faces.

The only reason you took any action was because this province was about to be paralyzed if you didn't do something. But you didn't do what really needs to be done, and that is to admit totally that the whole idea was a bad one and that you bungled it from beginning to end, that you've seen the error of your ways and that you are not going to do this—what is it currently? It's 49% you're going to sell, but not 51%, as if that makes some kind of difference at the end of the day. Just by the way, if you happen to be somebody who has a big enough chunk of that 49%, you don't think the Premier of a Tory government is going to be listening really carefully when they say they don't like what's going on? So don't be fooled that only 49% is being sold. The influence will be there; the demand will be there. That 49% will get a lot more than 49% influence.

Yes, you're capping back to May 1. There's the admission right there: the day you brought it in, the disaster started. Your so-called plan of action goes right back to the day your first plan took effect, and you're still planning to give that excess money to whoever can get the most in the marketplace.

And while we're talking about the magic of the marketplace, let's just really look at what's going on here. This whole concept was based on—and I am talking about consumer protection, because you said the reason you were going to bring in your changes, your deregulation and privatization, was because consumers were going to pay lower rates at the end of the day because there would be more competition and the competition would cause prices to fall, just as if we had The Bay competing with Sears—it was going to be that kind of competitiveness. If you have one place selling a pair of jeans and somebody else that wants to sell you that same pair of jeans, they're going to sell them at a little less because they want your business. If they're willing to take a little less profit on each one, and they do things a little more efficiently, then they can afford to do that and that whole system provides competitive advantages to the consumer. Do you know what? In huge, overwhelming aspects of our economy, that's what happens, and by and large it works.

Here your thinking is that by opening it up to the private sector there's an opportunity for the private sector to come in and make money, and that's where the competition will come from. Let's just think about this. If somebody's going to invest the hundreds of millions, possibly billions, of dollars that it takes to open up a power generation system or plant, then they're going to expect a pretty decent return. I'm not aware of too many financial people who take a billion dollars and say, "We'll put it over there and we don't really now if it'll make any money or not, but we'll just put it there because it's a nice public service." No, they're going to want a good return. How do they gauge whether they're going to get a good return? The first thing they want to do is take a look and see, "How much do we get for this product we're producing?" What they want to see is higher rates, because if there's higher rates there's more profit; it makes more sense to make the investment. But you said that competition was going to bring in lower rates. If it brought in lower rates, who would want to invest there, especially if they think the rates are going to go down over time? It doesn't work.

Howard Hampton told you two years ago it wouldn't work. You don't need to look any further than our own country, a neighbour province, Alberta, to see what happened there. There are other examples all across the United States where they're all backing up trying to undo the damage, just like you're doing. But you went straight ahead anyway and said, "It's in the interests of the citizens and the consumers." Howard Hampton and the New Democrats said, "That's not going to happen. You're going to hurt people," and that's exactly what you did.

I understand that some of the Enron people were some of the folks that you brought in to give you advice on how to set up this boondoggle—imagine. And they still didn't stop, they still went ahead and did it. What does that tell us? It tells us they thought they could get away with it. You knew prices were going to go up, but you hoped they would only go up a bit, enough that people would swallow, accept the rest of your spin and life could go on the way you wanted it to. But money doesn't work that way.

One thing I learned in the Ministry of Finance when I was there as parliamentary assistant for two years is that money doesn't have a heart or a conscience or a political affiliation. It just goes where more money can be made. That was the game plan here.

Do we need to look too far except the news every day to realize the importance of energy, whether it's hydro or oil, to understand the strength of the entities that have influence in the world on this issue?

Now you want people to believe that the whole thing from beginning to end was meant to be consumer protection, just like your Bill 180, that that's all you were doing. You got caught.

I have to say that I thought it would happen a lot sooner than now, given all the things that you've done. I didn't think it would take seven years for the majority of Ontarians to realize that you're not interested in the day-to-day life of the ordinary Ontarian, the majority of people. You proclaim it, but it doesn't exist in what you've done in policies, it doesn't exist in what you've done with your tax structure and it certainly hasn't shown itself in what you've done to Hydro. You're going to have a really tough time spinning around this one, just like you're going to get an avalanche of forces coming at you if you try to do the same thing to our hospitals or our health care system. You're going to see continuing pressure on you as a result of what you've done to the education system.

I listened to the Minister of Education today and, truly, I wondered what planet is she talking about when she talks about the priority of the government being to worry about our kids in the education system. We've never had so many crises in our education system. The whole point, of course, was to bleed it dry, strangle it, so that people would say, "You know, the public system isn't working any more. Maybe we should consider the private system."

This isn't rocket science. We know what you're doing. The same thing with the health care system—underfund it to the point where there's absolute crisis and then you stand in your place, just like Ralph Klein did a couple of years ago when he brought in private hospitals in Alberta, and you say, "Well you know, the opposition may think it's OK to have lineups at the emergency ward, but we don't and we're going to do something about it." John Snobelen should have been turfed from cabinet for giving away cabinet secrets when he said, and I'm paraphrasing, "I'm going to create a crisis to justify what I'm going to do."

This time you picked the wrong issue and you got really greedy in terms of taking care of your pals. So you got into a crisis. You've capped things, but everybody understands they're going to have to pay for it in the long run.

I would say to anybody who is watching this debate that as they hear government members talk about the virtues of Bill 180 and how wonderful this bill is and that everyone can go to sleep at night now knowing that the Tory government at Queen's Park is going to take care of all their concerns, they should keep in mind what's happening with hydro as we speak and they should keep in mind that we're at a crossroads with our health care system and that injured workers are still not getting the representation they should get, they're not getting the benefits they should get and that all of these things that are there for the broader public good and not individual gain have to be fought for and defended by every generation. The generation that says, "It's all done, I don't need to worry about it," is the generation that's going to let it go. I can tell you right now, the generation that is currently becoming aware—the younger generation—of the issues, are the ones who are going to lead the charge quite frankly to change the politics of this province. This whole idea that the strongest, the fastest, the richest, the best looking are the ones who get everything, and if you're not in one of those categories or some other artificial category that separates us as human beings, then too bad, you're just left out—that whole attitude, the one you have exploited for seven years, is coming to an end.

Whoever the next government is is going to have to spend an awful lot of time putting things in full reverse to do real consumer protection, because if we want to protect the consumers in Ontario, the best thing to do is reverse almost everything you've done. That would be good consumer protection, assuming of course that the absolute best protection is to guarantee that those smiling, smirking faces over there are on this side of the House, or perhaps not in this House at all. We need a change. Bill 180 and nine-step programs for hydro are not what this province really needs. What this province needs is a change in government.

Mr Tascona: I'm very pleased to join the debate today. If the public doesn't know, it's Bill 180, the proposed Consumer Protection Statute Law Amendment Act, 2002. This proposed legislation would consolidate and modernize six existing consumer protection laws as well as three sector-specific laws. This would provide clear, consistent rights and obligations for consumers and businesses.

Changes to three sector-specific laws are the Motor Vehicle Dealers Act, the Real Estate and Business Brokers Act and the Travel Industry Act. It would modernize rules about the most significant purchases most consumers ever make: homes, vehicles and travel. It would strengthen the regulation of those professionals who practise in these big-ticket sectors.

I would like to spend some time discussing our proposed changes to the Motor Vehicle Dealers Act, also known as the MVDA. One of the three statutes will provide consumer protection through the regulation of professional sectors. Changes to the MVDA are proposed with the objective of developing a practical and enforceable legal framework that would, if passed, do two things: (1) protect consumers' interests and (2) provide a level playing field for businesses.

Automotive spending is one of the largest sectors of consumer spending and an important part of the Ontario economy. Changes are also being suggested in the proposed Consumer Protection Act, 2002, also contained in Bill 180, that relate to automobile repairs. Because most of us have taken our cars to the repair shop at some point in our lives, we know what people go through when they don't know what's under the hood. The vast majority of automotive repair businesses are honest and legitimate. Unfortunately, there are people out there who like to take advantage of people, sometimes charging for shoddy, unnecessary or even non-existent work.

The Ministry of Consumer and Business Services received over 2,000 written and verbal complaints about motor vehicle repairs in the year 2001. Victims of these unscrupulous operators can be out hundreds or even thousands of dollars. We've all heard the stories from our constituents: the one who took his car in for an oil change and the shop ended up putting a new engine in without the consumer's consent; the one who took their car in again and again and grew frustrated when nothing ever seemed to get fixed; the one who paid an exorbitant inflated price for the parts they put in their car.

Here's a true example from the ministry's case files. When a consumer took his car into a Toronto area repair shop, he was told by the operator that the car needed a new engine. He was quoted a price that seemed reasonable and was told he would get a one-year warranty upon completion of the work. The consumer was later told that he also needed a new fuel pump and that the radiator and starter needed to be repaired.

After the work was completed, the consumer did not receive a proper receipt or warranty, as promised. He was also not shown the old parts. When he took the car to another repair facility for an emission test, he was told that the engine had not even been replaced. The man contacted the ministry, and after the ministry investigators intervened, the repairer pled guilty. The consumer was given restitution and the repairer had to pay a $1,000 fine. Scam artists like this not only hurt consumers, they also harm the reputation of honest, legitimate businesses in the automotive sector.

Some of my constituents who have had a bad experience at an automotive repair shop are quick to say that repair shops are a rip-off. In fact, in the vast majority of cases the opposite is true. But such bad experiences make people hesitant or skeptical in the marketplace—the exact opposite of what we want. We want a safe, thriving marketplace where people feel secure spending their money and businesses are expanding and creating jobs.

I understand the Minister of Consumer and Business Services did an event this summer at a motor vehicle repair shop. He offered tips for consumers to help them avoid scam artists. One of the top tips was to always get a written estimate before any work begins.

Here's another case taken from the consumer files at the Ministry of Consumer and Business Services: A consumer was quoted a price for repairs verbally but when he went to pick up his car the cost was almost $600 more than the quote. With the help of the ministry, this consumer received restitution and the repair shop was fined $500. This case shows one of the most common problems: the lack of a written estimate.

In this case the consumer contacted the ministry to complain. But that doesn't always happen. Sometimes consumers don't know where to complain or feel embarrassed about being taken advantage of. Bill 180 would make it mandatory for automotive repair shops to give consumers written estimates before charging for work, whether consumers request them or not.

Through Bill 180, if the shop fails to provide an estimate they would not be able to charge for the repairs done unless the consumer authorized in advance a maximum amount they were willing to pay. This would help prevent deceptive business practices and scams that some unscrupulous repair shops engage in.

Bill 180 contains a 10% estimate rule that would mean a consumer should not be charged more than 10% above the amount estimated in the consumer agreement. This provision already exists for motor vehicle repairs. Bill 180 would expand it to all goods and services. By requiring an estimate for motor vehicle repairs, we are closing the loop so that repair shops must provide an estimate and must honour that estimate within 10%.

Here's a common scenario. A woman takes her car into the shop because it's making a terrible noise. The mechanic tells her she needs a new muffler and gives her a verbal estimate of $200. Because the consumer has no idea what it normally costs for a new muffler, she willingly agrees to the price and the mechanic completes the job. But when the consumer gets the final bill, the total is $450. The unscrupulous mechanic indicates that the extra $250 is for parts and extra labour because she wanted a rush job.

Under the existing law, the repair shop has to honour the estimate within 10%, but in this case the consumer only had a verbal estimate. Because there was nothing in writing, there is really no proof of a $200 estimate. Bill 180 would close that loop so that the consumer would automatically receive a written estimate.

This would help families trying to budget for vehicle repairs and other services such as home repairs and renovations. It would help with decisions about whether to buy a new vehicle or repair the old one. For example, if the repair shop estimates that it will cost about $1,000 to repair your car, you might consider that worth it. But if the bill comes back and it costs $6,000, you might have made a different decision. Under the proposed bill, however, the estimate would be binding to 10% above the estimate, meaning that the consumer would only be liable for $1,100.

This rule is also designed to be fair to businesses. If the mechanic begins working on your car and discovers a more costly problem he or she didn't know about before, that wouldn't be included in the 10% estimate rule. The mechanic would have to get the consumer's authorization and provide another estimate before starting the new work. This ensures that the consumer is informed of the work being done and the costs involved, helping to avoid nasty surprises when the bill arrives.

Again, consumers also have the option of authorizing, in advance and in writing, a maximum amount they are willing to pay. That is the only scenario where the estimate and the 10% rule would not come into play.

The 10% estimate rule is not only good for consumers, it's also good for business. The practice of lowballing quotes makes it very difficult for legitimate businesses to compete on price. The proposed new Consumer Protection Act, 2002, would also provide better protection to the many consumers who lease their vehicles by providing for more information on the final cost of leases. Leases used to be an almost exclusively business-to-business arrangement, but now many consumers lease these items, such as cars and computers. If passed, this bill will provide for regulation-making authority which could be used to ensure that the true cost of leases is disclosed to consumers.

Helping consumers make informed purchase decisions by proposing to provide for more disclosure during any transaction is an important point in Bill 180. Consumers should know what they're paying for. Many unscrupulous operators hide information in the fine print or use ambiguous language that is hard to interpret. The proposed Consumer Protection Act, 2002, would help combat this by requiring that information be disclosed clearly and prominently, not hidden in fine print. The proposed legislation would also specify that if the language in a contract provided by a business is ambiguous, it would be interpreted in the interests of the consumer.

The proposed Motor Vehicle Dealers Act, 2002, is one of the three pieces of sector legislation that is included in the bill. This act governs individuals and businesses who buy and sell vehicles for a living. The proposed Motor Vehicle Dealers Act, 2002, will provide new protections for consumers buying vehicles. For example, the bill includes a provision to combat curbsiding.

Curbsiders are unregistered car dealers. They are called curbsiders because they often sell vehicles right on the side of the road. When buying from a curbsider, most people think the seller is the owner of the vehicle and they are simply selling a car they don't want or need any more. It's a reasonable assumption, but in fact a curbsider is not the owner of the car. They are often selling cars that have been written off by insurance agencies or mistreated cars that a legitimate dealer would not sell.

Unlike registered car dealers, curbsiders don't pay into the motor vehicle dealers compensation fund, which compensates the consumer in certain circumstances, such as where a dealership goes bankrupt before delivery of the vehicle. Under the proposed act, it would be an offence for a motor vehicle dealer to supply vehicles to a curbsider, and anyone convicted of curbsiding would be subject to a minimum fine of $2,500.

The proposed Motor Vehicle Dealers Act, 2002, would enhance professionalism by allowing for codes of ethics. Discipline and appeal committees could be developed to deal with breaches in these codes. Registrants found to be in breach of their code of ethics could be fined up to $25,000.

Bill 180 would also give the ministry greater enforcement powers to shut down scam artists, such as increased maximum fines at least doubled to $50,000 for individuals and $250,000 for corporations. Possible jail sentences under the proposed MVDA, 2002, would be doubled. Maximum terms of imprisonment would be set at two years less a day, up from the one-year maximum in the current MVDA and several other pieces of current legislation. The limitation period for commencing a prosecution would be set at two years, up from the one year under the current MVDA. The court would be authorized to order that a convicted person make restitution, and the regulator would have the power to freeze assets and order a business to stop using false or misleading advertising.

The Motor Vehicle Dealers Act is administered by the Ontario Motor Vehicle Industry Council, also known as OMVIC, an administrative authority designated under the Safety and Consumer Statutes Administration Act. OMVIC performs functions delegated to it, including registering motor vehicle dealers and salespersons and investigating any consumer complaints. OMVIC's mandate is to maintain a fair, safe and informed marketplace in Ontario by protecting the rights of consumers, enhancing industry professionalism and ensuring fair, honest and open competition for registered motor vehicle dealers.

Throughout the development of the proposed new Motor Vehicles Dealers Act, 2002, OMVIC has offered ongoing recommendations and advice, which is very much appreciated by the government. This bill was developed in consultation with consumer groups and the motor vehicle repair sector.

In September and October 2000, the Ministry of Consumer and Business Services circulated a proposed paper on the reform of the Motor Vehicle Dealers Act. The proposed legislation was prepared following public consultation sessions in eight Ontario locations. Submissions from the public, practitioners in the new and used vehicle industry sectors, and a variety of other stakeholders, including the legal community, were reviewed to ensure the right balance was struck.

The proposed legislation was based on the important objectives of fairness and responsiveness to the needs of consumers and businesses, as well as flexibility to adapt to the future needs of the Ontario workplace.

Bill 180 would help prevent people from being taken advantage of by ensuring that consumers have enough information to make informed decisions, giving consumers greater ability to cancel contracts in certain situations and providing clearer laws so consumers and businesses know what their rights and obligations are.

In closing, this bill would update consumer legislation to provide a clear, efficient, flexible, up-to-date set of rules for consumers and businesses alike. As MPPs, we all want to help prevent our constituents from being taken advantage of. We want a safe, secure marketplace as well as a level playing field for businesses. This bill would help provide that.

I am pleased to support it, and I hope my colleagues on the other side of the House will also support it.

Mr Bruce Crozier (Essex): I'm not really pleased today to stand and speak to this time allocation bill, because this is becoming all too common in this Legislature. I see now that any of the time allocation motions that come before this Legislature have come with regularity, and not only that; they are worded such that there is no third reading debate. I have come to the conclusion that this must be the most undemocratic Legislature in the Dominion of Canada.

Having said that, I do want to make a few comments about Bill 180, the Consumer Protection Statute Law Amendment Act, and perhaps more explicitly what isn't included in this act. When it comes to consumer protection, there are a number of areas in which we need protection for consumers in this province. For example, in Prince Edward Island they have consumer protection on gasoline pricing—the small province of Prince Edward Island. Yet here in Ontario, almost since the day this government was elected back in 1995, they've spoken and done nothing about protecting consumers from gasoline gouging.

I suggest that as part of this bill it would have been very easy for the minister to have included the main parts of my private member's Bill 163. Just to remind you and my colleagues in the Legislature today and the folks at home, my Bill 163, introduced on June 26, was An Act to provide information to consumers respecting the price of gasoline and the ownership of gasoline retailers and to require certain additional information from major oil companies. When I mention major oil companies, I can remember when the former Premier, Mike Harris, said, "I'm going to bring those major oil companies to heel." Well, you know what he brought them to heel for: he needed their contributions to their fundraising. That's the only coming to heel there was. They've done nothing about protecting consumers against gasoline gouging in the province of Ontario. I challenge anybody over there during the course of this afternoon's debate to suggest to me one thing they've done to back up all the rhetoric from them about protecting consumers in that area.

This government kicked off one of its fights, as it put it, against high and volatile gasoline prices with the Ontario Gas Prices Review Task Force. What a tidy little title: gas prices review task force. The task force, as a matter of fact, came back with a number of recommendations for the provincial government to act upon for fairer gas prices and for consumers. I remind you that this was a task force of government members, highly publicized when it was first announced. It came back with recommendations, yet three years later, this government has refused to act upon those recommendations. By golly, if I were one of the backbenchers who worked on that task force, who made the recommendations to this government, I'd be some upset that they wouldn't consider the time and the effort and the money that went into that task force. Yet they've declined to act on any of the recommendations.

Even more to my sorrow is that those members on the task force don't even speak up. I don't know what the effort was all about if they weren't prepared to do anything. As I said, I took that government task force report and prepared Bill 163, the Gasoline Consumer Protection Act, and I urged the government to simply act on its own advice. As yet, the government has refused to do so.

Consumers across the province are paying exorbitant rates for gasoline on some given days. Other days the price is lower, but certainly not as low as it was a year ago. Last fall the average gasoline price was 66.9 cents. It went as low as 57 cents. One year later, prices have risen almost 10 per cent. Recently we've paid as high as 75 cents. Today, perhaps—I haven't been out on the highway since Sunday—I understand, yes, gasoline prices are down in the mid to high 60s. But even in a quick glance across the province you will find that gasoline prices are exorbitantly high. For example, in the north, and as you come along 401, when they feel they have you trapped and when they perhaps feel they have tourists trapped, they charge even higher prices.

I'll get to the recommendations that my Gasoline Consumer Protection Act has in it and that I urge the government—it's not even too late because we are going to have one day to deal with amendments—to amend the act and include your own recommendations in it. There were a number of recommendations in it, but I think the more important of those included this. It would force retailers to advertise a change in the price of gasoline at least 72 hours before the change takes place. What does this give us an opportunity to do to protect ourselves? Well, we can go and fill up with that 40 to 50 litres of gasoline that we need to get us through the next couple of days. It would give the consumer an opportunity to take advantage of gas prices as they are going to be proposed in the next few days. It would force retailers to indicate their affiliation with major gasoline retailers because, I think, all too often consumers in this province think they're dealing with an independent gasoline retailer. They may want to support an independent against these major oil companies, and yet we find out that the gas station is in fact either owned or controlled by and/or supplied by one of the major oil companies, of course.

An important part of this bill that I would urge the minister to include, if he were really interested in protecting consumers in this province, would be to force large oil companies to disclose their earning reports. They're private companies—many of them have public shares in the companies—but it would require that these major gasoline producers have their earnings published by the various ways that these profits were attained; for example, through the sale of gasoline. Many of the major oil companies, as we know today, have convenience stores with them, so it would also separate that part of their earnings. It would also indicate to the public how much of their profit came from the making of the gasoline. So it would be much more transparent and people would be able to understand where it is, in fact, that they were probably being gouged.

In summary, on the gasoline pricing side for consumer protection, it would go a long way toward protecting consumers from unjustifiably high prices. And I repeat: it would give consumers some confidence in this minister so that they would really feel that he was protecting them in the area of high gasoline prices.

In the minute or two I have left, there's a particular part of the bill that has been pointed out as being faulty. In an article, "Pointing Out 'Hudak's Folly,'" Bob Aaron of the Toronto Star has zeroed in a part of the real estate sales in this province in which the consumer has absolutely no protection. This law, if passed, and I have little doubt that it will be, will "leave buyers of more than $3.25-billion worth of new homes and condominiums unprotected from sales staff who, by law, are not required to be trained, licensed, insured or supervised."

We all know that real estate agents and real estate brokers have to be licensed, educated, bonded and/or they have to have errors and omissions insurance, all of this to protect the homebuyer. But what happens in the case of three and a quarter billion dollars' worth of new home sales in this province? There's absolutely no protection. Those selling these homes don't have to be educated about real estate; they don't have to carry insurance to protect the buyer if, for example, they are not totally honest with the buyers. We think, on this side, that's an area of sales in this province that should be protected. We have real estate brokers and agents who go out of their way to serve the public and, in their business, and to protect the public, and yet this minister will write a bill that will let real estate sales take place where there's absolutely no protection. I don't think that's fair, certainly to the consumer, and I think if this minister were serious, he'd propose some amendments that would protect against that.

Hon Mr Hudak: Oh, come on, Bruce.

Mr Crozier: If the minister isn't serious, because he says, "Oh, come on, Bruce"—if you don't want to protect them, we do. So I'll propose some amendments, and I certainly hope that the minister will look at those amendments with some serious thought.

Mr Rosario Marchese (Trinity-Spadina): I'm happy to have this opportunity to speak, even on strangulation motions, those motions that come forward to choke off debate. Even on those I'm happy to be here to debate.

I want to tell you, Tim, I've got some concerns around this bill, but not the same ones that others have talked about. Yes, people have talked about cable companies, hydro, gas, banking, real estate and on and on. I want to say to you: it's a good step, Tim. No complaints about that, really. We can always find other areas of omissions that should be included, for sure. Peter Kormos spoke to those and the previous speaker spoke to some of those, and others, for sure.

I've got one little complaint that I want to speak to you about. That little complaint is that you've got to deal with that typeface. You know that small print stuff? Two years ago I started wearing glasses, and then I realized how age is just passing me by. I'm getting older. I've got to tell you, Tim, I don't like it. When you start wearing glasses, you realize in what bad shape you are or could be, and when you've got to read the small print that even with glasses you can't see, you're in real trouble. I've got to tell you, when those contracts come to the door—whatever it is, whether it's for some loan from some bank or some insurance or some deal when you're buying a car or some real estate when you're buying a house—do you notice how small the print is in some of those contracts? Tim, do you notice how small that print is?

Hon Mr Hudak: Yes.

Mr Marchese: It's really small. You've got to deal with that. Don't you hate it? I really hate it; I really do. When I see those contracts and that small print is really this tiny, I get nervous and I get upset. Don't you get upset? I'm sure you do, Tim. A lot of consumers out there, when they get that stuff, what do they do? They probably throw it away. If they don't throw it away, they probably put it in some drawer. Why? Because you could never read those contracts. So unbeknownst to most consumers, there is a heck of a lot of substance in that little print that nobody ever gets to read—no one. I'm convinced, Tim—I'm not alone—a whole lot of consumers and citizens and taxpayers watching this program today probably say, "Yeah, right on." We've got to deal with the type. It's got be bigger so that those of us who are having a hell of a time reading it can read it, or at least begin to read it or at least not be discouraged from reading it because the type is too small. Do you agree?

Hon Mr Hudak: It's in the bill.

Mr Marchese: It's in the bill? You deal with the font, the small print? Come on. Make the reference, help me out. This is a big bill, right? I'm sure you've had a chance to read it. I know that some of your colleagues have the time to read it. I know how much your colleagues read.

Mr Maves: Talk about hydro or something.

Mr Marchese: I will, I'll get to hydro, if I can, because I've got so much else to say that is really critical. But, Minister, if you tell me the page that relates to the issue of small print, let me know before my time is up. I've got 20 more minutes. OK?

Hon Mr Hudak: Yes.

Mr Marchese: Thanks a lot. But here's my real beef.

Mr Maves: You've got a lot of beefs.

Mr Marchese: I do have a lot of beefs, it's true. But one of the most important concerns that I have and consumers have is that you are shifting the responsibility of a remedy when you have been either abused or mistreated or fooled or deceived or tricked. You're on your own. You are leaving the burden of their own protection on their backs, on their limited abilities to understand the scam; second, once you've understood it, having the capability and the resources to follow through. So citizens, consumers, are effectively on their own.

What the minister urges, in effect, is that they educate themselves about their rights and to take up their own causes in the all too frequent cases where they have been taken advantage of. You are asked, citizens who are watching this program, to educate yourselves in order to protect yourselves. How is it that even those who have a good education, have degrees, are professionals, get scammed as well as those who have little education, little by way of being able to read through these thousands and thousands of pages that you get at the door, or even a couple of pages that you get at the door? How would you ever be able to sort out what's good and bad, what's right and wrong, what's deceit and not deceit, whether you're being taken advantage of or not? How are you ever to know? But that's what the minister is asking you to do. He's saying to you, "Educate yourselves, because that's your best protection."

OK. I don't disagree with the minister. The fact of the matter is, for a variety of reasons, whether you have little education, whether you don't have the time to sort through things as often as you should—and yes, maybe you should spend the time. But for whatever reason, whether it's education or lack of time or whatever other problem prevents so many of us from reading through that fine detail, we're on our own. As we are in so many other issues that we face, often we are on our own.

My point to Tim Hudak, the Minister of Consumer and Business Services, a ministry that I suspect thousands and thousands of people in this province have no clue about—dare I say, I suspect millions of people don't even know this ministry exists. They don't have a clue on how to even reach them, to be able to say, "Minister, what we need is a consumer watchdog to help us out." This minister—not him alone, but any minister really; I shouldn't have said "this minister." What the minister should be doing is helping with the educational process about how you could be undone, what the possible scams are in any field, what you can do to protect yourselves. Here are the remedies, and here is my ministry doing that because we care and we want to protect you.

They do no education. And it isn't just this ministry; it's most ministries, to be fair. When you're dealing with consumer issues, where scamming is getting bigger and bigger and wider and wider, the ministry, this one, called the Ministry of Consumer and Business Services, ought to be spending a couple of bucks, at least a couple of bucks, to say to the public, "Here's where we are. This is what we do. By the way, this is what this new bill does. Here are your protections, and here are some examples of how you can be scammed. And if you are being scammed, we are here to help you."

They don't do it. They'll never do it because that's not what it's about. What it's about is releasing a bill that's called An Act to enact, amend or revise various Acts related to consumer protection, basically saying to you, "We're about to protect you," and off you go. Nobody has a clue what they're doing or what they've done except for two pages they sent out to the various media across Ontario. That's the extent of consumer protection. The majority of people don't have a clue what you're doing.

The only remedy that they have is what they can do on their own to protect themselves, and after that they're on their own. We need, Minister Hudak, a consumer watchdog, someone whose job it is to keep an eye on the scams and the scammers so that when consumers are undone, deceived, scammed, they have someone who would be there to defend and protect them and help them to achieve the remedy that they so desperately, in so many cases, need. That's really the focus of what I want to speak about today.

I want to mention another group that deserves mentioning. It is in line with what I'm saying about how consumers need desperately to have someone who defends them because this bill helps in part and does not help in so many other areas which are not covered. To help the consumers in those areas where this bill does help and to help the consumers where this bill does not speak to, if you had a consumer watchdog, that person would be able to genuinely help consumers when they're being scammed.

For the investment that it would take, I think the minister would be well advised to look at it. I'm not sure what the cost would be, but the savings for the consumers would be great. The headaches, the emotional wear and tear that anyone and everyone who has experienced this, and has gone through the process of trying to defend themselves against a deceitful proposal that has been made to them—they know what it takes to defend one's self, and it isn't easy. In most cases you lose because you're up against people who have money. Most scammers have money—many of them, big corporations; some of them, small-time operators, no doubt. But big scammers often are big corporations with money to defend themselves, and if you are on your own with little time and little money, you ain't gonna make it and the corporate scammers will get away.

I want to speak in defence of a group that's been doing some work for the last 10 years to defend consumers in a society where we have very few watchdogs. This group is called Democracy Watch. I've dealt with them. Many years ago they were part of my Fort York small business working group. This group has been doing tremendous work with so few resources, all because of the work of a couple of individuals who are so dearly committed to the protection of consumers.

"What is a citizen utility board? A citizen utility board (CUB) is an independent, non-profit organization of residential utility ratepayers. CUBs exist in four states in the US, and the first CUB was organized in Wisconsin in 1979. CUBs advocate for fair telephone ... electric, gas and water rates, and sensible energy policies before" regulators, "the government and the courts."

Wouldn't it have been nice, while this government deregulated our hydro rates, to have had a citizen utility board that would have been there to defend the interests of all those individuals who were being scammed by the multiple retailers that were out there selling you their hydro?

So many of you have been scammed. We know, and we have told you, because we have read many of your letters. If we had a citizen utility board, they would have been out there defending your interests against the scammers, against this government that had no regard, that took no measures to anticipate the scams that would be out there, that let the retailers loose on you unsuspecting clients, this government that expects you to educate yourselves while they free themselves of the burden of oversight because it's up to you to protect yourselves, not up to the government. If only we'd had a citizen utility board that would have been there to protect you against the scams of this government and those retailers.

"Individual CUBs can be set up for each utility or one CUB can be set up to advocate for some or all utility ratepayers together." The CUB model can also be used in other industry sectors to set up consumer advocacy groups. Some people have asked, "What is the difference between CUBs and other ratepayer groups?" Here's the answer: "The key to CUBs is the right, by law, to enclose a flyer in utility companies' billing envelopes. This flyer informs consumers about the CUB and invites them to join for a nominal annual membership" of 10 to 15 bucks.

The member from Niagara Falls is perplexed by the suggestion. If he's not perplexed, he certainly was in severe consternation. He always enjoys my speeches—I have no doubt of that.

They would be invited to join these citizen utility boards for a nominal fee of 10 to 15 bucks, not a lot, not much to have your interests protected from the scammers. "Piggybacking" the CUB flyer with the utility bills is an ... effective way to reach ratepayers" at little or no cost to governments or utilities. It would be no cost to you, to governments. It would be no cost to utilities. It would be a voluntary cost of 10 to 15 bucks to join. It's not a lot for the benefit of having an organization such as the citizen utility board defend your interest.

Mr Maves: Ten to 15 bucks a month?

Mr Marchese: It's an annual membership fee of $10 to $15 a year.

Mr Maves: I thought you said a month.

Mr Marchese: Ah, you were concerned about a monthly fee. Very good. It's not much. You don't think that's a lot, do you?

Mr Bill Murdoch (Bruce-Grey-Owen Sound): Get to your point. We're running out of time.

Mr Marchese: Hold on, Bill. I've got seven more minutes; I've got a lot to say. Please.

"What does the CUB do?" some people ask. Every year, the utility companies spend millions to advocate for higher utility rates, don't they, Bill? They do; they want to squeeze you a little every year. Ironically, the cost of the utilities' advocacy is passed on to consumers through their utility bills. Don't they do that, Bill? They squeeze us day in and day out.

The citizen utility boards give ratepayers a way to fight back. By pooling their resources, CUB members hire their own professional staff of lawyers, lobbyists and organizers to challenge unfair rate hikes. Doesn't that strike you as a good idea, as a cheap way to have a board defend your consumer interest? It would be something the Tories would love—a citizen utility board that would protect the interests of the taxpayers. It's something that I think you would want to gobble up immediately and say, "Here's an idea. We're going to take it on."

But I don't see Tim Hudak, the Minister of Consumer and Business Services, taking this idea too readily. Maybe other members might; I'm not sure. Who controls—

Mr Maves: Shouldn't the elected councillors look after that?

Mr Marchese: No, not city councillors. This is a provincial responsibility, something that falls on our provincial shoulders. I'm telling you, member from Niagara Falls, it isn't something that would cost you a penny. It wouldn't cost anyone a cent, except those people who want to voluntarily join for 10 or 15 bucks a year to protect their interests. You'd like that; I'd like that. Ten or 15 bucks.

Who controls the citizen utility boards? Ratepayers who join a CUB control the group through the election of regional delegates and its board of directors. The board hires the CUB's professional staff and determines the group's policies. CUBs are democratic organizations.

How are CUBs funded? Again, for those who missed it the first time, CUBs are funded by voluntary contributions from the ratepayers. CUBS, the citizen utility boards, do not receive any ongoing funding from government or utilities—again, no cost.

Mr John Gerretsen (Kingston and the Islands): Who's going to voluntarily give money to them?

Mr Marchese: Mr Gerretsen asks who's going to voluntarily give money to them. You may have missed the first part: they have it in four states in the US and they voluntarily give money so that they can protect themselves. The problem is, unless you as a former lawyer—if you ever get on the other side, as a lawmaker then, you'd be able, by law or through some other measure, to force the utilities to send out these forms in the utility bills, and you as an individual decide on your own whether you like the idea or not.

Who's going to join? The ones who need protection from the ones who scam you. You know, you've been arguing about the same thing you and I have been talking about. Aren't you concerned about scams? Who's going to protect you? You, the government, are going to do this on your own?

I don't think that on their own the Liberals would find a mechanism to enforce this. I'm saying to the Liberals as well, we need a consumer watchdog, we need a citizen utility board of this kind that can easily flow into this kind of bill to protect you and me—to protect the consumers, to protect the taxpayers, to protect those who don't like themselves to be seen as taxpayers, to protect you as a citizen, which is the way I love to see people—more as citizens than as taxpayers.

How are CUBs created? CUBs can be created by an act of the Legislature, Mr Gerretsen, or by an order of a utility regulatory commission. It's not hard to do. Some action by the government is usually needed to allow the CUBs access to the utility's billing envelopes and to provide funding—a grant or a loan—to print the first flyer. That's all you've got to do. It's not much; it's not expensive.

You would think that these 10 Conservative members on the other side would be paying attention to the suggestion, but they're so busy there. They're reflecting on so many other problems they've got, they can't even think about taking a suggestion that would even help them. It would be good for them, because their taxpayers would love it. If Ted is next on the list, if he's got his prepared speech, he can re-route his comments a little bit and speak to the citizen utility boards. Ted, if you're up, please, throw away that speech and say what you want to say. Just throw away the speeches; I'm sick of them.

Mr Ted Arnott (Waterloo-Wellington): I appreciate your advice.

Mr Marchese: I give you advice as often as I can.

Where have CUBs been established, Mr Gerretsen, is a question you might—

Mr Gerretsen: I can't answer that.

Mr Marchese: I'm going to answer for you. There are now CUBs in full operation in Wisconsin, Illinois, Oregon, and a local CUB called UCAN in San Diego. The Wisconsin and Illinois CUBs were established by the state Legislatures in 1979 and 1983, respectively. State Legislatures—you can do it too. The Oregon CUB was approved in a binding referendum in November 1984. San Diego's UCAN was set up by the order of the state public utilities commission in 1983.

What is the track record, you might ask, of CUBs? CUBs have been very successful. Their membership and savings to consumers are as follows: Wisconsin: 60,000 members and savings of over 100 million bucks. Not bad. Illinois CUB: 170,000 members and over $4 billion in savings. Tim, think about it. Oregon CUB: 10,000 members and $124 million in savings. Tim, are you listening?

Hon Mr Hudak: I heard that.

Mr Marchese: UCAN: 24,000 members and $265 million in savings. Mr Gerretsen, are you listening? Do you see all the savings we can have by merely instituting citizens' utility boards? Consumer watchdogs is what they are. They're designed and they're there to protect the interests of the consumers.

I congratulate Democracy Watch for all the work they're doing with such a small staff. They've been doing so much on their own.

I plead with you citizens who are watching: this is one area where you can press this government and say, "We need real consumer protection. We need a consumer watchdog. We need a citizens' utility board type of watchdog that will protect our interests," because I've got to tell you that Tim Hudak and his government are not going to protect you; you are on your own.

Hon Mr Hudak: On a point of order, Mr Speaker: The member just asked for me to get back to him on his speech with respect to the fine print. I would refer him to part II—

The Acting Speaker: That is not a point of order. Further debate?

Mrs Julia Munro (York North): It's my pleasure to speak in support of Bill 180, the proposed Consumer Protection Statute Law Amendment Act, 2002.

We've heard in the House over the past few weeks about how important this bill is in order to update the province's consumer protection laws to ensure continued consumer and business confidence in Ontario.

One of the things we have talked about is how important it is to give consumers the tools they need to protect themselves against scams. Scams can cost consumers hundreds or even thousands of dollars, and I understand the Ministry of Consumer and Business Services gets over 40,000 complaints a year.

I know the minister has said many times that it's important for people to read the fine print. Some unethical business people hide important details of their transactions in the fine print and these details, such as a processing fee or a delivery charge, can be very costly for the consumer.

Other scam artists simply don't provide information. For example, a consumer who orders a product over the Internet but never receives it may discover that the Web site does not provide a business address, and the consumer never receives a contract or a receipt of the transaction, so the consumer has no idea how to reach the company. Also, they have no written proof that they've paid for the purchase.

Sometimes a lack of information isn't meant to deceive or defraud a consumer, but it can cause problems. For example, a consumer might assume a price is listed in Canadian dollars, only to get a shock when the bill arrives and learn that it was in American currency. The bottom line is that we want to ensure that consumers have clear, complete information so that they know what they are getting into and make informed decisions. This will result in greater consumer confidence, which is good for business.

Bill 180 would require that information be disclosed clearly and prominently, not hidden in fine print. I'd like to take a couple of minutes today to talk about these new disclosure requirements, particularly as they pertain to Internet purchases, and also in other types of contracts. With the Internet disclosure requirements, the province has worked together with the federal Competition Bureau, Industry Canada, as well as the government of Alberta, the government of Quebec and 13 major national business and consumer groups.

The Ministry of Consumer and Business Services formed a working group on electronic commerce and consumers. The group developed a national framework on consumer protection for electronic commerce. The principles are intended to guide the actions of businesses, consumers and governments in developing consumer protection for electronic commerce over open networks, including the Internet.

All of these principles are embraced by the government of Ontario, and those that are most appropriately dealt with in provincial law have been incorporated into the proposed Consumer Protection Statute Law Amendment Act, 2002. They include provisions that would permit a consumer who buys on-line to cancel a contract within seven days if that person has not received the full disclosure the business is required to make to the consumer. The federal-provincial-territorial agreement on Internet sales sets out what must be disclosed with respect to Internet sales. The details of the required disclosure would be set out in the regulations under the proposed Consumer Protection Statute Law Amendment Act, 2002.

Let me tell you about it. Disclosure, under this agreement, means the supplier is required to give the consumer some very specific information before a consumer enters into an Internet sales contract. This information would require the supplier's name to be included and, if it were different, the name under which the supplier carries on business would be included. It would also require the supplier to provide a business address, telephone number and e-mail address. A full disclosure would require the supplier to provide a fair and accurate description of the goods or services being sold. The bottom line is that it requires the supplier to provide appropriate financial information, including an itemized price list of the goods or services being sold to the consumer; a description of any additional charges that could apply to the contract; the total amount of the contract or the amount of any periodic payments; and the currency in which amounts are payable. This last point must seem self-evident, but it is astounding how many people have reported buying goods they thought were sold in Canadian dollars, then getting a shock when they found that their credit card had been debited the equivalent in US funds. The proposed Consumer Protection Statute Law Amendment Act, 2002, represents Ontario's first steps in implementing the national harmonization agreement just described.

In August of this year the Ministry of Consumer and Business Services announced the result of a surf-and-sweep operation. Staff at the ministry searched the Internet, looking for any Web sites they believed to be misleading, deceptive or fraudulent. The results were very interesting. As in other areas, there are not a lot of Internet scam artists operating in Canada—current estimates say about 3% of the world total—but those that do exist are known to go for rapidly expanding pieces of the consumer pie.

Ministry investigators located 18 Canadian sites they thought looked as though they may contain information that was misleading or deceptive. They found that nine of the sites were based in other parts of Canada and the US. These files were forwarded to the appropriate agencies for investigation. Of the remaining nine, six files were found worthy of further investigation by the ministry. At the end of this three-day, surf-and-sweep blitz, three businesses agreed to pay restitution to consumers, and in one case the ministry laid charges under the Business Practices Act.

We know that many of the consumer scams operating on-line have to do with financial industries. The Internet sweep shows that one of the most common on-line scams is related to credit repair, particularly businesses that claim they can fix a bad credit rating for an upfront fee. Others include advance fee loan scams in which the consumer pays an upfront fee in order to get a loan which never materializes. It is illegal to charge a fee in advance of providing a loan.

This gives a sense of the kind of information that is being provided through those kinds of legislative initiatives in Bill 180.

I would just like to take a moment to respond to some of the concerns that have been raised with regard to the issue around new homes. Here I think it's important to recognize that the proposed Real Estate and Business Brokers Act, 2002, does not cover the sale of new homes by developers. That's because it is not intended to address developers selling new homes, which account for less than 1% of the complaints received by the ministry.

Issues related to new home sales are addressed by the Ontario New Home Warranty Program. The ministry has been actively working with the Ontario New Home Warranty Program and its stakeholders to ensure that the program and the legislation it administers provide the necessary protections to new homebuyers in today's evolving marketplace. The Ontario New Home Warranties Plan has broad criteria for registration to ensure the builder acts with honesty and integrity. I think it's important to make sure there is not continuing confusion over that issue.

Finally, I'd like to speak for a brief moment on the area of enforcement of this act. To date, enforcement powers vary among the six core consumer statutes being consolidated under this proposed Consumer Protection Statute Law Amendment Act, 2002. The government is proposing that enforcement powers in six existing core consumer protection statutes be consistent. The consolidated list of enforcement powers under the bill includes investigation, including the power to make application for search warrants, compliance orders and orders to freeze assets and cease false advertising.

Another key area of consistency in the bill is the creation of a single limitation period where charges can be laid. For example, under the current Motor Vehicle Repair Act, a prosecution cannot be commenced more than six months after the date on which the alleged offence was committed. Under the current Business Practices Act, the limitation is no more than two years. Under this proposed bill, the limitation period would be standardized at two years from the time the ministry becomes aware of a specific matter.

I think you can see from this that the proposed legislation would also provide the courts with the ability to require offenders to give consumers restitution.

With the new disclosure rules proposed, consumers will be better equipped to enter contracts, whether on the Internet or in traditional modes of commerce, with their eyes wide open.

If Bill 180 is passed, both businesses and consumers will have a clear sense of their rights and obligations, leading to fewer scams and fewer misunderstandings. I am pleased—

The Acting Speaker: Thank you. Further debate?

Mr Joseph Cordiano (York South-Weston): I am actually very disappointed that this amendment act, the Consumer Protection—

Mr Murdoch: You are not.

Mr Cordiano: I am disappointed. I am very disappointed because, frankly, I thought the minister was going to include the bill I brought forward protecting consumers with respect to credit reporting agencies. That bill was passed in private members' hour by this assembly, unanimously, I might add, and supported by all three parties. I introduced my bill over a year ago and I thought perhaps there might have been an opportunity for the minister to include some protection for consumers when it comes to information that is terribly critical to them, and that is their creditworthiness.

With regard to that, the bill I proposed sought to ensure that there was greater accountability with respect to credit reporting agencies to disclose information promptly and to rectify any errors that were made in a consumer's report regarding their credit. It would have given better protection to consumers, providing greater access to information that was used in the determination of their credit scores. Furthermore, it would have educated consumers by ensuring that credit reporting agencies made available to consumers access to their own agents by a 1-800 number so that they could be better informed about how credit scores are arrived at.

Finally, it would also ensure that consumers were not penalized, that the credit score was not downgraded each and every time a consumer shopped around for better credit status or better rates with respect to a mortgage or in the application of a credit card. Obviously, today people shop around, so this is very, very important. Creditworthiness is not something we should take for granted, particularly those who are starting off: younger people, students getting a student loan, for example. They may have had one during their time at college or university. Then they go out and work for a living and apply for a mortgage. It might be the first mortgage; it might be the first loan to buy a car etc. Credit history is absolutely critical to their success or failure in life, I would argue.

Let's talk about entrepreneurs, for example, someone starting off a new business. Creditworthiness is something you cannot take lightly. It needs to be at the highest level to ensure that you have access to credit and loans you need when you're starting a business. Tenants, for example, absolutely have to have a good credit rating when they're applying for a good place to live, a rental unit. A landlord will check the credit rating, the creditworthiness of the applicant. If there's an error in one of these reports—as I pointed out many times in this assembly when I introduced this bill, these errors occur all too frequently. Therefore it is absolutely critical that these credit reporting agencies keep their records up to date.

This isn't happening, as I've pointed out. In 2001, the registrar for credit reporting agencies recorded a total of 2,174 complaints regarding credit reporting agencies, a huge number of complaints by consumers regarding their own credit histories. The registrar saw fit to investigate only one of these complaints—2,174 complaints, and yet there was only one audit conducted, and that was for the past three years.

I am disappointed with this bill because it doesn't go far enough in dealing with what I think is absolutely critical for consumers these days, and that is maintaining a good credit rating. Our society has become largely dependent on credit. Our very economic lives depend on it. The economy is not going to function without credit being extended. We have become credit-driven in terms of our economy and its viability. Sadly to say, people use credit probably far too often, more often than they should. We are indebted, as a society, to a far greater extent than perhaps our parents and our grandparents. Certainly that is the case today.

But that being the case, the reality is that we need to ensure that invaluable information, or information that is critical, is being kept up to date so that when a credit check is done, people aren't penalized because of inaccurate information. That is absolutely important to people, as I pointed out repeatedly. The stories are numerous in terms of the number of mistakes that are made, the errors, the omissions. I believe that this is an area that the government must look at, and I would hope that the minister is listening with respect to this area and would take this into account.

Perhaps there could be changes made to my bill that I haven't considered. Let's talk about it. I understood that the bill would be going to committee. I look forward to the opportunity to go through the bill thoroughly with members on the governing side. The minister perhaps could send his parliamentary assistant. We could examine that.

I honestly believe that this is an area that the government has overlooked. It's a great big oversight. I'm willing to say that perhaps there's still an opportunity here. Let's look at it in committee and let's examine it fully and thoroughly, because as I say, the economy depends on credit. It drives consumer spending in our economy; it's largely dependent on consumers. In fact, the economy is being sustained by consumers going out and making purchases. A lot of stock has been put into whether consumers are going to be spending this holiday season or not and whether our economy stays afloat as a result of it. Business isn't spending. The capital expenditures that were taking place years ago when the Internet was all the rage and the stock market was going up—well, that isn't happening any more. It's consumers who are keeping the economy going.

So we have to be absolutely concerned about what happens with credit, because consumers largely depend on credit. Most people have a credit card. They use credit cards like you use ID. In fact, very little can be done without a credit card these days. I should put it another way. You need a credit card to do a lot of things these days: make a hotel reservation, buy something over the Internet, make a purchase on the phone. You're always using a credit card. So it's indispensable for consumers.

I can't stress strongly enough how I believe this bill is inadequate because it does not address one of the most important areas, and that is keeping vital information on creditworthiness with respect to consumers up to date and putting the onus back on credit reporting agencies, where the onus should be. It's not currently there.

I'd like to make a couple of other comments with respect to what this bill fails to do. My colleague talked about gas prices earlier, the review task force. Members of the government were on that task force. They made recommendations. The government completely ignored those recommendations. It hasn't done anything about gas prices. There, I would argue, is another critical and vital commodity that people many, many times would depend on. It's not something that we can take for granted. Gasoline prices are an integral part of our economy. In fact, the Bank of Canada governor, David Dodge, the other day was talking about how the price of gasoline has increased the rate of inflation in the country and is bumping it up to the bank's highest point, where it is now concerned about inflation as a result. So the price of gasoline is driving inflation higher in our economy. That is a concern, and there is no protection for consumers.

I honestly think—and it was pointed out that PEI has done something about this—we should be looking at that more seriously. I think that this government is not doing enough with respect to that area. We've raised this matter on a number of occasions.

I think what we have seen in the last number of years under this government's administration is that, more and more, the citizens of this province are being viewed as consumers. We're no longer citizens. No longer do we have an interest in what happens in the broader public sector or the broader public interest. We've now become consumers for almost every service the government is providing.

Just look at what happened with the 407. It is now a privatized highway. There's no protection for consumers when it comes to increases in toll rates on the 407. My God, we've had three toll increases since the 407 was sold to private sector interests. It is just unbelievable how much tolls have gone up on the 407. People in the 905 region depend on the 407 to get around. It's vital transportation. There's no rapid transit system to speak of. People depend on the 407 for transportation around the 905 region. So it's vital.

When it comes to a number of other services, this government is now moving to privatize everything. We're getting private hospitals on the horizon. That's the new initiative by this government. Private school funding—

Interjection.

Mr Cordiano: Well, more and more, we're turning people into consumers of government services, so we need better protection for them.

Anyway, I will turn the remaining time over to my colleague.

Mr Gerretsen: I'm very pleased to join this debate. Let me say at the outset that the likelihood of my colleague Mr Cordiano's very excellent bill in which he basically wants to deal with credit companies and the information they have on file with respect to people and how to rectify errors in that—they are very, very unlikely to be dealt with in this bill. Because of course what I think he should know—and I know he knows—but what the people out there should know is that this is once again another time-allocated bill. This is once again another situation where the government is imposing closure on the debate in this House.

As I've mentioned before in this House, it gets even worse than that, because the time allocation motion or the closure motion says that the committee it's referred to will only meet for one day, which presumably means about a two- or three-hour period, during which time all of the various amendments that may be introduced to the bill are to be dealt with, so it leaves very little time for debate or anything else.

Then it gets even worse than that. When it comes back here on third reading, you would normally expect some level of debate on the final version of the bill with all the various amendments. But do you know what the time allocation motion says? It says that when the order for third reading is called, in other words, when the third reading of the bill is called in this House, "the Speaker shall put every question necessary to dispose of the ... stage of the bill without further debate or amendment."

So this is really the last time that we in this House can debate this bill at all, without our ever seeing any of the amendments—and I can guarantee you that this bill is going to be amended. It's a bill that's 162 pages long. We know the government's record in this area. Whenever any kind of omnibus bill, which is what this is, is put before us, there are always all sorts of amendments that the government itself brings forward. It finds errors in the bill about one thing or another or things that they haven't thought about.

So we know, first of all, why it's going to committee: to basically correct the government's own errors in the bill. We also know why they only allow about two hours of discussion there for the amendments to be moved and why they don't want any debate on third reading: because this government no longer believes in what I regard as the democratic process, and that is for a bill to be discussed as fully and completely as possible.

We've had nine bills that have come to some sort of resolution in this House since we came back in mid-September. Out of those nine bills, six have been time-allocated; in six cases, closure on those bills has been invoked.

We know the record of this government in that regard. I won't bother you with going back to the record of what it was like to work in a democratic parliamentary system back in the 1970s and 1980s when it was almost unheard of to have closure invoked in this House, and how often it has been invoked by the Harris government, going back to 1995, other than to say that closure/time allocation has been the norm in this House. I think it's a shame. I don't think that's the way we should be operating.

I would once again strongly suggest to the House leaders of all parties, including my own party, to get together so that we can come up with a systematic way for, let's say, a two-week running period of time, over what bills will be discussed during that period of time and at what length. Some bills on which there is agreement can be discussed for a very short period of time. Perhaps some other bills, such as a bill that deals with some major revisions, like this one, should be discussed for a much longer period of time.

Closure is not the way a democratically elected Parliament should operate. At one time, it was something that the media used to comment on, that was highly denounced in the press, but now nobody seems to care any more. It's a real tragedy that that's happened.

Let me talk to you about some of the good things in the bill. There are some good things in the bill; no question about it. I like the notion that, for example, when somebody gets involved in buying a time-share there is a 10-day cooling-off period. People always say, "You people in the opposition always talk about the negative aspects." I would say, "OK, that's a good idea. We've all heard about time-share sales where this wasn't the case, and I think that's a good deal. Or where there are direct agreements, or credit repairs, or loan brokering—that there are 10 days for fitness services as well. There's a cooling-off period of time. I think that's a good, good bill.

I also like the part of the bill that deals with motor vehicles; that repairs are deemed to warrant parts and labour for a minimum of 90 days or 5,000 kilometres, whichever comes first, when a vehicle is repaired. That's a good, positive move. But, Minister, you could have made it so much better. Why didn't you deal with your own gas-busters' recommendations that have been out there for the last three, four, five years? Your own gas-busters came up with a report. It needed some bit of legislation to deal with the gasoline prices in this province, and you ignored this totally. This would have been the perfect opportunity to do something about it.

I don't know whether or not the fact that my colleague Bruce Crozier has a private member's bill in this area, Bill 163, is the reason why you didn't include it in here, because you don't want anybody else to take any credit at all for that idea. I have no idea. But this would have been the perfect opportunity to do something about it.

Also, you could have done something with the Union Gas situation. We all know the Union Gas situation in which, in effect, Union Gas applied for the ability to charge customers an extra $120 on top of their normal bills for a retroactive rate increase. To my way of thinking, that's unacceptable. It's something you could have done something about in this particular bill, but you chose not to do that.

I don't want to be totally negative, because there are some good things in this bill, but there's another issue dealing with the sale of new homes, as to whether it should be dealt with by licensed real estate brokers or whether salespeople who are not licensed real estate brokers could be dealing with that.

I thought there was a very good article this morning in the Toronto Star by Bob Aaron—"Pointing Out 'Hudak's Folly,'" as a matter of fact. It asked why the Real Estate and Business Brokers Act wasn't amended to deal with situations outlawing salespeople who are not licensed brokers to deal with the sale of new homes. According to the article, he states that "homes worth $3.3 billion out of a total $16-billion market are sold without the involvement of real estate professionals." That's a rather startling statistic. I'm not for a moment suggesting that all the individual salespeople out there are out to get the public as such—I'm not suggesting that at all—but I think that when you're dealing with a substantial value of real estate, it's very important for the consumer's own protection that a registered real estate salesperson or broker is involved in that transaction. This would have been the perfect opportunity to do something about that.

There are also some suggestions with respect to the travel industry that I'm just trying to look for here and can't find right now.

There's another good point in the bill where they talk about how goods and services must be delivered or commenced within 30 days or the consumer may cancel the contract. I think that's a good idea, because we've all heard of situations where people pay for items and goods and they're not delivered within the right period of time.

Having said that, let me just get back to the original motion that we're actually dealing with, and that is that we're dealing here with time allocation, with closure. The governing party, because of the majority of members it has here, is in effect saying, "We no longer want to debate this bill. We're cutting it off for debate and the heck with the opposition." You and I know, Speaker, that is against all the parliamentary traditions, practices and procedures that are out there. At one time, I believe there was even a federal government back in the 1950s that basically lost an election because it had invoked closure in a famous pipeline debate. It was something that the general public got extremely excited about or extremely disturbed about because they did not feel that the democratic will of the parliamentary system should be overridden by closure.

Nowadays it's done on a standard basis, just about on a daily basis in here. This is something very regrettable. I would hope that if the media take no interest in it, at least the people of Ontario will take an interest in it and will put a stop to a government that in effect wants to impose its will continually on the will of the people, which is expressed here by the 103 representatives that we have from the various ridings. I'm not saying for a moment that the government shouldn't say, at some point in time, "We've had enough," but surely to goodness it should not be on every single bill. That's what seems to be happening, and that eventually, in my opinion, will be the downfall of a democracy. So I say to the government, try to work something out with the opposition House leaders so that this kind of a situation that we have here today will not repeat itself in the future.

The Acting Speaker: This completes the time for debate.

Mr Hudak has moved government notice of motion 63. Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion carry?

All those in favour will say "aye."

All those opposed will say "nay."

In my opinion, the ayes have it.

Call in the members. This will be a 10-minute bell.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

KEEPING THE PROMISE FOR A STRONG ECONOMY ACT (BUDGET MEASURES), 2002

LOI DE 2002 SUR LE RESPECT DE L'ENGAGEMENT D'ASSURER UNE ÉCONOMIE SAINTE (MESURES BUDGÉTAIRES)

Resuming the debate adjourned on November 18, 2002, on the motion for second reading of Bill 198, An Act to implement Budget measures and other initiatives of the Government / Projet de loi 198, Loi mettant en oeuvre certaines mesures budgétaires et d'autres initiatives du gouvernement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr Michael A. Brown): Further debate?

Mr Marcel Beaubien (Lambton-Kent-Middlesex): I'm pleased to have the opportunity to debate Bill 198, An Act to implement Budget measures and other initiatives of the Government, also known as Keeping a Promise for a Strong Economy Act, 2002. Since 1995 the government has worked to advance policies that foster a strong economic environment in which Ontario's communities can thrive. We did this through a number of measures, namely sound economic and fiscal management, reducing taxes, balancing the budget, paying down the debt, reducing red tape and removing barriers to growth.

I am proud to say that Ontario has achieved great economic success since 1995. This has been demonstrated in record economic growth and job creation. Over the last seven years, over 980,000 new jobs have been created, the best job creation record in Canada.

Strong cities, towns and rural communities are vital to achieving continued economic prosperity. Among the many initiatives included in this act is legislation that, if approved, would allow the province to provide opportunity bonds and create tax incentive zones for municipalities facing challenges attracting investment and jobs. These programs were first announced in the 2002 throne speech. At that time the government announced its intention to introduce legislation that would create tax-exempt opportunity bonds to support local infrastructure investments and the implementation of Smart Growth strategies.

In the 2002 Ontario budget the government reaffirmed its intention to move ahead with developing opportunity bonds and tax incentive zones. At the same time, the government also announced it would consult with stakeholders on the design and implementation of opportunity bonds and tax incentive zones. Both these initiatives complement the Smart Growth agenda of helping municipalities with their infrastructure needs and becoming more attractive to investment and as a good place to live.

For the members who are not familiar with them, I would like to take a few minutes to describe these programs. Opportunity bonds would be a tool to raise lower-cost financing that would assist Ontario municipalities that need to make significant improvements to their infrastructure over the coming years. Opportunity bonds would allow municipalities to finance long-term capital projects with long-term financing, therefore providing some stability to municipal financing. Municipalities would also have access to lower-cost financing to fund their infrastructure needs. The bonds would also benefit investors in that they would offer investors an income tax exemption on the interest earned on the bonds, as well as an attractive rate of return with a large degree of safety. Opportunity bonds would provide Ontarians with an opportunity to invest in the quality of life in their communities, thereby making an investment for themselves and their families.

This act would allow the province to put in place a program that would allow a municipality to invest prudently in improving and maintaining their infrastructure. Opportunity bonds are a form of debt financing that is widely used in the United States by state, city and county governments, as well as other public bodies, to raise money for capital infrastructure projects such as schools, highways, hospitals, water and sewer improvements, and so on.

The government of this province sees this program as an opportunity to enable municipalities to access long-term debt at substantially lower interest rates regardless of their size or location in this province. The government also believes that a partnership between all levels of government and local communities is important in designing a financing tool that would allow municipalities to efficiently finance their projects to build healthy and prosperous communities.

We also encourage the federal government to support municipalities in renewing and expanding their infrastructure by joining Ontario as a partner in providing a tax exemption for opportunity bonds.

More and better infrastructure would serve to make a community more attractive as a destination for investment in job creation. We believe the benefits provided in opportunity bonds would be attractive to both investors and municipalities.

The government further showed its support of the opportunity bonds program when Premier Eves announced, at the Association of Municipalities of Ontario conference in August, that the province would create the Ontario Municipal Economic Infrastructure Financing Authority. This financing authority is a new body that will control a pool of capital that municipalities will be able to access. The authority would be endowed with $1 billion in initial capital funding, along with $120 million through the Ontario Clean Water Agency that will be available for financing municipal sewage and water infrastructure. Supporting this act will also facilitate the creation of the Ontario Municipal Economic Infrastructure Financing Authority, once again demonstrating that the province supports the success of municipalities.

As the government plans for the future, it is also moving forward with creating tax incentive zones for communities experiencing challenges in attracting investment in jobs. Establishing tax incentive zones in Ontario is another important initiative that would stimulate investment in Ontario communities. By declaring a community a tax incentive zone, businesses would be encouraged to invest, locate or expand there to help support business and economic growth.

A number of other jurisdictions have these programs.

When we're talking about tax incentive zones, I can recall, a number of years ago, having spent nine years as mayor of the town of Petrolia and six years on council, that on many occasions we were approached by different business and commercial entities with regard to starting a new plant or a new facility. Being close to the American border, we were always in competition with the state of Michigan, the state of Ohio and, to a lesser extent, the state of Indiana. All of these states had tax incentive zones. It made it very difficult for a community in Ontario, especially a rural community that is undergoing tremendous demographic changes, whereby the young people are leaving the community and businesses are disappearing or they're not growing. It made it very difficult for a community to offer incentives in order to compete with jurisdictions across the border.

I know there is some disenchantment and some disagreement among some of the members on the other side of the House with regard to tax incentive zones, but I think they can be a tremendous tool for small, rural and northern communities in order to attract investment, to maintain the local economic activity and to create jobs and opportunities for young people so we can maintain them in small and northern communities. It is a challenge. Consequently, as a government, we have to make sure that we provide the tools that are necessary to make sure that our municipalities will be competitive, not only today but in the future.

The United States and Britain have tax incentive zones to assist their communities in achieving economic growth. They have realized, as a government, that there is merit to this type of zone. I feel strongly that it has been long overdue that we should have this type of economic activity and incentive in the province of Ontario. In the United States, 41 state governments, including New York, Pennsylvania, Michigan and Ohio, have established tax incentive programs to encourage business investment and job creation in targeted communities. In Canada, Quebec, Prince Edward Island, and Newfoundland and Labrador have tax incentive programs to encourage private sector investment and job creation.

The government is committed to working with municipalities to develop its own made-in-Ontario approach that incorporates the best practices from programs in other jurisdictions. I had the opportunity about five or six weeks ago to lead the consultation process with opportunity bonds and tax incentive zones in the community of Timmins. There were representations from the private sector, and certainly businesses and industries in the area were very well represented. The municipalities were extremely well represented. There were representations from all the municipalities in northeastern Ontario. We had a very interesting discussion.

As we know, there will be six tax incentive pilot projects across the province. There is no doubt that the challenges facing northeastern Ontario are somewhat different than the challenges facing northwestern Ontario or southwestern Ontario or eastern Ontario. Each area of the province has its own demographic, has its own problems, has its own challenges. Therefore, it is imperative that the government, as it has done, consult with different community leaders and business leaders across the province to ensure that we design pilot projects that will cater to the needs of the people who live in those areas, because I do not believe that one pilot project or one solution will fit all of the province of Ontario. The province is too varied, the economic activities in the province are way too diversified, and consequently we need different solutions for different areas of the province.

The government is also committed to working with municipalities to develop its own made-in-Ontario approach that incorporates the best practices from programs in other jurisdictions. The tax incentive zone program is based on a foundation of five principles:

(1) Opportunity: the belief that all Ontarians should have the opportunity to succeed regardless of where they live.

(2) Innovation: a commitment to support entrepreneurship and new ideas that build on local strengths and success.

(3) Partnerships for growth: a commitment to strong community-based partnerships involving all levels of government, business and community residents and organizations to achieve renewal and growth through locally developed economic development solutions.

The next one is commitment to the future of Ontario's communities, giving young people the opportunity to live, work, raise a family and give back to the communities where they grew up.

The last one is enhanced competitiveness, a long-term strategy to improve the ability of local economies to compete for jobs and investment in the global economy.

I must add that all of these pilot programs should be sustainable, not only in the short term but in the long term, because too many times we see grants, loans and money provided by different levels of government to programs that are not sustainable in the long term. I think the taxpayers of Ontario have had enough experience over the past number of years with these types of programs that they expect more from their governments today. I think it's the responsible thing to do. Whatever programs we undertake must be sustainable.

To develop the program, the government has been consulting with community and business leaders since early September on how to design and implement a program that works for communities experiencing challenges in attracting investment and jobs. We recognize that many communities have been actively pursuing economic development opportunities and would welcome the opportunity to use tax incentive programs to further their efforts.

In August, Premier Eves also announced at AMO that, in addition to the consultations, this program would initially be developed, as I pointed out, through six pilot projects. The experience gained from the pilots, along with the advice received through the consultations with business and community leaders, will allow the government to design a tax incentive zone program that best supports the economic development and job creation needs of communities across the province.

The Ministry of Finance invited all interested municipalities to submit expressions of interest in hosting a pilot project. The positive response the government has had to tax incentive zones is exemplified by the great number of responses we have received to the pilot projects through the expressions of interest.

Opportunity bonds and tax incentive zones are tools that, if approved by this Legislature, would support the implementation of the government's Smart Growth strategies to build strong, vibrant and prosperous communities across the province. These programs demonstrate the government's innovative efforts to build communities across Ontario by encouraging public and private partners to invest in municipal infrastructure investment.

Healthy and growing communities are vital to achieving economic prosperity. We recognize this, and with this act we are investing in the ability of our communities to contribute to our economic growth and quality of life.

On this bill, I would also like to refer to a couple of items, if I have time. I know I don't have an awful lot of time left. Part I of the bill, and I know it's a fairly large bill, deals with the Assessment Act. Some people say the bill is very complicated. I think if we take the time to go through and even if we scan it fairly quickly, this amendment to the act—currently subsection 31(1) of the Assessment Act requires the clerk of a municipality to add to the collector's roll any land that has been omitted in whole or in part from the roll in the circumstances described in that subsection.

Amendments permit the minister to prescribe exceptions to this requirement. The amendments are made effective as of January 1, 2002. References through the act to "residential/farm property class" are changed to "residential property class" and references to "farmlands property class" are changed to "farm property class."

That seems to be awfully complicated, but I had the opportunity to do some revisions and consultations with stakeholders across the province on property assessment. In the report, this is one of the recommendations that we made, because there was some confusion by people living on farms with regard to the way their properties were described. We listened to what the stakeholders were saying, we catered to their concern and we tried to solve the problem. Consequently, when you get your new assessment form, which most people will probably be receiving in the next couple of weeks, it will be clear as to when a farm is a farm, and a residence on a piece of farmland is a residence. There will be a clear distinction so that people will not be confused.

There's also another part in the bill, and if I have time—I know I'm really running out of time. In part 16 in the same report, we recommended that—under the old act, municipalities could charge 25% of the residential rate for agricultural land. The amendment to this act will give municipalities the flexibility to charge less than 25% of the residential rate for farmland. I'm out of time but I urge—

The Acting Speaker: Thank you. Questions or comments?

Mr David Ramsay (Timiskaming-Cochrane): I'm pleased to be able to make some comments on the speech that we just heard in the Legislature tonight. In this bill there are a couple of things that are of very keen interest to me. One that the member had talked about are these tax incentive zones that are being discussed, and I know the government is having a consultation across the north. The problem the government is going to be looking into is that right now they've got municipalities competing against themselves all across rural and northern Ontario.

I certainly propose, as one of the six prototypes, that maybe they take a look at a riding such as mine, which is very representative of rural northeastern Ontario. I think you have to take large areas or zones, like the incentive talks about, although a lot of us are very curious as to what tax incentives there might be there. We in northern Ontario have distinct disadvantages compared to other parts of the province. I see the member for Parry Sound-Muskoka is here, and even though his area is included as northern Ontario, a lot of us represent areas quite north and away from the major markets in North America and have a lot of disadvantages. So we'd be very curious to see what sort of tax incentives were there, and also how they would be applied.

For instance, are they only going to be applied to new industries starting to set up in one of these zones, or will it apply to all existing businesses? That would be a big headache for the government. When you do establish these zones and try these prototypes across the province, I think you'd better look at, in order to be fair, making sure that everybody who is doing business there has the same competitive advantage. I would certainly say that there are parts of rural Ontario right across this province, especially parts in the north that I represent, that need any advantage we can get to try to keep jobs in our areas.

Mr Tony Martin (Sault Ste Marie): I wanted to follow up on the comments from the member for Timiskaming-Cochrane, because he's absolutely right and comment to the points put on the table tonight here in the House on these tax incentive zones. I think it needs to be explained to people just exactly what this initiative is all about.

My read of it, very briefly, in quick fashion, is that this government is still further driving taxes down for corporations and businesses, but in this instance not doing it themselves but allowing municipalities to do it; you know, not telling people—I'm sure municipalities understand and will soon find that in fact what it means is a reduced tax base for them to continue to provide the infrastructure, which is probably their best bet in terms of providing advantage to industry that might want to come and set up. So I counsel caution on this.

I was at an Algoma District Municipal Association meeting that you were at just a short while ago in Wawa, where I counselled the members there to look at this very carefully, because it will indeed reduce the already meagre tax base that exists to cover the downloaded costs of providing municipal services. It's very complicated in that we're not sure how that will work out in terms of the already existing businesses. Will they get the same incentives? Will they get the same tax reductions as the new businesses coming in? It will create all kinds of difficulties.

I would suggest to the government that if they really wanted to help northern Ontario, which is the area I'm concerned about most because our economy has shrunk big time over the tenure of this government, they'd return some of the vehicles that were already in existence when they got the government that they wiped out, like the Ministry of Northern Development and Mines, like the northern Ontario heritage fund.

Mr Bart Maves (Niagara Falls): I want to congratulate Mr Beaubien, the member from Lambton-Kent-Middlesex, who has actually been a one-man commission for the past three years-plus with regard to property tax assessment across the province of Ontario. I think he should be congratulated, because at least four of his proposals, four of his initiatives, are contained in this bill tonight. He talked about some, with the tax incentive zones and the farm assessment clarification as two examples. I want to congratulate the member for the job that he's done with regard to property tax assessment across the province of Ontario.

Other members have certain problems that they uncover with property tax assessment in their own ridings. This member has been very eager and quick to traverse the province to go and meet with people to find out what their concerns are, where there's a quirk and a problem with the property tax assessment. He came down to Niagara-on-the-Lake, for an example, with the problem we were having with property tax assessment with regard to bed and breakfasts. I know he's been down to St Catharines, where we have a problem with commercial assessment in the city core. So he's been very active throughout the province.

He has filed one very comprehensive report and is about to file another. I know, as I said at the outset, there are four items in this bill that come from the member's one-man commission on property tax assessment. So he needs to be congratulated for that. I thank him on behalf of the people of Ontario and the people in my riding.

The Acting Speaker: Response?

Mr Beaubien: I would like to thank the members from Timiskaming-Cochrane, Sault Ste Marie and Niagara Falls for their comments.

With regard to the comments the member from Sault Ste Marie made, I know that this issue is probably quite sensitive and certainly close to his heart, because I know that his community has suffered through downsizing of many industries.

When he talks about not giving the opportunities to municipalities to give tax credit, I don't know what the final model is going to look like within these six pilot projects. But in the research I have done across the United States and some of the provinces in Canada on tax incentive zones, it's basically a locally driven initiative. So the community decides what type of industry or commercial entity it would like to have locate within their boundaries, and they're the ones who decide the levels of initiatives that they want offered.

Mr Martin: You make it sound so easy.

Mr Beaubien: If the member from Sault Ste Marie has difficulties with regard to having sound, sustainable commercial and industrial entities, I wonder how his constituents in Sault Ste Marie feel when he comments that big, bad Stelco, which has an awful lot of money from all the taxpayers of the province of Ontario, not only on one occasion but more than one occasion—I don't have any problem with that, in order to maintain a viable northern economy. But I fail to see where his rationale is with regard to, say, big, bad Stelco; big, bad St Mary's pulp and paper; big, bad Dubreuil Lumber—

Mr Martin: Algoma Steel.

Mr Beaubien: I don't know what they call it now. But they are the people who create economic activity.

The Acting Speaker: Further debate?

Mr John Gerretsen (Kingston and the Islands): I am very pleased to join this debate this evening. Just to follow up the last discussion on tax incentive zones, yes, there are some municipalities that will take advantage of this. But it could also be interpreted by some as really being sort of a race—

Mr Beaubien: On a point of order, Mr Speaker: When I mentioned the comments from the member from Sault Ste Marie, I think I did say "Stelco." It should be Algoma Steel.

The Acting Speaker: You're asking to correct your own record. Good.

Mr Gerretsen: Well, thank you very much. You know, that's one of the very first times in this House in the last seven years that I've actually seen a government member get up and say that he was wrong about something. This government is not known for admitting that it's wrong about anything. So I appreciate that from the member from Lambton.

My comment with respect to tax incentive zones is, yes, I know some municipalities want it, but I think it's also something that may be somewhat dangerous to get involved in, because basically, when you get right down to it, money is being taken out of the municipal tax base in one way or another. We all know the tremendous strains that municipalities are under right now when it comes to providing services and finances that are required for those services.

I'm certainly one person who believes in giving municipalities the power to get involved in pilot projects of this nature. I happen to believe that most municipalities elect councils that the people of that area obviously want, or else they wouldn't have elected them, and that those individuals are just as smart or just as dumb as the people that we elect to this level. I don't think that because you are elected to a so-called higher level of government, whether it be the provincial or federal level, it makes you any smarter a person in trying to figure out all these various rules and regulations and concepts that are out there.

I know it's something that most municipalities have been asking for, for a long period of time, but I would just warn municipalities to be careful with it, because if it becomes a race between municipalities to attract a certain industry, to give up certain tax incentives, which come out of that local municipal tax base, then I don't think anybody wins in the long run. I think we've got to be very careful with the way that's being handled.

I think that the people of Ontario have to understand that we are once again dealing with a massive bill here which implements the budget that was announced back in June. It's a 146-page bill that deals with dozens upon dozens of acts and changes to acts etc, but there are two or three fundamental principles contained in the bill that I think the people of Ontario should be aware of.

The first thing is that it does away with or temporarily sets aside is the so-called Taxpayer Protection Act. Remember, that was the big act that was passed by this government that was never going to allow deficit budgeting again. I mean, they were so sincere about it, and I'm sure a lot of the people of Ontario thought, "You know, this is a good thing." Well, here we are—and is it year one or year two?—that the government has deemed it necessary to basically set that law aside and say, "Yes, we intended that two years ago or last year, and we're not going to be able to live up to it at this given time," when for most people the general economy has not been that bad. It's not as if we're involved in a tremendous economic downturn, like we were, for example, in the early 1990s.

Mr Rick Bartolucci (Sudbury): Except in northern Ontario.

Mr Gerretsen: So the question is, if we're doing it under these kind of circumstances, and as my seatmate has said, "except for northern Ontario"—and I realize that there have always been significant problems in northern Ontario with respect to the economy. But certainly for Ontario as a whole, we are not involved in a tremendous economic downturn. Some people may not be doing as well in the stock market or pension plans and things like that. I realize that, but generally speaking, the economy is still moving along quite well. And yet we're setting aside this act, which was sort of the hallmark of this government's commitment to the people.

The other issue, of course, deals with the tax cuts they announced earlier with respect to income tax, and the corporate taxes as well. Let me be absolutely sure about this, Speaker: we were against those tax cuts right from the beginning. We have always said it is much more important for us to build a competitive society here in Ontario that can compete with people across the world. It is necessary to invest in education so that our young people can have the best possible skills when they go into the work world, to have the best health care program available, because we know our health care program, when you compare it with what is available even with many American companies, is so much cheaper to the workforce in the long run. It is important to invest in the people of Ontario. That's where the money should have been put in the first place. So I for one don't mind the fact that they are not going to live up to their promises of the tax cuts that they made both in the income tax area and the corporate tax area. But let me also make absolutely certain to the people of Ontario that they have broken their promises to them once again. There's absolutely no question about that.

There are all sorts of issues I could take with respect to different aspects of this bill. There are just two of them I want to highlight, and I'm glad to see the Minister of Health and Long-Term Care is in the House this evening.

I would like to speak for just a moment about a press release that was issued today by the Ontario Nurses' Association. It states, and I'm quoting from the press release, "Government Misleads Public on Senior Care." That's what this press release states. You may recall that earlier this month or late last month, a major announcement was made that we're going to be making an investment of money for more nurses and more personal care workers in our long-term-care homes. We all know that right now we rank absolutely last in a study of 10 comparable jurisdictions in the amount of nursing care that we are able to provide mainly to our seniors in nursing homes, but there are also other vulnerable people who aren't seniors as yet.

The government felt it had to do something as a result of the 55,000 postcards they received whereby people were basically saying, "It's not good enough that seniors only get one bath a week. It's not good enough that they only get an average of four minutes of help to get up in the morning and get down to breakfast. More needs to be done." So the first thing the government tried to do was to get it from the seniors themselves by imposing a 15% increase, which in most cases meant an increase of something like $230 per month for people who are in their high 80s or early 90s, people who are living totally on fixed incomes, and they simply couldn't afford it. There was a major public outcry. So the government, to its credit, went partway back and said, OK, it was going to be 15% over three years.

Interjection.

Mr Gerretsen: Well, this deals with this budget bill, because this should have been in the budget.

Anyway, the government made an announcement and said they were going to put more money in, and they did put some more money in—I'll give them credit—as a result of the tremendous outpouring of cries from people saying, "We're not treating our seniors in our senior citizens' homes and homes for the aged properly and correctly, the way they should be treated."

What's happened to this money? According to the minister at the time, 2,400 nurses and personal care workers were going to be hired as a result of this input. But the Ontario Nurses' Association put together a list of about 15 to 20 homes for the aged and nursing homes that weren't able to hire any more staff because basically the money was used to fund deficits, and this is particularly in the case of municipal homes and charitable homes. These organizations were running a deficit. I know what the ministry will say: "Well, that money should have been used to hire more staff." The problem is that these homes couldn't, because they were running a deficit already. They couldn't do it with the lack of funding that they had received from the government to start with.

I could give you all sorts of examples here. At the Sun Parlour Home in the county of Essex, the increase in the nursing and personal care per diem rate will be applied to reduce the projected shortfall for the balance of the year. At Glen Stor Dun Lodge, the increase of funds for the nursing and personal care envelope will not be used to increase staff but to basically fund a deficit as well. At Hastings Centennial Manor, the new funding will be used to partially offset the current operating deficit for nursing and personal care. Finlandia Hoivakoti—I hope I said that correctly; I visited that home here in Toronto, as a matter of fact.

Mr Bartolucci: Sudbury.

Mr Gerretsen: Is that in Sudbury? There's a similar home on Eglinton Avenue here in Toronto that I visited about two months ago. The increased funding is being used to reduce the deficit. At Rainycrest, funding is being used to cover their budget shortfall. At the Don Mills home for the aged, half the funding is being used to cover the current deficit. And I could go on and on and on.

Obviously, somebody in the ministry is going to blame these homes and is going to say that money should have been used to hire new support workers etc. I think the homes did the right thing. If they were running a deficit and being fiscally responsible, they used that money for the deficit.

The point is simply that even with this influx of new money, we are still last in 10 jurisdictions. The 10 jurisdictions that were studied, to give people some idea, were two other provinces in Canada, some US states and some countries in Europe, all of which have a population base of roughly 10 million to 11 million people, except for the other two Canadian provinces, which of course is our population base in Ontario. All of those situations that were studied in the government-funded study, the Price-waterhouse study, clearly indicated that we in Canada, we in Ontario, spend less for nursing care on average per resident in one of these homes than anywhere else.

I think the government, rather than coming up with these schemes of income tax cuts and corporate tax cuts, which it has had to delay in any event, should have taken some of that money in its past tax cuts and put it into high-quality personal and nursing care for seniors who are basically not able to look after themselves.

I just wanted to bring that forward, because that press release was just issued today. The Ontario Nurses' Association is having a major conference downtown, and they felt that strongly about it. There are no more personal care workers and nurses hired by these homes. They're mainly using it in order to buy more supplies or deal with their deficit situations.

There is another section in the bill that is very interesting—it's already been referred to in the House a number of times; there have been questions about it during question period—and that deals with the Pension Benefits Act. It's the Conrad Black clause. I know this can all be very confusing to the people out there, but basically what it means—I'll just read you the section: "An employer ... as may be prescribed may apply under this section to the superintendent," and that's the superintendent of pension plans or the superintendent of finance, I'm not quite sure what his title is, "for the superintendent's consent to the payment of surplus to the employer ... out of a continuing pension plan or a pension plan being wound up in whole or in part."

What that basically means is that there are amendments in this bill that allow one party to a pension contract—namely, the employer—to apply to the superintendent to have any surplus in that pension fund returned or given to the employer when the plan is being wound up. The employees are saying, "Look, that isn't just the employer's money, it's our money as well. In effect, whatever has happened to that plan by way of increases in size etc is a deferred wage to us." It is a benefit that should be coming to them.

It's the same argument the OMERS people have. I'm sure, Mr Speaker, that you and I have heard from many retired firefighters and police officers and other municipal workers who were somewhat miffed at the fact that as the result of an arrangement between the OMERS board and the municipalities and the government, in effect a holiday was given whereby no one had to contribute to this plan for a certain period of time because the OMERS pension fund had done so well as an investment fund over the years. The argument by the retired individuals is, "Look, it was our contributions over the years that basically caused this plan to do so well. It was our money that was invested and did extremely well," in the stock market or wherever the investments were over the years, "and we should be getting the benefit." We've heard that argument from many retired individuals.

I know there are some people within OMERS, particularly the employees who have just started working for, let's say, a municipality, who haven't made any contributions at all for two or three years and were immediately, in effect, given a benefit. It was also a major benefit to the employers, namely, the municipalities, because they didn't have to put in their half of the pension contribution either, so that was a big, big benefit to the municipalities as well.

This Conrad Black clause is something similar; it works exactly the same way. The employer in this case is basically saying, "If there's a surplus in the pension plan, it should be coming to us, and I can make the application as a result of the changes in section 79.1 under this act, if it's passed," and I don't think that's fair. It's my understanding that since 1988 up until the end of this year, agreements have always been reached between the employees and the employers as to how excess funds in pension plans when they were wound up should be handled between the employees and the employer. That is being done away with, if this law were to pass, by one stroke of the pen. That's not fair to the employees and there has to be another way to deal with it.

I know the Minister of Finance has said in this House during question period, "Oh, but that's not what it's saying at all." All I can tell you is that we've had individuals who are very knowledgeable in these areas look at this and we've received dozens of e-mails and letters from individuals who are extremely concerned about that. I would say that this is a matter that affects enough people out there that it really should almost be a stand-alone piece of legislation. It should not be contained in a massive omnibus bill like this.

There are a number of other things that we could talk about. I'll give Mike Harris credit for one thing. I hate doing that, but I'll give him credit for one thing. To the general public he was perceived as at least keeping his word on some of the major issues that he brought forward. I don't happen to agree with that, but that's the perception that was left out there. I don't believe, for example, that when he said he wasn't going to close a hospital and then he closed a whole series of hospitals through his hospital restructuring commission, that he kept his word. Or when he said, "Well, if we do close hospitals," once he made that statement, "we're going to take the money we're going to save from the closing of hospitals and put that money toward community care." And that hasn't happened either; it just hasn't happened.

I would still challenge the Minister of Health to come up with a figure as to how much money the government has actually saved as a result of all the hospital beds that have closed since 1995. Let's get a figure for a year for that and let's see if that quantity of money, whatever it is—whether it's $100 million, $200 million, $300 million, $500 million or $600 million or maybe into the billion dollars—has actually gone into the community care access system, because that was the promise that was made by the Premier, by the Minister of Health, and by Duncan Sinclair, the health services restructuring commissioner, who basically said that if you're going to restructure, that's what you have to do. Now that it's done, or a lot of it has been done, we don't talk about it any more. Yet we know there are many people who need the community care access services out there—home care etc—who are now being denied those services because that money didn't flow into that. But at least the perception out there was that he kept his word. Well, we know now that he didn't, and this bill probably says it better than any other bill: the main piece of legislation, that all the government members were so excited about, that the taxpayers were going to be forever protected from deficits, has in effect been breeched and broken by this bill.

The Acting Speaker: Questions or comments?

Mr David Christopherson (Hamilton West): I want to compliment the member from Kingston and the Islands on his remarks. He gave a good, thorough analysis of a number of the areas that are of concern to us in the NDP caucus and I think should be of concern to all Ontarians.

In particular, I hope people understand that the effect of Bill 198 is to put the lie to one of the major planks that this government has run on, and that is that if you cut taxes governments win because the economic activity that ensues generates more tax revenue than the income tax or corporate tax that has been forgone. Member after member has stood in his place and pointed to the revenue figure over these last seven years and said, "See, that proves it. We cut taxes, and the revenue number is up. We cut taxes again, and revenue numbers are up. Therefore, whenever you cut taxes, revenue goes up because it stimulates the economy and creates jobs, blah blah blah," and if the cameras could show there are members of the government back benches nodding up and down just as the Kool-Aid was supposed to affect them.

What happens now is—we've been saying to this government all along that the only reason your revenues are up at a time when you're cutting all those taxes is because of the economic boom in the United States—now that we are in a downturn and revenues are expected to decrease and there is less economic activity, if your theory was true, you should be doubling the tax cuts, not deferring them. But the fact that you're deferring them is proof that you can't cut taxes as a way to sure-fire prosperity. That's just a sure-fire way to make the rich richer.

Hon David Young (Attorney General, minister responsible for native affairs): I appreciate having an opportunity to comment upon this important bill and indeed to enter into this debate. I think none of us should ever forget that we have the privilege of sitting in this Legislative Assembly. I know I take that very seriously. I know most of the members on both sides of this chamber do so. We have a trust that has been placed in us to do the right thing. Sometimes that isn't easy. Sometimes there are difficult decisions to be made. There's only one taxpayer. I guess that's become trite for some to say, but the truth of the matter is there is only one taxpayer. They have only one set of pockets; there is only so much money to go around.

We, as a government, have taken a very different approach. We have said to the people of this great province that we are going to make those tough but necessary decisions. We are going to ensure that their hard-earned tax dollars stay with them except where absolutely necessary, except when government needs the money to do what governments should do to provide for individuals, to provide for communities where communities are not in a position to provide for themselves. This bill does just that. This is the government; the Ernie Eves government is the government that has cut taxes, not once, not twice, not three times, not four times, indeed, almost 200 times, 199 times, so that individuals across this province can keep their hard-earned money.

We believe that the incentives we have brought forward here, the further measures that we have tabled, continue that tradition. We believe that this bill represents an appropriate balance. It includes tax incentives in appropriate situations but, by and large, leaves the taxpayers to do what they do best, and what they do best is know how to spend their hard-earned money. We in this chamber don't have all the answers. The Liberals and the New Democrats often think they do; they don't.

Mr Bartolucci: I think the member from Kingston and the Islands has articulated clearly what this side of the House really believes, and that's that with this bill, Bill 198, there has been a betrayal on the part of the government to even its corporate friends in this instance. It's a matter of trust that the government has failed miserably.

You see, the people of northern Ontario have known this for a long time. You can't trust this particular government to act in the best interests of the majority of the population. The people in northern Ontario have certainly seen it with hospital restructuring. We continue to wait for real money to complete projects across northern Ontario. We know that the municipal downloading experience has been a disaster for those municipalities in northern Ontario. The hydro Humpty Dumpty act that this government just went through last week has devastating effects on most municipalities in Ontario. I think of my own municipality of Sudbury where the cost of this experiment will exceed $5 million plus the rebate costs. That's a significant amount of money when you consider that the city of greater Sudbury was shortchanged by $10 million with the municipal downloading.

Of course, there's the matter of trust when it comes to the four-laning of Highway 69. People of northeastern Ontario—Timmins, Kirkland Lake, Sudbury, Sault Ste Marie, Elliot Lake, Manitoulin Island—clearly understand that this government is not committed to that four-laning. We look at the issues of Union Gas. There we have two appeals before cabinet, and this Premier is doing nothing. In fact the people of northeastern Ontario believe that the multi-personality Premier that we have in place must decide which face we are seeing.

Mr Martin: I want to commend the member for Kingston and the Islands. He always speaks passionately on behalf of his community, relates the issues of this place to there, as we all should. I want to say that people in northern Ontario were hoping that, at least this time around, there might be something in this budget bill that would be helpful to them, given that we have experienced seven-plus years of recession and negative economic activity up there. I suggest that the rest of the province should be looking at that, because what happens at the fringes generally, slowly but surely, invades the rest of the body. We could be looking at some rather challenging and interesting times ahead. For example, I have a report here that I received back in the spring of this year in May, that said since March 2001 more than 14,700 jobs have been lost from the northeastern Ontario labour force, a decrease of almost 6%, according to Human Resources Development Canada. March was the eighth consecutive month of job losses in the area. A total of about 3,400 of those jobs were full-time positions. That's what your government has to answer for. That's what your government is responsible for, not this other gobbledegook that we hear coming from the other side all the time.

The northern Ontario economy has been hit by a one-two economic punch since 1995. First the resource sector of the economy was put into recession. Then, second, the public sector underwent a major retraction. The result? While the rest of the economy has boomed with the US economy, increasing by an average of 5% per year, the sectors most important to the northern economy have undergone a recession, a recession largely created by this government, a recession that this government sooner or later will have to answer for, hopefully at this coming election.

The Acting Speaker: The member for Kingston and the Islands in response.

Mr Gerretsen: I'd like to thank the members from Hamilton West, the Attorney General from Willowdale, the members from Sudbury and Sault Ste Marie for their comments.

To the Attorney General I would only say that he stated something about 199 tax cuts. Well, according to our count, there have been 894 user fees either introduced by this government or caused to be introduced by other levels of government because of their gross underfunding. So if this is just a numbers game, you are losing about five to one with all the user fees that have been introduced all over the province over the last number of years.

It's interesting that he talked about tax incentives. Let there be no mistake about it: these tax incentives are paid for by the municipalities. In other words, as a result of these tax incentives that they may use in order to induce businesses to locate within their areas, they are going to lose tax dollars so they will have to be made up by municipalities in other ways. The incentive is there for the municipalities if they want to use it, but it's not as if it's through the largesse of this government.

Finally, yes, I believe government is a matter of trust, but it's a matter of trust and doing the right thing for all the people out there. It is my fervent belief that the people who need protection most by government are not the well-off in our society, but the vulnerable, the poor and the senior population. They're the ones who we should be looking out for. I think time will show and the people of Ontario know that those people have fared very poorly under this government. They've broken the trust of the more vulnerable in our society.

The Acting Speaker: Further debate?

Mr Christopherson: I appreciate the opportunity to join in the debate. I've only got 20 minutes. I'd love to do a lot more on the whole issue of taxes and the white flag that's being run up as a result of those tax cuts being deferred and what that means in terms of the propaganda the government has been putting forward—spewing forward, if you will—for the last seven years. Time just doesn't permit, other than on some responses.

I want to tackle one of the biggest growing issues that has been identified in this bill. I think this House, in question period and now in the debate on Bill 198, is really only beginning to scratch the surface of what's at stake here. It's complex. I'm the first one to admit that pension issues are not easy to understand. I'm neither an actuary nor a lawyer, so I fess up to the fact that this stuff is hard to digest, comprehend and turn into language the average working person can understand. When that happens, my sense of this is that the opposition has every right to be raising serious alarm bells, as we've been doing.

I want to say a couple of things before I get into the details of it. Number one, it's been put across the floor from the government that, "Well, you know, we had consultations with the labour movement and people who represent workers and their pensions." The fact of the matter is that, yes, there were meetings that took place, but the basis of the consultation papers upon which the consultation took place is different from what we find in the bill now that it has been tabled. For all intents and purposes, you have not consulted on what it is you have proposed, so any argument that you don't need to go out to committee doesn't hold water, given, again, the fact that what was talked about in your pre-bill presentation discussions and what exists in the bill are completely different. If you're going to start monkeying around with people's pensions, you've got an obligation to give those people an opportunity to have their say in how the law ought to be written as it affects pensions.

Let me also put on the record very clearly why the issue of surpluses is more than the employer putting in more money than they need or there being more money today than the actuaries say is needed to make the fund fully vested and there's enough money to pay out the obligations. When the government brought in the legislation in 1987, there was a lot of discussion about what happens with the surpluses as well as about what we do about the need to provide some inflation protection for future retirees. How do we build that into the legislation? There was some talk of mandating inflation protection through indexing and there were other vehicles that were looked at. Ultimately, what was decided and was explicitly expressed by this Legislature was that the surplus would be deemed to be a proxy for any kind of mandating.

Further, there's a recognition—since pension funds are invested in markets; whether it's bonds, stocks or other investment vehicles, they go into the markets—we know from today, as opposed to if we had had this debate two years ago, that putting money into the market doesn't guarantee anything other than letting go of the dice. One of the reasons that the Supreme Court and this Legislature held that those surpluses need to be put toward future inflation protection is that you need the dollar investment highs to compensate for the lows. So this is not just about whether or not, on the day that a calculation is made by an actuary, there's enough money, whether the employer is fully paid up or not. It's much more than that.

There are two major issues at stake here. One is what happens when there is a pension surplus. Right now, there's a court ruling, in what's called the Monsanto case—it's been raised here earlier. That case found in favour of the employees; it's now before the Ontario Court of Appeal. We in the NDP caucus believe that the reason this bill is in here now, rather than waiting for the Court of Appeal, is that they're trying to get out in front of that court case to set the law so that no matter what happens in the appeal, the employer's argument is the one that prevails.

Let's understand. There are, I'm reading, over 200 cases potentially affecting upwards of hundreds of thousands of people who are affected by other cases that have been held back, waiting in abeyance, until the outcome of the Monsanto case. This bill has the effect of saying to every one of those cases that's waiting, "It doesn't matter what the Court of Appeal finds; you will be governed by Bill 198."

You know what else it says? Bill 198 takes away the right that people currently have to take the whole issue to court. Bill 198 would deny citizens the right to appeal a pension decision that goes against them, that they now have under law.

Having just gone through the hydro fiasco, is there anybody in the province of Ontario who believes that this government is stepping in ahead of the court case to protect workers? Come on. Nobody's going to buy that. And not only that, this law goes back 14 years—14 years it goes back.

People are scared. You've got to be starting to get the letters. I know I'm getting lots of letters from people in McMaster University, the hospital system. All those who are governed by the pension laws are frightened about what you're going to do. They saw what you did to hydro and they know that anything is possible. So I bet this thing is rammed through here like greased lightning before people get a chance to really mount up the kind of political head of steam that happened with hydro.

Now, what's happening again, as I understand it—and if I've got a piece of this wrong, by all means, in the two-minute responses, I fully expect government members to set me right. Absolutely. But as I understand the bill and the law and the changes, currently, where there's a pension windup, the surpluses are deemed to be the right of the employees, except under two exceptional exceptions. Exceptional exceptions? There I go again. What the government's proposing with Bill 198 is how those exceptions are determined. Right now, the process and the documents that have to be looked at, the criteria and the documents, are set out by the Supreme Court of Canada, which made a property law ruling in this regard. Between the Supreme Court of Canada and the existing Ontario legislation around pensions, that's how you determine whether or not an employer is entitled to get their hands on the money, free and clear with no questions. It's those exceptions that are being changed.

The current law, as prescribed by the Supreme Court of our country, requires "consideration of all relevant documents and the application of relevant trust law practices." The new law will say "prescribed criteria" and prescribed documents—not all, just the ones that are prescribed. And how do we know which ones are prescribed in the bill? You see, that's one of the problems, because it's not in the bill. That's determined by regulation. Regulations are set by cabinet, and cabinet meetings are secret, held behind closed doors.

It's a Tory government. Who do you think has got the most access and influence with the Tory government? Let's see: employers with millions and millions of dollars, a lot of which they're willing to share for political campaigns, and friends of the government with whom they travel in the same circles, go to the same places, do the same things, or the Ontario Federation of Labour? Gee, I wonder. Who's going to have the greater influence on what the final regulations say?

But not just that. Just because they're brought in after this bill is passed doesn't mean they can't be changed. They might not even be as horrible as we think they might be in the beginning. But over time, when this is no longer a front-burner issue, when this legislation is long forgotten and we're caught up in something else down the road, very quietly the minister brings to cabinet a recommendation for a regulation change, and suddenly that whole world turns upside down. That's what's going on with this bill.

The second piece of it is when there's a partial windup. As I understand it, that more directly relates to the Monsanto case, the partial windup. Right now, the law says—you've got lawyers over there, so if I'm wrong, correct me—that where a full windup of a pension would give employees X benefit, you can't do a partial windup and do the calculation based solely on that little bit. You have to do the whole calculation for what the full windup would entail, which means you'd then identify the surpluses that are there.

This bill would change that. Listen, this is what the commission sends out right now to employers who ask for permission to sign off on a windup where the employer hasn't identified the benefits going to the employees. They get a form letter that says in part that former members and other persons affected by the partial windup "shall have rights and benefits that are not less than the rights and benefits they would have on a full windup of the pension plan on the effective date of the partial windup." Again, I know this is not easy stuff to grasp, nor is it interesting for people who aren't facing pensions. But for anybody who is thinking about their future, especially when we take a look at what's going on with the stock market right now, this is dynamite.

They further go on to say, "It is the commission's position that the rights and benefits referred to in subsection 70(6) include any entitlement to surplus that would exist assuming that a full windup of the plan occurred on the date of the partial windup." It is not acceptable to identify partial windup assets as those equal only to the partial windup liabilities.

It's my understanding that in the Monsanto case, the laws as expressed currently were upheld by the courts. The employer is taking that decision to the Ontario Court of Appeal. Bill 198 is meant to get in there and become the law before that court case. How do we know that? Because you deny anybody else the right to challenge decisions made by your superintendent. That is also interesting, because it means the final decision-maker is a bureaucrat, not the laws and rules expressed by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Now, why would a government do that? Why would a government come along and pass a bill that takes away people's rights to go to court and also makes a final decision and changes pension laws before an appeal court has had a chance to hear the appeal? Well, come on. Obviously there's an expectation, at least a reasonable expectation, that the employees might win at the appeal court, and we can't have that. My goodness, we can't have employees running around winning court cases against their employers, not in Ernie Eves's Ontario. So what do you do? You use the power you have to change the law. That's what's going on.

When the government stands up and talks about, "Things can only be decided by two thirds votes" and "this democratic vote" and "that democratic vote," don't get caught up in that. That's not where this argument is. This argument is in that, relatively speaking, narrow part of the law that says when an employer is entitled—entitled—to take the surplus. If you can change that one little piece of the law, nothing else matters, because you never get to a vote, you never get to putting it to the people who are members of the plan or those who are currently retired. In terms of all this stuff the government members talk about, you never get there if the law makes it clear that the employer is entitled to reach in and take the money. That's what's going on: it's the definition of when the employer, by law, has clear access to those surpluses. That is the issue, as least as I can determine it so far.

Rather than using the experience in 1987, both in the application of the law and the process outlined by the Supreme Court of Canada, we're now going to have the processes, criteria and documents relevant to the decision about whether or not an employer can just take the money decided by a regulation passed in secret by the cabinet, which can also be changed a year from now, six months from now, 10 years from now. It's all reported in the Gazette after the fact. If there's a big enough hullabaloo going on around here, we know stuff can just slide right through, and by the time anybody catches on, my friend, it is long-time history.

Think about it. The law goes back 15 years. The law will deny employees a chance to take their grievance to court, which they now have. It will now be determined by cabinet decision, cabinet decree, about when it is indeed lawful for employers to just reach in and take that money.

People are scared. They have every right to be scared. Actually, with the number of baby boomers—not that I'm comparing age groups—looking at or planning or terrified by the prospect of their retirement, to do this kind of thing in favour of corporations really is disgusting. I mean, some of you must be sickened at the prospect that you're going to give your precious vote to a law that makes it easier for employers to take money out of employee pension plans. You should be, because once again you're going to hurt people.

We warned you on hydro. You had two years' warning that taking care of your corporate friends was going to hurt Ontarians. You ignored that, and look what happened. We're saying to you now—we're raising the alarm—that you are going to allow employers to reach in, without any protection for the public, and take funds out of a pension plan. That's wrong. The bill is bad and it deserves to lose. Every one of you should vote against this.

The Acting Speaker: Questions or comments?

Mrs Julia Munro (York North): I'd like to take the moment I have to explain a couple of the issues upon which the previous speaker centred many of his comments.

There is much that circulates around on this particular issue with regard to the pension surplus reforms dealing with part XXV of the bill. One of the myths that has circulated is simply that the government has not consulted on the surplus reforms in Bill 198, and this is simply not true. There was a consultation paper in July 2001, and over the course of several months we received 78 submissions from pensioners, members, unions and employers. After the announcement in the June 17 budget papers, in August 2002, ministry staff held further discussions with representative groups of, again, pensioners, members, unions and employers.

There has been much made of the notion, the myth, if you like, that the legislation will allow employers to raid pension plans. In fact, there could be nothing further to this. Nothing in this legislation affects the earned pension benefits of plan members and retirees. Any surplus withdrawal must be approved by the pension regulator, as has been the case for many years. The employer continues to be responsible for keeping pension plans solvent.

This proposed legislation provides for negotiated surplus-sharing agreements between employers, members and retirees in most cases, which again has been the practice for many years.

I think there needs to be clarity in our discussion.

Mr Dwight Duncan (Windsor-St Clair): I want to commend my colleague from Hamilton West for quite properly pointing out one of the most offensive sections in this bill, and that is the right of employers to take surpluses out of pensions that should rightfully belong to the members of that pension plan. Historically, at least since 1988, there has been an opportunity to share or divide the proceeds of that. He is correct in pointing out that the government, in addition to abandoning its tax cuts, which we applaud the government for—but the most offensive parts of Bill 198 are those sections he used his time to refer to.

I have heard from people right across the province about this section. The government has tried to convey the phony sense that they've consulted. They have not consulted. They consulted behind closed doors with their corporate friends to give them this reward. If they are intent on consulting, then take up our offer to send this bill to public hearings later this week when you time-allocate it, rather than effectively closing off debate on it.

The member from Hamilton West is absolutely right: this is a gift at the expense of working people. It's a gift to the corporate side that the government has buried among a lot of other very offensive pieces in this Bill 198, that in our view will negatively impact on all parts of society. But most offensive in this bill—and the discussion that the member from Hamilton West provided us with educated me as to the implications of it; certain aspects of it I didn't fully comprehend. I urge the government to heed his warning and do the right thing and not proceed with this attempt to allow employers to take surpluses out of pension funds.

Mr Martin: Again, I am happy to rise tonight to comment on the speech given by the member from Hamilton West, who always comes in here with a very well thought out and good analysis and presentation of bills before us. We've heard over the last few days some debate back and forth between the leader of the official opposition and our party on this issue. But tonight we heard a more detailed description of just exactly what is going on where pensions are concerned and this bill. It would behoove anybody who wants to understand this more clearly to take a look at Hansard and refer to this speech that we were given here tonight.

This government has a serious case of wanting to tip the scales continually in favour of their friends and benefactors, to the point where they've now taken to putting things into legislation that even allow us that place of last resort, where we could all bring issues—there is a tipping of the scales concerned to the courts. This government builds in, time and time again here in this place, provisions in legislation that supersede taking things to court, go above and beyond the ability of court to decide or to intervene or intercede in these kinds, and that's a very serious concern. It should be a very serious concern to everybody in Ontario, and particularly where it concerns a person's income and ability to look after oneself in one's senior years and if it affects one's pension.

This government knows no bounds, no end, when it comes to delivering on promises to their corporate friends. But they're certainly very well versed in what it takes to hammer those people that it sees as—

The Acting Speaker: Thank you. Questions or comments?

Mr Bob Wood (London West): We've heard a lot of comment about the effect of this bill on pension plans. The Minister of Finance has been fairly clear in saying that what this bill does is permit an employer who is entitled to a withdrawal to make a withdrawal with the approval of the regulatory authority. That's what she has said the bill says. I notice that none of the opposition critics have produced any letter from a lawyer or an actuary that says that's not what the bill says. We've heard a lot of rhetoric, but we've heard no substance to these criticisms.

The actual fact of the matter is that I question in my mind whether they have any substance to back up the rhetoric. I think in fact they do not. I think the Minister of Finance has made a quite clear statement as to what this bill says, and if the opposition has some reason to think that she is wrong in her interpretation of the bill, they have to give us credible evidence that's the case. Until they do, I don't think they can think anyone is going to take their criticisms very seriously.

I was also interested in noticing that there was no talk about the general financial policy of the government over the past seven years, of which this, of course, is an integral part. The actual fact of the matter is we have had an outstanding success in financial management over the past seven years. An $11-billion deficit has been turned into three consecutive budgetary surpluses. We've gone from very irresponsible financial management to some of the best financial management this province has ever had in its history. I think we can see the results of that in the one million new jobs net that have been created since 1995. I think the people of this province have very great confidence in the budgetary policies of this government because those policies have been such a benefit to them.

The Acting Speaker: Response?

Mr Christopherson: I want to thank my colleagues from York North, Windsor-St Clair, Sault Ste Marie and London West for taking the time to respond. To my friend from York North, it didn't take very long. I told you in my remarks the government was going to pop up and say, "We consulted," and they did that. Of course, the reality is, and I said it before, what they consulted on when they talked to people and what is now in the bill are entirely different. You de facto did not have consultation on Bill 198; you had a nice discussion with some people.

I thank my colleague for Windsor-St Clair for his kind remarks; the same with my colleague Tony Martin. The member from London West—fascinating. Now, he is a lawyer and I wish I had jotted it down the second he said it, but I think you referenced your finance minister saying that all this does is clearly make the case of when employers are entitled to withdraw money from the funds. And that's the whole point. What I'm arguing—and believe me, there'll be all kinds of lawyers who are prepared to come forward and give all the substantive lawyerly comments and phrases you want as long as you give the people a chance to have something to say in public hearings. If you do that, I guarantee you will get all of the legal submissions that you could ever possibly want. Just give us that right.

The member knows that I can't very well make up the sort of arguments I did. I would invite him to take a look at the Supreme Court of Canada ruling, Schmidt v Air Products. It was that court case that made the determination of what the law is right now as it is applied in this province. You want to change what our Supreme Court of Canada said about pension rights and put in what your cabinet says. I want to go with the Supreme Court of Canada over your cabinet 10 times out of 10.

The Acting Speaker: Further debate?

Mr Norm Miller (Parry Sound-Muskoka): It's my pleasure to join in the debate this evening on Bill 198, the Keeping the Promise for a Strong Economy Act, 2002. I'm happy to be able to participate in this debate this evening, since it reaffirms the province's commitment to guaranteeing the exceptional quality of life that people in this province are enjoying. Certainly, since 1995 the government has worked hard to return this province to prosperity. You only have to think back to those days prior to 1995 and remember how tough it was when we were running some fantastic $11-billion deficits and had significant unemployment to remember now how successful we have been.

We've become successful by reducing taxes to create jobs, and it's worth noting that just recently we passed the one million new-job barrier—one million new jobs in the province.

Interjections.

Mr Miller: Yes, I see members opposite commenting on that. That is very, very significant and I'm very proud of the government, and I think all those people who have those jobs are pretty happy as well. Certainly removing barriers to growth has been a big part of the reason we've been able to create those jobs, as is balancing the budget and paying down the debt and investing in infrastructure for the future.

The government knows that communities are facing pressing fiscal challenges. We understand that appropriate funding is necessary to help municipalities build new sewers and roads. That's why we announced opportunity bonds as a lower-cost financing tool that would be available to assist Ontario municipalities needing to make significant improvements in their infrastructure over the coming years. I was pleased to participate in a consultation to do with opportunity bonds and tax incentive zones that occurred in my riding in Parry Sound just a couple of weeks ago. We certainly had some great representation with many municipal politicians. Of course, there are 26 municipalities in the Parry Sound side of the riding. Many of the municipalities were represented, as well as quite a few business leaders. They were very excited about the tax incentive zones and the opportunity bonds that are being made possible through this legislation.

That's why we proposed to introduce legislation providing a provincial tax exemption to investors in opportunity bonds, so that you won't pay provincial income tax if you invest in an opportunity bond. Certainly from that consultation in Parry Sound there was a strong voice wanting the federal government to also provide a tax exemption for the federal tax on investments in opportunity bonds, because that would greatly enhance the investment opportunity and the returns on an investment in opportunity bonds and encourage more people to invest in them, and that would provide more money for the municipalities.

In addition, to support opportunity bonds and help defray the entry costs into the bond market, Premier Eves announced at the Association of Municipalities of Ontario conference in August the creation of the Ontario Municipal Economic Infrastructure Financing Authority, or OMEIFA. This new body will control pooled resources that will allow municipalities to borrow at interest rates that are 50% below market rates. That is certainly very significant and very important for municipalities. OMEIFA will be started with a $1-billion initial investment, capital funding, along with $120 million through the Ontario Clean Water Agency. This is provincial money being invested into this new organization which will be dedicated to financing municipal sewage and water infrastructure as well as other municipal projects. This initial capital infusion would be used to subsidize 50% of the interest costs of any funds borrowed by municipalities through the new financing authority.

The act we're debating here today also enshrines OMEIFA in legislation, thus ensuring that it will be able to operate efficiently as it goes forward and provides much-needed financing for municipalities through the issuing of opportunity bonds. To create an effective financing body, the Ontario Financing Authority, OFA, which is the province's borrowing agency and manages its debt and cash flow, is developing the organizational structure for OMEIFA. The province will also put together a team that will provide advice on the design and details regarding OMEIFA's implementation. Team members will be selected to represent both the interests of the province and the municipalities.

In creating this new authority, the province continues to fulfill its commitment to municipalities to provide them with financing tools to meet their infrastructure needs. Recent raises in debt ratings of Ontario municipalities by Moody's Investors Service confirms that we are on the right track. On September 26, 2002, Moody's Investors Service cited OMEIFA as one of the reasons for raising the city of Toronto's debt rating to AA1 from AA2, stating, "A provincial commitment to provide financial support to transit projects will provide new funding to the city, helping to offset pressures.... Furthermore, the creation of a new provincial agency, the Ontario Municipal Economic Infrastructure Financing Authority, and the provision of provincially subsidized lending through this body will provide additional benefits to the province's municipal sector."

For the same reason, on October 28 Moody's also raised the debt rating for the city of North Bay two notches, from BAA1 to A2, stating, "The upgrade reflects the recent provincial announcement regarding financial support for municipal infrastructure projects." I am sure the member from Nipissing, who is here with us this evening, will be happy to know that the city of North Bay's rating has been improved.

This act, if approved, will allow the province to put in place the measures that will continue to lead the province on the road to prosperity. On this road, we will continue investing in the infrastructure on which our quality of life depends—highways, transit, universities and colleges, hospitals, water systems, and community facilities—through SuperBuild, the Ontario organization that invests in all the infrastructure projects in the province on behalf of the province. SuperBuild was created to make these investments and is playing an important role by coordinating capital investments in Ontario and promoting new projects that build for the future.

SuperBuild Corp's role is also to identify needed investments and develop new partnerships to ensure that taxpayer dollars go further. To build working partnerships, SuperBuild taps into the management experience and creativity found in the private sector and encourages pooling of these resources with public sector expertise and needs. Investments are extensive. SuperBuild has committed to investing at least $20 billion of public and private investments in infrastructure over five years. This is the largest infrastructure building program of its kind in the history of the province.

SuperBuild investments cross all sectors of the economy: renewing and building new hospitals, improving highways, expanding sports and recreational facilities, upgrades to water and waste water infrastructure, colleges and universities and more.

I had the opportunity to be at the original announcement in the Port Carling arena for a SuperBuild sports-cultural tourism partnership announcement. Then, just a month or so ago, I was there for the grand opening. The minister who administers that program, Tim Hudak, is here with us this evening as well. I was very pleased to be there at the opening. That was a small investment, relative to the grand scheme of things, but certainly appreciated in the village of Port Carling, where the arena received some major upgrades: new change rooms, new lighting, handicap-accessible ramps into the arena and handicap-accessible washrooms—very worthwhile investments. You certainly see on the local level how important these SuperBuild investments are to the people when you are able to be as lucky as I was to be there for the announcement and the grand opening.

Our infrastructure investment means that the people of Ontario will have the services they need, where and when they need them. These investments will ensure that our communities have the foundations to promote new growth and new jobs.

Other SuperBuild investments in the riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka include the Muskoka wharf project, a significant investment for the province of Ontario. It's an important project for the whole riding, as Gravenhurst is established as the Gateway to the North with the Muskoka wharf project. There is significant private money invested in that project, about $20 million, as Gravenhurst rebuilds the waterfront. There's also the Rosseau waterfront project, another recently approved SuperBuild project, which is going to revitalize the village of Rosseau, another beautiful village in my riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka. I encourage anybody here to come and visit sometime when they get an opportunity to come the beautiful riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka, a haven for tourism, I might add.

This act, Keeping the Promise for a Strong Economy Act (Budget Measures), 2002, advances our commitment to growth and prosperity in Ontario. The act, if passed, will continue to make important but long-overdue investments in our infrastructure to meet the needs of a population that is changing with new growth and technology. Through SuperBuild and its partners, the province will stimulate local economies, improve the quality of life in our communities and create construction-related jobs in every area of the province.

To date, SuperBuild and its partners have committed to invest over $13 billion in more than 3,300 projects. In the 2002 budget, the Minister of Finance announced an allocation of $2.7 billion for infrastructure investments. These important investments include $1 billion for highways. Certainly I see significant investment in Highway 69. I hear the member from Sudbury, just about every day, talking about Highway 69. Meanwhile, the government continues to invest record amounts of money on Highway 69. There is unbelievable construction in the Parry Sound area as work continuously goes on. It was happening just about night and day all last winter.

Mr AL McDonald (Nipissing): What about Highway 11?

Mr Miller: And also on Highway 11, the member for Nipissing points out. He recently opened a new section at Trout Creek, the new Trout Creek bypass, seven kilometres there, and I was just north of Huntsville opening a new 13-kilometre section between Melissa and Emsdale—significant improvements. There are now just 47 kilometres on Highway 11 between Toronto and North Bay left to be completed in the next eight years. I know some people think eight years is a long time, but it's really quite an aggressive timetable, with about $35 million a year being invested on Highway 11 alone. It's really quite an aggressive timetable when you look at all that's involved in acquiring property and all the design work that goes into building a new highway. We are committed to finishing that as off, as the member for Nipissing points out.

The minister also announced $342 million to build or expand hospitals and other health care infrastructure in communities across Ontario. Of course there will be a new hospital in Parry Sound, an over-$60-million project. The request for tenders has gone out and the full construction is going to be starting in the spring. There are long-term-care facilities being built all around my riding and all around the province as the 20,000 new beds are being created around the province.

Mr McDonald: A $200-million hospital in Nipissing.

Mr Miller: A $200-million hospital in Nipissing, the member for Nipissing points out; $143 million for the renewal and construction of courts and jails; $135 million for projects to improve and modernize cultural and tourism facilities.

Construction will begin this year on a number of major highway projects in the GTA to address gridlock and improve safety. I think that's very important. Safety is certainly important, and addressing gridlock is important to the economy of this province and also to the environment. Cars stuck in traffic jams are very significant, even when there's a reduction in speed on the highways from 80 to 60 kilometres an hour. I understand the pollution level just about doubles with a reduction of speed, so when a car is not moving, of course its pollution level is significant.

We've also moved forward with upgrades to our major highways, and this includes improvements on Highways 7, 400, 401, 427 and the QEW. As part of Ontario's Smart Growth strategy, the province is also preparing Ontario's transportation network to support economic and population growth expected over the next 15 years. There will be a new highway connecting with Highway 427 north of Highway 7. We will extend the 404, establishing a Bradford bypass, and Highway 407 east to Highway 35. I think it's very important that we're making these investments, because for many years there haven't been the investments necessary in Ontario's highways.

As a northern member and as the PA to the Minister of Northern Development and Mines, I'm happy to say that we have not left out the north. I'm very proud of the investments we've been making in the north. To help boost efficiency in transportation and the economy of the north, we are continuing with major highway projects in the north this year, including highway rehabilitation and safety projects and major expansion in four-lane projects on Highways 11, 17 and 69. I know the minister was recently up making announcements to do with highway safety improvements on 69 south of Sudbury and also on Highway 17. This year we're investing a record, I believe, $250 million in northern highways. There have been significant improvements in northern highways in the last number of years.

We also support municipal road infrastructure, including investments through the connecting links program, the Ontario small town and rural development program—OSTAR—and millennium partnerships initiatives. I had the pleasure of going to Manitoulin Island to take part in a connecting links program announcement earlier in the year.

The government has been listening to Ontarians and making key infrastructure investments in people's priorities. The Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care will increase capital investment in hospitals and the health care system to a total of $342 million. Hospitals and other health care providers will be able to continue to modernize, upgrade and expand their infrastructure and services across the province.

As you can see, these investments are very diverse in nature. But despite our large investments, significant infrastructure needs remain, leading us to increasingly look at public-private partnerships. To be successful, we will need to find new, creative means of financing and managing our infrastructure. That's why we are looking at new ways of investing capital to develop and maintain the infrastructure that would promote economic development.

We, like many other levels of government, are turning to public-private partnerships to provide public infrastructure and related services. What makes public-private partnerships in infrastructure development work is that all partners are entitled to the rewards associated with such partnerships, but at the same time they agree to share potential risks.

The Keeping the Promise for a Strong Economy Act, 2002, supports communities and the government's role with public-private partnerships to improve infrastructure and services for the people of Ontario. For example, two hospitals are now undergoing public-private pilot projects, or P3 projects as they're called, to assist the government and the hospitals to understand how to best apply partnership models that have been successful in other jurisdictions.

As part of the evaluation and approval process, the hospitals and the province will ensure that the partnerships deliver better value for money than the traditional government top-down approach. Our key objective is to use private sector expertise to design, build and maintain the new facilities efficiently, quickly and within budget.

There are many examples of partnerships in Ontario, including the Art Gallery of Hamilton, with a contribution of $2.5 million from Dofasco; the Canadian Opera House, with $20 million from Four Seasons; Variety Village, to which McDonald's and the Royal Bank each offered to contribute $1 million; and, as I previously mentioned, Muskoka wharf, where there's $20 million being invested privately in an exciting new tourism waterfront development.

P3s, or public-private partnerships, have been involved in services from a water treatment plant in Goderich to the replacement of the Rossland Road grade separation in Whitby to the relocation of the University of Waterloo School of Architecture. We are grateful to have such P3 success stories as examples of how these partners brought their expertise to meet defined public need and shared the risk and rewards to the benefit of taxpayers.

We encourage partnerships in all areas, but in particular we call on a demonstration of federal support for municipalities through the provision of tax exemptions to investors in opportunity bonds and a capital injection in OMEIFA by the federal government. As I previously mentioned, that point was raised at the tax consultations in Parry Sound, which I attended.

By supporting the initiatives in this important act, we demonstrate that we are indeed committed to putting the right fundamentals in place for continued growth and prosperity.

I think the government is on the right track, and this bill is helping to keep the government on the right track.

The Acting Speaker: Questions or comments?

Mr Michael Gravelle (Thunder Bay-Superior North): It was very interesting listening to the member from Parry Sound-Muskoka in a number of areas. I could go on about a lot of them, but I'd like to focus on one thing he was talking about, which was the funding the government is putting into highways in the province. He made specific reference to the north, and I thought it was interesting, from the perspective of a member from northwestern Ontario, that he made reference to no highway work in northwestern Ontario. The reason for that is because the fact is that northwestern Ontario, in terms of the northern highway budget, gets far less than its fair share. We consistently get less than 25% of the budget.

There are a number of extraordinarily important projects that must move forward on the rehabilitation side. I think of the Highway 584 project between Geraldton and Nakina, an extraordinarily dangerous piece of road that has had increased use because of the Nakina Forest Products development. It's a road that now is truly dangerous, and it should be an absolute priority—no funding for that this year.

But there are some larger projects that we think are really important as well. The member made no reference to them, because clearly we're not getting support for them at this point; that is, the four-laning also between Thunder Bay and Nipigon. We've seen the traffic increase dramatically, we've seen the volume of transports increase dramatically and we've seen many accidents and some fatalities in those areas, and also, may I say, toward Vermilion Bay in northwestern Ontario toward Manitoba.

It's disturbing to once again have to alert the House that our part of the province is being ignored. It was significant, for example, that when the Minister of Northern Development and Mines came to the northwest to announce highway improvements, he went to Hudson, Ontario. There was some rehabilitation work around there. He didn't even come near the Thunder Bay area to make those announcements, and we understood why. Because there was nothing to announce in all the Thunder Bay district. This is of very great concern to all of us: to the Northwestern Ontario Municipal Association, to the chambers of commerce and to the constituents who have to drive those roads.

Mr Christopherson: Interesting comments from the member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. I'm not sure he made any reference at all to the pension changes—forgive me, I was distracted for part of his remarks—but if he did, I'm willing to bet there wasn't a whole lot said, and likely there wasn't anything said.

We're not going to let go of this issue. You're just not going to do this to people who are relying on pensions to be there for their retirement years without one hell of a fight. That's the reality of this. They've told me—the closest they came was the member for London West, who tried to say we didn't give enough substantive arguments, we didn't have lawyers, documents and everything.

Interjection.

Mr Christopherson: Oh, hang on. You had your chance and you didn't say anything of any note.

The fact of the matter is that the proof is right there in the bill. There are 30 separate parts to this bill. Most of them relate in some way to budget bills or things that are impacted by the budget. I refer to things like the Assessment Act, the Business Corporations Act, Commodity Futures Act, Community Small Business Investment Funds Act—the sorts of things you would expect to see in a bill that flows from a budget.

What you don't expect to see is part 25, the Pension Benefits Act. But what does the explanatory note say about this? "Amendments to the Pension Benefits Act relate to the payment of surplus out of pension plans, the authority of employers to take contribution holidays and the authority of the superintendent to permit refunds to be made to employers in specified circumstances." My remarks are about how that small little thing called "specified circumstances" is being ripped open to make it nice and easy to get in there with big paws and take out huge chunks of money. That's what's going on.

Mr McDonald: It's my pleasure to join the debate. I listened very closely to the hard-working member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. He was dealing with SuperBuild issues and issues that are close to the heart in northern Ontario. We're referred to as the two northern guys on this side of the House, and I just want to tell the residents of northern Ontario that we're standing up and fighting for you.

I find it very interesting, the member for Thunder Bay-Superior North and the honourable member for Sudbury speaking to Highway 69 in the House every day. I congratulate them for sticking up for their area. But I must say, and this is before their time, that when the official opposition was in power, they averaged $5 million a year on northern highways, and they're blaming us for the highway not being four-laned today. It's interesting that we're averaging $30 million to $35 million a year. So this government does have the best interests of northern Ontario at heart. It's investing six times what your party invested in northern Ontario. So when you stand up and say how bad we are, maybe you should look in the mirror.

I was very pleased to be part of the announcement of our $200-million hospital in North Bay, the $11-million hospital in Mattawa and the four-laning of Highway 11; I think there's about 47 kilometres. This government is doing a lot for northern Ontario. I would just ask the members across, where were they when your party was in power and you did nothing for northern Ontario?

Mr Duncan: I'm pleased to have the opportunity to respond to my colleague from Parry Sound-Muskoka. I just want to remind him that he didn't talk about what the main points of Bill 198 are.

First of all, this legislation delays the government's planned cuts to personal income taxes and corporate income taxes, and the private school tax credit. Bravo. You couldn't afford these anyway. This is a retreat from the very fundamentals of your own policy, which we in the official opposition said would happen. Now it's happening.

And what is the guise for this? I have to quote here. The government says it's delaying the cuts due to a "short-term fiscal problem," and is planning to sell $1.8 billion in assets. What do those assets include? Hydro One: a fire sale of this province's electricity grid, the crown jewel of our public infrastructure. You're going to sell it at fire sale rates because of your bungling of the entire hydro file. You're going to give it away in an attempt to raise cash to meet a commitment this government made which it cannot keep. You were warned you could not keep this commitment, and now you must back down on the centrepiece of Mike Harris's political career, the Taxpayer Protection Act. This shows that act for what it was: phony. The first time they get into any difficulty, they just amend it out of existence. It was all talk. You're backtracking, flip-flopping, double flipping on this, just like you did on hydro. I'd like to hear the member for Parry Sound-Muskoka talk about those issues.

The Acting Speaker: Response?

Mr Miller: I'd like to thank the member for Thunder Bay-Superior North for his comments. He made some comments to do with northern highways. I'd just like to reiterate that we are making record investments. The member for Nipissing also talked about investments in northern highways. He said $30 million to $35 million a year. That's just for Highway 11, member for Nipissing. I understand he is interested in that. The actual investment is about $250 million a year, a record investment. So you don't want to go anywhere near comparing your record to current spending on northern highways, because this government has been making a very significant investment.

The member for Hamilton West talked about pension surplus reforms. He's scaremongering, in my books. It's really about ensuring the long-term financial viability of these pension funds. If I had time, I'd go through many different points on that, but I don't have time in the next two minutes. What we're talking about in terms of the pension surplus reforms is ensuring there is money there for the future for all those people who are going to be depending on it, and I think that's the responsible thing to be doing.

The member for Windsor-St Clair talked about tax cuts. That's very interesting, the Liberal Party that voted against every tax cut that has occurred in the last seven years—

Interjection.

Mr Miller: You did, yes, and those resulted in an extra $15 billion that we've used now to invest in hospitals and highways, in lots of good things people want in this province that came about because we provided those tax cuts so that the people of this province could use their hard-earned money to invest and spend wisely, as only those who work hard for the money know how to do. So I don't think the member for Windsor-St Clair should be talking about tax cuts.

The Acting Speaker: Further debate?

Mrs Lyn McLeod (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): I welcome an opportunity to contribute to this debate on Bill 198.

The first thing that strikes me is that once again this government has fulfilled its commitment to find the most creative possible names for its acts, names that in fact camouflage the real intent of the acts. Bill 198 has been given the title, I believe, of Keeping the Promise for a Strong Economy. I think Bill 198 would be more appropriately named something like the Breaking Promises Because of a Desperate Need for Economic and Fiscal Band-Aids Act, because that would more truly represent the contents of this omnibus bill.

I want to address a few of the ways in which this government, in its desperate search for Band-Aids, has reached out to alter what from the very beginning was a disastrous fiscal and economic policy.

First of all, there's the fact that they are going to delay their $2.2-billion corporate tax cut, a corporate tax cut that we have said all along this government cannot afford, this province cannot afford, and in fact this province doesn't need, even in the interests of the competition the government gives as its reason for bringing it forward. We don't need it for competitive purposes. As my colleague from Scarborough-Agincourt has said over and over again, we are already 25% below the American jurisdictions. How far below them do we have to be to consider ourselves competitive? We don't need it for competition's sake, and we certainly cannot afford it.

As my colleague from Windsor-St Clair has just said, the government is delaying this corporate tax cut for a year because they have a short-term fiscal problem. I don't think it's just a small problem and I don't think it's very short-term.

We know that one thing the government thought they could do was solve this short-term fiscal problem with a quick fire sale of Hydro One, as my colleague has just noted. They've had to backtrack a little bit on how they were going to get some quick cash from selling off our electricity transmission system, probably the most vital cog in ensuring reliable and affordable electricity to homes and businesses in this province. The keystone of our economic growth is electricity that is reliable and affordable. The transmission system is the key to that, and this government was prepared to sell off the whole thing, Mike Harris's parting contribution to the province of Ontario.

Ernie Eves was quite prepared to go along with that. As I recall, he was quite prepared to go along with it right up until I think it was the day before he was facing a very angry electorate in the riding for which he was seeking to become the new member. The day before the by-election he announced that he wasn't going to sell Hydro One after all, that it was off the table. It kind of calmed the voters in that new riding long enough to get Mr Eves a seat in the House. Once Mr Eves got a seat in the House, suddenly the sale of Hydro One was back on the table. But it wasn't quite a complete and total flip-flop because—

Mr Duncan: He changed his mind again?

Mrs McLeod: He changed his mind again, but not quite totally—49%. I didn't understand how this government could possibly rationalize in the name of a one-time-only cash infusion—I know they desperately need it—selling off this most important public asset. I have no idea why they think selling off 49% does anything for the economy, for the long-term fiscal health of this province or for the people who need access to electricity in a way that is reliable and affordable, how selling off 49% possibly serves that purpose. It is there purely and simply because the government is desperate for cash.

So much of what this government does in a desperate reaction to try to fix up the messes it has made, the crises it has created—and over and over again we see crises this government has created. The long-term consequences of what they do to fix the messes they created are truly disastrous for this province.

This is the same government that last May 1, Mr Eves being relatively newly elected, having retreated somewhat from Mr Harris's rush to sell off Hydro One—although, as we've seen, he came back to it again—Mr Eves decided he would just continue and rush right along into deregulation. What did we have over the course of the summer? We had electricity retailers, like Direct Energy which knocked on my door one Saturday morning and wanted me to sign a fixed contract for electricity for six cents a kilowatt hour, signing up thousands of Ontarians who were justifiably worried about what was going to happen to the price of electricity and who were prepared to sign, with Direct Energy and others, a six cents per kilowatt hour contract.

The government realized that even six cents per kilowatt hour was leading to very significant increases in hydro bills for people across the province, so they decided last week that they would come out and cap rates at 4.3 cents, and now, I guess, one of our short-term and longer-term fiscal problems is going to be where we find the money to subsidize the difference between those six-cent, fixed-term contracts that this government was so anxious to see people sign—in fact the government's agency, the IMO, which regulates electricity, was encouraging people no less than three weeks ago to sign those fixed contracts at six cents a kilowatt hour because they thought that was the best deal they could get.

This government was out encouraging these fixed contracts. It decided it was going to cost a little bit too much so they decided to put this freeze on and now we're going to be subsidizing the private retailers that were so anxious to get out into the field.

It doesn't end there, and I'm just talking about the fiscal messes, the long-term economic consequences of the messes this government has created within the last couple of weeks. The government is now saying they're also going to have to subsidize the private sector to come in and build some new electricity, because they're not going to do it at 4.3 cents a kilowatt hour, and they know we need some more generation, more electricity. So they're going to subsidize the private producers.

Once upon a time in this province we talked about something called power at cost. We saw electricity as being a public good. We thought it was important that we be able to ensure that people were paying what was necessary to ensure they had the electricity, but not exorbitant costs. I don't know any longer what power at cost truly is because this same government, this Harris-Eves government that absolutely abandoned it—was it a five-month electricity policy?

Mr Duncan: Five months.

Mrs McLeod: Abandoned it after five months, having created absolute chaos. This government that has now brought in price caps is the same Harris-Eves government that brought in price fixes in order to win an election in 1995. Mike Harris and Ernie Eves ran on a platform of no increases in hydro rates—freeze hydro rates.

The Minister of Energy said one true thing somewhere in the last four, five or six weeks of debate in this House about electricity. He said Ontarians haven't been paying the full cost of electricity. The reason that is a true thing is because his government froze the rates for six years. They froze the rates for six years, so in fact we're paying the costs of the electricity we were consuming.

But then the answer to all the problems in electricity was going to be to sell off all our generation to the private sector, because in their market-sector-economy minds, private sector competition is what will bring the price down. But to sell off our public assets, they had to make sure they weren't going to be too expensive to the private sector. That's a different kind of fire sale. So they just said, "The taxpayer will absorb the indebtedness of the assets that Hydro, Ontario Power Generation is about to sell." So in addition to the increased rates we're seeing as a result of the government's deregulation, we are also seeing the debt charge added to our hydro bills. This government rolled all of these costs on to the backs of hydro users all at once. They realized it was not sustainable, they changed their policy, and now we will face the fiscal and economic consequences of that.

That's just one of the reasons why we can't afford a $2.2-billion tax cut. I have had some involvement in health issues in the last little while, and I certainly want to address the fact that this government can't afford to put $2.2 billion into a corporate tax cut that we don't need for competition when our vital health services are being absolutely strangled for lack of funding. Just this week, I say to the Minister of Health, who has joined us in the House, as he well knows, the hospitals of Ontario have said to him, "We are insolvent, on the verge of bankruptcy. We're in debt. We have deficits. We can't afford to keep running with the funding we're getting"—hospitals of this province insolvent. That's just one health issue.

Home care rationed: there aren't waiting lists in home care. I do want to acknowledge that. The waiting list for home care disappeared when this government decided to replace those CCAC directors and board members who were complaining about the fact that they didn't have enough money to provide adequate numbers of hours of home care. So the waiting list disappeared and so did the ability to get even the rationed number of hours of home care to people who needed that support.

Or we could talk about long-term care. What was the title of this bill again? Keeping the Promise for a Strong Economy? Ontario, which brags about having a strong economy, has the lowest number of nursing hours per capita in our long-term-care homes of any province, in fact of most jurisdictions that have been surveyed, whether in the United States or in Europe, let alone in Canada. For shame, in a province that supposedly has a strong economy as we speak.

Mental health: the stories yesterday about the fact that a government that said it wasn't going to close psychiatric beds simply isn't funding the hospitals to keep the beds open, to hire the staff, to keep those beds open, so we have more people with psychiatric illness inappropriately in our jails than we've ever had before.

Physician shortages: about a year ago we were worried about the fact that there were 109 communities in the province of Ontario that didn't have enough family doctors, that were underserved for family doctors. It's 122 now. It just keeps getting worse and worse and worse. The government keeps talking about what it's going to do, keeps announcing plans, but doesn't get any new people out there. It doesn't actually get people out into the field to make sure Ontarians can have a family doctor.

The list goes on and on. My colleague the member for St Catharines this afternoon raised again in the Legislature the issue of Visudyne. We worked so hard to get this government to recognize the fact they need to put some dollars toward the prevention of blindness in people with wet form macular degeneration. Finally the government said "We hear. We're going to act on it"—only you have to have a 50% vision loss, you have to be half blind, before you actually get the support. In the province of Ontario, under the Harris-Eves government, we don't have a strong enough economy left to actually be able to keep people from going blind in this province.

I could go on and on and on about health care, but I do want to get into the fact that one of the other things touched on in this bill is that they're going to delay the private school tax credit.

Interjection.

The Acting Speaker: Order. Member for Peterborough, the minister, I'm warning you. Any more interventions, and you're gone.

Mrs McLeod: I'd be happy to give the minister a late show, Mr Speaker.

The private school tax credit is being delayed, not cancelled, even though Mr. Eves has called it ludicrous. That was before he became Premier, I guess. Things change once you assume the responsibilities of office, I gather.

The private school tax credit is being delayed. This is one which should be cancelled. It should be cancelled, not just because we cannot afford the $500 million that they're going to put into the private schools at the expense of public school education. This private school tax credit should be cancelled because it is being put in place, when the government brings it forward, at the very time when private schools are being flooded with people coming in, with children being transferred out of the public system to the private system—not because of their religious preferences. This has nothing to do with religious choices. This has to do with people flooding into private schools, away from the public education system, because they don't want their children in crowded classrooms, they don't want their children in classrooms that don't have enough textbooks, they don't want children with special needs in classrooms where they're not getting the support they need.

Those are the issues that need to be addressed, issues of underfunding of public education, crowded classrooms, no textbooks, no special ed, not enough support for extracurricular activities that are so important a part of a full education. Those are the issues this government should address, not putting $500 million into a tax cut.

This is an omnibus bill. I'm inclined to spend most of my time on the issues that I care rather a lot about, which are health care and education in particular, but there are some things I want to note about the fact that it's an omnibus bill. There's so much here that could be addressed.

Tax incentive zones: I find this one really ironic. I know there are some, in my experience, large and fairly well-to-do municipalities that have pushed for tax incentive zones in the past. The way this is presented in this bill is that this is an offering from the government, an offering from the government to municipalities that don't have a strong economic base to allow them to offer some tax incentives, that by offering lower-tax incentives, maybe they can induce businesses to come to their community to build a stronger economy in their community. After all, this bill is about strong economies.

The reason I find this so ironic is because this is the same government that has downloaded cost after cost after cost on to those same municipalities. I just finished writing a letter to the Minister of Health which I hope he'll respond to, because it relates to a letter that was written to him in May of this year, some five months ago, from the Rainy River district services area board about the cost of ambulances. This is an area board, with small municipalities, just the kind of municipalities that I guess are supposed to be helped by this tax incentive. Well, they're small municipalities that also have to provide ambulance service in unorganized townships. Mr Speaker, you know about unorganized townships. It appears the Ministry of Health doesn't. They're not providing the funding that they're supposed to provide to allow the Rainy River district services area board to pay the ambulance cost to serve the unorganized territories. I hope the Minister of Health will finally respond to a letter that was written to him five months ago and resolve that particular dilemma.

But the dilemmas of the municipalities go on and on: downloaded costs not just for ambulances but for social housing; I've discovered it has also downloaded costs for second-stage housing for women who are the victims of violence; downloaded costs for water infrastructure. And don't recite to me all the things that SuperBuild is going to do to help municipalities with the water infrastructure when in fact we've got a bill that says they're going to have to recover the full cost of that by charging people more for it.

This government has made life almost impossible for municipalities, and now they come and offer them a gift out of the goodness of their hearts. They offer them the gift of being able to allow for lower property taxes in order to build their economic base. It reminds me a little bit of the gift they were going to offer municipalities in another omnibus bill, the very first bill, I think Bill 26, the bully bill. One of the things that was in that original bully bill was a head tax. They were going to let municipalities charge a head tax to solve their economic woes. I suspect the municipalities might welcome that now, with all the downloading that has gone in the past few years since the bully bill was presented.

I have a real problem with omnibus bills. I'm not going to be able to deal with my problems in the last two and a half minutes I have. There is just so much in this bill. It should not be presented as one, large omnibus bill. I'm beginning to think this government only knows about omnibus bills. It's not just that we can't deal with everything in the course of the debate of the evening, of the day. It's because the omnibus bills—the parts we miss, the parts we couldn't debate, the parts that the public wasn't aware of—come back to haunt us. One example from that first omnibus Bill 26, a little clause in there that said that the manager of OHIP was given the authority to withhold payments from physicians for services that had been rendered in their office. Well, that little clause wasn't acted on for a while, but now we are seeing it used in a way which can only be described as a very arbitrary and very deliberate attempt to grab cash from physicians who have in fact provided services, like the family doctor, the more senior family doctor in Brantford who was told he had to repay government because he was making too many house calls, because he was making more than the average number of house calls. This man actually believed in house calls. It's pretty easy to make more than the average number of house calls. I suspect if you make two house calls a week you are over the average number of house calls. But this government somehow thought that they could let the manager of OHIP just go and get money back to solve their short-term fiscal problems, I guess, by setting these arbitrary measures in place, result of one earlier omnibus bill.

I think there are many results that we are going to see over a continuing basis from this omnibus bill. My colleagues have addressed the pension issue. That alone should be the subject of an individual debate. I've heard questions in this House over the last two days. I've heard the Minister of Finance say, "No, this is not going to affect pensions," but my understanding of it is that the Conrad Black clause in this bill, as it has come to be known, is certainly going to affect what might be the pensions of people, if employees were given a fair shot to share some of those surpluses—one more issue that won't get adequately debated.

I wish I had time to get into the subject of P3s, private hospitals—the only justification? You don't show the funding on the books—just one of the tricks that the government is going to use to hide what is in fact not just a short-term fiscal problem that can't be solved with one-time cash fire sales, but long-term fiscal problems which they are going to use the next budget to bury in every way possible, just as they are using the omnibus bill to bury the consequences of the measures they've presented tonight.

Mr Christopherson: I knew the member couldn't sit down without having raised the issue of the pensions. I want to compliment the member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan for all of her remarks, but I want to come back to that pension issue. The government so far, especially one of the government members heckling earlier, was talking about the fact that there's no substance to this, that it's opposition rhetoric. Let me tell you, I have a letter from Mr David Hitchcock who is a professor of philosophy, McMaster University in my riding. He says, in part: "I am concerned that Bill 198 permits surplus withdrawals without regard to any 'pension plan document, statute or rule of law' and leaves approval of surplus withdrawals to the superintendent of pensions."

In fact, the criteria for the superintendent's approval are to be set out in a regulation that your government has yet to make public. Now, in case somebody who's a professor of philosophy isn't quite, you know, where you are in terms of opinions that matter, how about a professor of economics from McMaster University. He says, "Our university pension plan has been the subject of much litigation over pension surpluses and ultimately we able to reach an agreement with the university under the law as it stood prior to Bill 198. This litigation would have continued for years were it not for the legislation which encouraged agreements between employers and employees." That's Mr Andrew Muller, a professor of economics, McMaster University.

Now, let's turn to the bill. The bill makes it clear that what was once the order of the Supreme Court of Canada, which required consideration of all relevant documents and the application of relevant trust law principles—that's what the Supreme Court said. What do you say? You say, in part 25, Payments to Employers, 67.2 (4), "An employer may apply to the Superintendent for payment of an amount described ... and the application must include such information and documents as may be prescribed," by the government."

Mr R. Gary Stewart (Peterborough): I really wanted to stand up and just make a couple of comments. I listened very carefully to the member from Thunder Bay-Atikokan, and I'm absolutely disgusted with some of the comments that were made when she would have the audacity to suggest that our government is letting people go blind. If you don't think I know a little bit about that subject, my family and my wife have that disease, so don't ever suggest in this House that we are letting people go blind, because you know that treatment can only be done at certain times; it can only be done when one or two of the situations of the disease are at the right time to do it.

The other thing that really interested me was that, well, we're deciding that we're not going to continue with the tax cuts and we're deciding that we're not going to do something else. I want to ask them over there if they've ever decided this year to buy a car and all of a sudden decided, "I don't really have the money. I may have to defer it to next year, or I may have to defer it for six months." I would say either one of you over there would have done that within the last five years. That's what you call good management. That's what you call being in business. You folks spent money like the usual folks that sail the seas, with no thought of making sure you were doing it the right way. Yet you will stand in this House and make the comments that you do. Facts make no suggestion they should be right. Some of the words that you say, I'm disgusted—

The Acting Speaker: Thank you. Questions or comments?

Mr Duncan: This is not about a six-month delay. This is about a government that sold its very soul. You were warned about it. You were warned every step of the way.

Let me address a few other issues, because what you say—and my colleague from Thunder Bay-Atikokan is absolutely right—is this is a short-term fiscal problem and you're going to sell $1.8 billion in assets, including Hydro One. The Minister of Education said during the leadership that your hydro policy was wrong. The now Minister of the Environment said during the leadership that your tax cuts were wrong and shouldn't go forward. Let's talk about health care accountability because that has been totally lacking.

Hon Elizabeth Witmer (Deputy Premier, Minister of Education): Mr Speaker, on a point of order: My comments on this issue were that I had heard—

The Acting Speaker: That's not a point of order.

Mr Duncan: My colleague is absolutely right.

I listened very carefully, not to anyone on this side of the House, not to a federal cabinet official, but to a former Premier saying that provinces need to be held to account on health care spending, because this government has taken money that should have been properly spent on health care and given it to tax cuts. Now they're delaying that. That's not me. That's Roy Romanow.

I look forward to the day that governments like this will be truly held to account on health care spending. I look forward to a government whose priorities won't be tax cuts for corporations but will be for Visudyne for patients before they lose half their sight as my colleague has cited here. I look forward to a day when parents are not fleeing the public system in record numbers and want to keep their kids in public schools because there are adequate teachers, there are adequate textbooks and they're not starved for funds while we reach out and give yet more handouts to our corporate buddies in a climate where we're already competitive. My colleague from Thunder Bay-Atikokan—I'm proud of her and proud of her record and her service to this Legislature.

Hon Robert W. Runciman (Minister of Public Safety and Security): Mr Speaker, I apologize for coming late into the conversation but hearing the member from Windsor make comments about the distribution of monies from the provincial government that we've received from the federal government, I think we should reference the study done by the Ontario Hospital Association with respect to equalization indicating, I think all of us understand, that there are only two "have" provinces left in this country, Alberta and Ontario.

Ontario is making a significant contribution. If you look at the Ontario Hospital Association study, well over $200 billion a year comes out of taxpayers in Ontario to support programs in every other province of this country. I think Ontario citizens are great Canadians. We support this country and we support keeping this country as a united country. But we have close to 100 federal Liberal members in Parliament representing Ontario. Ontario is being shortchanged through this confederation by the Liberal government in Ottawa. We are not getting our fair share.

I think if you look at this picture—this is an objective study done by the Ontario Hospital Association—if we look at what monies are coming back to this province to support health care, to support education, to support all the important programs that Ontarians care about, we are not getting our fair share from Ottawa. If this member really cared about his province, he would be standing up on his two feet this evening, and on other days, other weeks, other months, and calling on his federal colleagues to recognize the real interests, the real concerns of this province and make sure we are treated fairly by the federal government of Canada, the federal Liberal government of Canada.

The Acting Speaker: Response?

Mrs McLeod: I appreciate the contributions of all the members to my comments in this debate. Let me just say there are a few points I'd like to take up. I'm going to resist the temptation to pick up on the age-old battle of what proportion of funding for health care is coming from the federal government versus the provincial government, particularly when I'm doing battle with a government that I think at one point wanted to move strictly to tax points so that they could have complete flexibility to manage their health care budget. Now they simply ignore the tax points because they want to see it in cold, hard cash, which they still won't be accountable for, as we have seen in a number of areas, like the child care transfers and the millennium scholarships transfers, which this government simply swallowed up.

I particularly want to come back to a couple of things the member from Peterborough said—deferring the cost of a car. My goodness, if there's any government that has mastered the deferral of long-term costs to future taxpayers, it is this government. The member from Parry Sound-Muskoka talked with pride about P3s, private-public partnerships, the new jargon. "Private-public partnership" basically means a way of getting the private sector to put the capital funding in so that the government doesn't have to put it in, and they then pay for it over a long period of time, like a mortgage or a car payment.

When it comes to hospitals, the only advantage that anybody has been able to find for P3s is the fact that it is off-book and doesn't look like government debt, because this government is not prepared to openly acknowledge what the costs are of the promises they're making to the people of Ontario, like private MRIs, like private CTs. Where communities have been earning the capital costs for those, now the minister wants to put them in private clinics, where he will pay for the capital costs through long-term operating.

I have lost my time to respond with facts on the issue of Visudyne. This government defends its policy by saying the federal government has guidelines for the use of Visudyne. There are no guidelines from the federal government that justify this government's policy of saying you have to lose 50% of your vision—

The Acting Speaker: Thank you. Further debate? I would remind members now that the time for speeches is 10 minutes.

Mrs Munro: The legislation in the Keeping the Promise for a Strong Economy Act (Budget Measures), 2002, which pertains to consumer protection, is about important and positive changes that will benefit every investor and taxpayer in Ontario. Ontarians have told us that they are concerned about the security of their investments. They are worried about the recent uncertainty in the financial markets of the United States and are wondering if the major accounting scandals that have rocked the economy in that country could happen here.

Our government shares their concerns and we are prepared to act. While we already have a number of tougher investor protection rules than our neighbours in the US, we think we can do more to protect investors here in Ontario. We are committed to protecting consumers and protecting the integrity of Ontario's markets. This is an era in which trust is important, an era in which corporations and governments alike must ensure transparency and accountability regarding their actions. We do need a balanced, made-in-Ontario approach, an approach that protects our consumers and investors and maintains the competitive position of our businesses and markets.

Effective capital markets are important to our businesses in Ontario. Effective markets provide our businesses with capital on competitive terms so that they can grow and create new jobs. Ontario must continue to be competitive. We must ensure we are taking steps so that our province is attractive to business, that we continue to promote growth and prosperity.

Ontario has already taken some important steps. For example, for a long time public companies in Canada have been required to tell their investors about material changes right away. Furthermore, we have been taking steps in recent years to protect Ontario investors, building on our strong record of investor protection balanced with a competitive market. In 1997, the Ontario Securities Commission was reorganized and put on a self-funding basis, allowing it to add needed staff in key areas such as enforcement. In 2000, the Ontario Securities Commission implemented a comprehensive program for reviewing continuous disclosure statements provided by issuers. Its target is to review issuers with Ontario head offices once every four years. In fact, in August of this year the OSC announced additional resources for this program so that by the end of this year, 2002, the OSC will have completed its review of the disclosure of all Ontario-based companies ranked in the top 100 Toronto Stock Exchange companies. Also in 2000, the RCMP and OSC Joint Securities Intelligence Unit was formed to investigate securities fraud. These measures have given us a strong regulator with the tools needed to do the job and the ability to respond to changes in a rapidly moving marketplace.

Still, we are prepared to do more. The Keeping the Promise for a Strong Economy Act contains the reforms we need to protect Ontario investors and maintain a competitive marketplace. Our context is unique. In Ontario, much of our future prosperity will depend on the growth of small- and medium-sized businesses. We have to ensure that new measures, as they are implemented, are sensitive to the needs of our small- and medium-sized public companies.

I believe we can implement tougher measures to protect consumers and that our measures will be sensitive to the Canadian economy. When the people of Ontario put their hard-earned money into a mutual fund or stock or any other kind of investment, they're doing so to build a better future for themselves and their families. We believe they deserve to know that the government has set and enforced high standards so that they can make informed choices and invest with confidence.

Our government has always believed that taxpayers' dollars should be spent responsibly and with accountability, and we believe that corporations should operate on the same principle. We are being advised that we need tougher penalties in place for securities infractions and that we need to set high standards for public companies in order to protect public confidence while maintaining the competitiveness of our economy. We want to reform the Ontario Securities Act to achieve three objectives: (1) to ensure efficient, effective and fair capital markets; (2) to ensure the public receives timely, accurate information about their investments; and, finally, to ensure that we do not add unnecessary red tape, so that Ontario remains attractive for investment and our businesses remain competitive.

The Keeping the Promise for a Strong Economy Act (Budget Measures), 2002, proposes legislative changes to further protect Ontario investors and consumers. If approved, the measures for investor protection are:

(1) Establish new powers for the OSC to impose fines of up to $1 million for securities violations and order that the offenders give up the amounts they obtain from those violations;

(2) Increase the maximum court fines and prison terms for securities offences that would be among the toughest penalties in Canada. The maximum court fines for general offences would increase from $1 million to $5 million, and maximum prison terms would increase from two years to five years less a day.

(3) Provide greater clarification for offences such as securities fraud and market manipulation, and for making misleading or untrue statements.

We will also be introducing broader rights for investors to sue if companies make misleading or untrue statements or fail to give full and timely information.

I believe these are significant steps forward. By increasing maximum penalties and providing a clearer definition of offences, businesses will have a clearer idea of what is expected of them. The system will be fairer to businesses and it will be more transparent.

There are other proposed measures, as well, to ensure we have strong consumer protection. For example, we are proposing to provide the OSC with new powers to review the information that public companies provide to investors. The OSC will also get new rule-making powers to hold CEOs and CFOs accountable for the accuracy of their financial statements. We are also proposing reforms to Ontario's public accounting regulation to ensure tough standards that are internationally respected and reflect the high expectations of the business community, investors and our trading partners.

We have already taken a number of actions to reform the way government does business. We've brought in business planning, the public disclosure of salaries, agency reform and new conflict-of-interest rules for public servants and agency appointees. We are also taking steps to improve accountability in the government in protecting taxpayers' dollars, including a six-month review of government agencies and other public sector entities, to strengthen their governance and accountability. The review would also improve disclosure and reporting obligations. It would, for example, increase the quality and frequency of reporting or give the power to inspect the books. It would include enforcement with teeth to ensure compliance.

This is an ongoing process. We will continue to review these proposals with the experts to ensure that the reforms are effective. We will ensure the reforms work for Ontario. Obviously, there will be a need for ongoing consultations. These reforms will have a significant impact. We have to be certain they are implemented properly. For example, the new rule-making powers proposed for the OSC respond to laws in the US that already apply to Canadian companies listed on American exchanges. It makes sense that there be similar requirements for these companies in Canada. At the same time, we have to be sensitive to the issues faced by companies that aren't currently subject to these rules. This is one example of the need for further consultation.

There is also a need to consult on other matters. For example, we must continue to discuss some of the other proposals in the interim report of the committee conducting the five-year review of Ontario's securities laws. Some of those recommendations are far-reaching. We must take a serious look at these issues and determine if they are the best solution for Canadian markets. The government will do that, and we will respond quickly to the five-year review committee's final report. We will continue to be open to considering other investor protection measures. We will also continue to discuss the idea of moving towards national securities regulation.

Certainly, there are concerns with the current system, but the important point here is that this represents a commitment by the government to monitor to ensure that there is security around the investment and investors operating in this country and in this province. So we will continue to ensure that regulation meets the needs of both the investor and the companies making their investments here.

The Acting Speaker: It being 9:30 of the clock, this House stands adjourned until 1:30 of the clock tomorrow afternoon.

MEMBERS' STATEMENTS

NATURAL GAS RATES

Mr Rick Bartolucci (Sudbury): The Harris-Eves government must decide whether or not they are going to allow Union Gas to charge the one-million-plus customers the retroactive fee that they hope to be able to charge. This uncertainty is having a definite impact on seniors' ability to plan for the future. They don't know whether or not they are going to have a retroactive charge in January or February or March.

It's also having a very negative impact on small business in Ontario. In Sudbury alone, I've received copies of letters that Union Gas is sending out, stating that the one-time rate adjustment is going to vary. For example, in this business it's going to be $14,349. For that business, it's going to be $25,918. For another business, it's going to be $40,507.

The government has to act. There is an appeal before cabinet. Ernie Eves and the wishy-washy Tory government must make a decision. The decision is simple. Union Gas cannot be allowed to do what they want to do. For once in Ontario, stand up for the seniors of this province. For once in your history, stand up for small business. For once, I ask Ernie Eves, the wishy-washy Premier of this province, to take a stand.

KEN WHITE

Mrs Margaret Marland (Mississauga South): I am delighted to inform the members of this House that Ken White, the president and chief executive officer of the Trillium Health Centre, has won the hospital management category of Canada's Who's Who in Healthcare Awards. This award category recognizes an individual whose management performance has made an extraordinary contribution to the overall success of a hospital. The criteria are innovation, leadership, impact and overall contribution to the delivery of health care in Canada.

The fact that Trillium's board of directors and senior management team nominated Ken White for this recognition speaks volumes about the high regard in which Ken is held by both his staff and the community that Trillium serves.

I was honoured to be invited to submit an endorsement of Ken's nomination, and I was proud to do so. I have experienced first hand the skill with which he has piloted our community hospital through a major evolution. Since Ken's tenure at Trillium began in 1996, Trillium has undergone an amalgamation of two hospitals and opened several new services, including three major regional programs for stroke, advanced cardiac services and neuro/musculoskeletal. Trillium has also been named one of Canada's top 100 employers, a reflection of Ken's dedication to innovative employment practices.

I know the residents of Mississauga and Etobicoke join me in congratulating Ken White on this much-deserved award and in thanking him for his exemplary leadership of our community hospital.

HOME CARE AND EDUCATION FUNDING

Mrs Marie Bountrogianni (Hamilton Mountain): I have here 3,000 cards signed by seniors from across the Hamilton region protesting the cuts to long-term care and to home care. Let me read from one of the cards.

"Dear Minister:

"I am extremely distressed by the recent drastic cuts, especially in homemaking services, by the community care access centres, to seniors and people with disabilities living in their own homes. Most people want to stay at home, but now are unable to access required help. I dread the thought that I, or people I care about, may be forced to give up independence and move into a long-term-care facility. Homemaking is imperative for persons attempting to remain independent in their own homes because it provides them with a safe and clean environment. I urge you to reinstate adequate funding to provide the essential services as described in the Long-Term Care Act."

I have under 1,000 cards here signed by parents across the region protesting the cuts to education. I understand that adequate funding for our children's education is the responsibility of the government of the province of Ontario. I don't believe that the current funding benchmarks are reflective of current costs. I want the education funding gap addressed immediately.

What is the connection between the cards and the cost to education, and the cards and the cost to home care? It's Jim Murray, the same Tory-appointed supervisor who is cutting education in Hamilton, the same one who set the criteria, who cut the criteria, and fewer of our seniors are getting good quality home care in Hamilton.

Shame on you. The Tory-appointed axeman should be ashamed of himself.

we recognize that our children are our most precious resource and our hope for the future.

NATIONAL CHILD DAY

Mr Toby Barrett (Haldimand-Norfolk-Brant): Today marks National Child Day across Canada. It's my hope that on this day and throughout the year we all strive to make our corner of the world reflect one of this year's National Child Day themes, A World Fit for Children, a world where all children get the best possible start in life and where adolescents are given opportunities to develop their capacities in a safe and supportive environment.

In my home riding of Haldimand-Norfolk-Brant we are lucky to have a grade 2 teacher who works tirelessly 365 days a year to make a better life for children, not just here in Ontario but around the world. For 15 years now, Emily Stowe, of Port Dover's Doverwood Public School, has dedicated herself to organizing her school's UNICEF campaign. When it comes to fundraising for children, Mrs Stowe thinks outside the orange UNICEF box. Emily Stowe has raised money through face-painting initiatives and hat day. This year funds were also raised through a haunted house display. If you ask her, Mrs Stowe will tell you that she doesn't do it all by herself; she receives help from many in organizing the annual UNICEF campaign.

However, this year Emily Stowe has been singled out as the Ontario UNICEF educator of the year. On this National Child Day I'd like to take the opportunity to thank Emily Stowe for her dedication to children of the world and congratulate her on her recognition by UNICEF.

Mrs Leona Dombrowsky (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Today is National Child Day. The day of the child is an opportunity to focus on the achievements and the great promise that our children represent in our society. We must take every opportunity to celebrate the potential, strength of purpose and hope that our children and our youth represent. A wonderful example occurred just this summer in this very city with World Youth Day. We were able to witness the positive impression hundreds of thousands of youth left in the minds and hearts of people from around the country and indeed around the world. They left us with a tremendous feeling of hope for our future and our world.

However, in Ontario there is still much that must be done for our children. Over 40% of those who use food banks are children. The fastest-growing demographic among the homeless is families with children. Children in Ontario with special education needs and mental health needs are not receiving the support and services they need and deserve. Dalton McGuinty has made a commitment to children in his Excellence for All plan. It is a plan that has been endorsed by child advocates such as Charlie Coffey and the Honourable Margaret McCain. Ontario Liberals are prepared to invest in programs and services that support families and our children because

Mr John O'Toole (Durham): During constituency week it was my privilege to attend Remembrance Day ceremonies and events across my riding, which I enjoyed. I would like to commend the Royal Canadian Legion branch that does so much outstanding work to honour the memory of those who have served and those who gave their lives for the freedom we enjoy today. I'd like to extend my thanks to Jim Connell, president of branch 178, Royal Canadian Legion, Bowmanville, as well as Roy Thompson, president of branch 419, Port Perry. Thanks also to Doreen Park, who gave a Remembrance Day reading at the Bowmanville cenotaph this year, and each year, I might add. She is retiring, I believe.

These are just a few of the men and women who led in the Remembrance Day observances in my riding.

I'd also like to briefly mention the remembrance cross program supported by branch 178 of the Royal Canadian Legion in Bowmanville. Small white crosses with a red poppy are placed on each grave of nearly 900 veterans at 10 cemeteries in Clarington. They mark the resting places of those who served in the War of 1812, the Boer War, World War I, World War II, and the Korean War, as well as peacemakers and members of the armed forces of Canada who have honoured us by their service.

This program was begun in 1992 by Norm Baker and Harvey Jones, both veterans of World War II. The present chairman of the program, Cecile Bowers, has 19 volunteers, including John Greenfield, veterans' service officer for branch 178. These tributes are placed at the end of October and removed after Remembrance Day. The inscription on the crosses sums up the attitude of all citizens of Durham riding, and that is that we serve and "We remember."

SITE OF EARLY PARLIAMENT

Mr Steve Peters (Elgin-Middlesex-London): I rise today to bring to the attention of this Legislature an issue of extreme importance and concern to every one of us gathered here at Queen's Park, and all citizens of this province. That's the preservation of the site of Ontario's first Parliament Buildings.

Located near the southwest corner of Front and Parliament streets in downtown Toronto, an archaeological dig last year discovered the brick foundations and artifacts from the buildings that date back to 1798. The remains of these buildings are what is left of the original Parliament of Upper Canada. Amid the rubble are charred floorboards that remain from the torching during the American invasion of the War of 1812. These buildings were significant enough of a symbol of our emerging government that the Americans went out of their way to burn them down in 1813.

This discovery is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity. These remains of the birth of Ontario's democracy are in danger of being lost forever. A new Porsche dealership has applied for a building permit to pave over this historic site. The Ontario Municipal Board deadline of December 1 to arrange the purchase of the lot by the city or the province is fast approaching.

There has been support shown by the owners of the site and within the Ministry of Culture and the Ontario Realty Corp to have this site return to public ownership where it belongs, but there has been no action despite the looming deadline.

I am calling on this government, and in particular the Minister of Culture, to act immediately to preserve a jewel of Ontario's heritage and a jewel of the democratic foundations of this province.

HAZARDOUS WASTE

Mr Gilles Bisson (Timmins-James Bay): Yet again, northerners have descended on Queen's Park because they're feeling left out by this Tory government.

We all know that what's happened over the last couple of years is that a company by the name of Bennett Inc has been trying to build yet another one of these garbage plants up in northern Ontario. Imagine, they want to bring all of the toxic waste into the Timiskaming area and they want to be able to do what they want: pollute the area and run away with all of the profits.

Northerners are here today to say, "No, we're not going to accept that northern Ontario becomes the toxic waste dump of all the rest of Ontario and the rest of Canada."

What's interesting is that even the Ministry of the Environment, when they looked at the environmental assessment process that was undergone, and it was a scoped EA, had to agree that the proposal by Bennett was severely flawed. Bennett removed themselves from the process. But they're back again.

David Pond and Bennett Inc are saying, "We're back. We're going to come back with another application," and northerners again on their own, the people of Timiskaming, are going to have to get up, do everything they did once before, twice before, and fight this whole process yet again.

They're here to ask the Minister of the Environment, who is here in the chamber today, one simple thing: "Minister of the Environment"—that's you, yes, you standing over there. Hey, Chris, look over here. The people over here from northern Ontario want to know, are you prepared to restore full benefits when it comes to intervenor funding in order to assist northerners when it comes to the fight that they're going to have to undergo with Bennett? Will you restore full intervenor funding?

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Just before we begin, for our visitors in the gallery, unfortunately clapping isn't allowed. I would appreciate if you would honour that tradition.

Interjection.

The Speaker: Yes, I know, the member likes that, but unfortunately clapping isn't allowed. I appreciate your help with that.

CHILDREN'S TREATMENT CENTRE

Mr AL McDonald (Nipissing): Today I'd like to talk about the groundbreaking announcement that Minister Clement made Monday regarding the creation of a children's treatment centre in Nipissing. Located in North Bay, the children's treatment centre will serve children in Nipissing, Parry Sound and Muskoka. The children's treatment centre will enhance the recruitment, retention and ongoing professional development of a wide variety of pediatrics-trained health professionals to encourage doctors and health workers to live and work in the north. It will also create the required setting for parent support and education activities.

I'd like to thank a very special person, Mr Ian Kilgour, who was the task force chair and led this initiative from the very beginning. I'd also like to thank the members of the Northern Shores Children's Treatment Centre Task Force for all their hard work and dedication to children's services, as well as the Rotary Club of Nipissing and the Rotary Club of North Bay for their outstanding fund-raising events.

Children and youth with special needs and their families will greatly benefit from this new facility. It's something that Nipissing and North Bay have been wishing for, for many years.

I want to personally thank Minister Clement for announcing the 20th children's treatment centre in the province of Ontario in my riding of Nipissing.

If you ask the average northern Ontarian what they believe is the top priority in their lives and what they believe the government should be pushing for, health care is one of them. I can honestly say that the people of northern Ontario will reap the benefits of having such a facility. I want to thank everyone who took part in making this dream a reality.

LÉGION D'HONNEUR

LEGION OF HONOUR

M^{me} Claudette Boyer (Ottawa-Vanier): J'ai l'honneur et l'immense plaisir d'annoncer à cette assemblée que trois grands personnages franco-ontariens ont reçu dernièrement, des mains de l'ambassadeur de la France au Canada, des décorations de la Légion d'honneur.

Indeed one of our former colleagues, the past member of Glengarry-Prescott-Russell, Mr Jean Poirier, was promoted to the rank of officier de l'ordre national du mérite, while M^{me} Gisèle Lalonde was awarded the rank of chevalier of the French Legion of Honour, and Senator Jean-Robert Gauthier the grade of officer.

Ces prix sont remis en reconnaissance de leur grand dévouement pour la cause franco-ontarienne.

Jean Poirier served in this House as a Liberal member from 1984 to 1995, winning four consecutive elections for his riding, and he was also Deputy Speaker from 1987 until 1990. Senator Gauthier, a tireless defender of francophone Ontarians' rights, was a sitting Liberal member of the federal government prior to his appointment to the Senate. Of course, you may have recognized the name of the lady who led the battle for the preservation of Montfort Hospital, M^{me} Gisèle Lalonde.

J'invite tous mes collègues à applaudir avec moi ces trois personnalités de la communauté franco-ontarienne.

VISITORS

Mr Dave Levac (Brant): On a point of order, Speaker: In the public gallery today are two constituents who have joined us here at Queen's Park to bring the cause of long-term-care issues and to learn about the democratic process in this House, Mandy Conlon and her mother, Judith, who have brought these issues and want the Minister of Health to understand that there are issues today. I'd like to welcome them here.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

FUNERAL, BURIAL AND CREMATION SERVICES ACT, 2002

LOI DE 2002 SUR LES SERVICES FUNÉRAIRES ET LES SERVICES D'ENTERREMENT ET DE CRÉMATION

Mr Hudak moved first reading of the following bill:

Bill 209, An Act respecting funerals, burials, cremations and related services and providing for the amendment of other statutes / Projet de loi 209, Loi traitant des funérailles, des enterrements, des crémations et des services connexes et prévoyant la modification d'autres lois.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion carry? Carried.

The minister for a short statement?

Hon Tim Hudak (Minister of Consumer and Business Services): I'll defer to ministers' statements.

STATEMENTS BY THE MINISTRY AND RESPONSES

BEREAVEMENT SERVICES

Hon Tim Hudak (Minister of Consumer and Business Services): I am pleased to introduce proposed legislation regarding the bereavement services sector in the House today. The proposed Funeral, Burial and Cremation Services Act, 2002, is part of the most comprehensive review of consumer protection legislation ever undertaken in Ontario. It is part of the Ernie Eves government's consumer protection for the 21st century package, which includes Bill 180, currently before the House. Bill 180, if passed by the Legislature, would consolidate six core pieces of consumer protection and three sector statutes. It is part of our government's plan to provide strong, efficient consumer protection and a level playing field for business.

This bill I am introducing today would strengthen consumer protection in the bereavement services sector. Bereavement is a topic that many of us are not always comfortable talking about. However, all of us can appreciate how important it is to ensure high standards of services and ethics in this area, given the value of the expenditure and the vulnerability of a person whose loved one has just passed away.

The death of a loved one means that those left behind must make decisions quickly during an emotional time. Often, family members have little or no experience in purchasing bereavement services.

High standards for those who deliver bereavement services, including private businesses, charitable and religious organizations and municipalities, would not only benefit consumers but also provide a level playing field for the sector.

I would like to thank the many people who have been instrumental in developing this proposed legislation. Key among them is my predecessor as the Minister of Consumer and Business Services, Norm Sterling. Former ministers Runciman and Tsubouchi also did a great deal of work in this process. Also, members of the Red Tape Commission have offered the benefit of their counsel as the government worked toward this proposed legislation. I would also like to especially thank Gary Stewart, Steve Gilchrist, Joe Spina, John O'Toole and Marcel Beaubien for their assistance in this process.

For more than a year now, representatives from various bereavement services providers and consumer groups have met frequently to provide advice on reform. The group, which included members representing organizations as diverse as monument retailers and religious organizations, formed the Bereavement Sector Advisory Committee, known as the BSAC committee.

I want to thank each member of that committee for their hard work and dedication. Several of them are in the gallery here today with us. To mention a few names, of course the Honourable George Adams, who led the process, Gary Carmichael, Mike Fitzgerald and Lynne Atkinson, Joe Richer and Scott Doney, John O'Brien, Eileen Fitzpatrick, Bob Youngs, Helen Anderson, Peter Niro, Pearl Davie, Zena Doogay and Norris Zooket, have joined us here today. I thank them for all their efforts on this legislation.

Superior Court Justice the Honourable George Adams QC, whom I introduced, deserves a special thanks for his leadership and guidance in helping to facilitate the advisory committee discussions. Thank you, Justice Adams, for your work.

The current legislation governing the bereavement sector was written close to a century ago, a time when people still drove horses and buggies, the Wright brothers were making their first flight, and the world wars had not yet been waged. Lifestyles and social attitudes have changed considerably since then.

As Pearl Davie, the chair of the legislation committee of the Federation of Ontario Memorial Societies/Funeral Consumer Alliance, has said, "Our modern multicultural society, as well as changes in societal attitudes, require that bereavement sector legislation ensures access to alternatives and increased consumer protection."

There are many factors that have changed the bereavement services sector in the last century. A hundred years ago, the vast majority of Ontarians were Christian. Today, we see the growth of other religions and funeral practices and greater ethnic diversity. The legislation must be flexible to respond to Ontario's evolving and diverse culture. At the same time, in modernizing the bereavement services sector, we must respect religious sensitivities and traditions and ensure they are maintained.

As minister, I want to strive to facilitate that by continuing to consult with the religious community and respond to their concerns as proposed reforms go forward. The proposed Funeral, Burial and Cremation Services Act, 2002, would combine two statutes, the Cemeteries Act (Revised) and the Funeral Directors and Establishments Act, into one modern regulatory framework. It would permit combinations, meaning that a funeral home can own and operate a cemetery, crematorium or scattering grounds and vice versa. This would bring Ontario into line with eight other provinces and 40 US states while providing greater choice for consumers who want to make all the arrangements in one place.

By permitting new business models, it would also allow businesses to grow and to create jobs. It would allow access to alternative or no-frills services, which many consumers are looking for today. To help provide some peace of mind to families at this vulnerable time, this bill would require service providers to offer clear information, including price lists. It would also require salespeople and operators to follow a strict code of ethics.

Our government understands that bereavement purchases are a major purchase at a very sensitive time. That is why this bill provides for industry-funded compensation funds, so that consumers would be compensated if a licensee fails to provide the goods or service purchased. Currently, only funeral directors have a similar compensation fund. It would also protect those who choose to prearrange and prepay for their funerals and other bereavement services by providing expanded trust requirements to keep their money safe. Consumers would also have a 30-day cooling-off period to reconsider their purchases. Those who have purchased a burial plot or interment rights would be able to resell them at a fair price. Under the current legislation, consumers must sell at the original acquisition price even if they purchased their plot 20 years ago.

This government is proud to introduce the proposed Funeral, Burial and Cremation Services Act, 2002. This bill would provide stronger protections for consumers in the vulnerable time when they are purchasing funeral, burial or cremation services. I am confident that with the input of consumer groups, religious institutions and a variety of organizations in the bereavement services sector, we have developed a bill that will meet the needs of both consumers and businesses alike in the years ahead.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Responses?

Mr Mario Sergio (York West): I'd like to respond to the Minister of Consumer and Business Services with respect to the announcement of today. It is a very small, good step, but it doesn't go far enough with respect to offering the protection our consumers deserve.

I have to say that two years ago I introduced a bill in this House, Bill 54, which dealt with the major components that consumers in the community face, a much more complete, much more concise, much fuller bill which indeed would have given the consumers of Ontario the protection they seek from the government when it comes to that particular time. Some 80,000 people die on a yearly basis. It is a serious concern for the family members when it comes to dealing with the situation at that particular time.

Unfortunately, Minister, what you have introduced today does not address the major component, when you have to choose a funeral home or a service centre. A service centre can have a funeral home, according to your laws of today, but not according to laws, but they are doing it today. The legislation you have introduced today does not offer that protection to the consumers in Ontario—it does not.

Minister, as you say about your bill today that you're willing to combine the two bills to offer more protection to the consumers of Ontario, I say dig out Bill 54, read it very well and include it in this legislation so that indeed the consumers of Ontario can have that peace of mind at the time they most need it. It's fine to license the headstone retailers and casket operators, but it does not deal with the real problem, that at a time when people really don't need anything else—it's not addressed here.

I'm telling you today, Minister, to take a look at your legislation. Indeed you are allowing cemeteries today to have funeral homes. Your piece of legislation here does not address the problem that you are associating with this piece of legislation by allowing that on cemetery property versus the private supplier/provider.

I believe that consumers today have a very serious problem when it comes to choices. You're saying in your legislation that you are allowing for more choices. Well, let me ask the minister, what choices are you offering the consumers when it comes to more protection? This piece of legislation only gives the consumers a choice of which casket or which headstone. With all due respect, you have to go deeper than that and say, "I'm offering more protection. I'm changing the act, which has not been changed in the last 90 to 100 years."

When it comes to reality, the protection is not here. We cannot support the bill as it is because it does not give any protection to the consumers. You're giving a 30-day cooling-off period. When someone has died and the family members have to make a choice at that particular time, they haven't got 30 days. Your 30 days is for those who want to make arrangements from now till God knows when, when they are called, and they can change their mind if they want a more expensive casket or headstone. That's fine and dandy.

I want you to say today to the consumers in Ontario, "I will indeed be looking at the funeral laws the way they are being conducted today," and offer them peace of mind. There is no protection with respect to the legislation that you have introduced today.

Minister, if you really want to strengthen and provide service and protection to the consumers of Ontario and to those 80,000 family members, then I would say to you, include Bill 54 in this legislation. Send it out for debate. Listen to both the consumers and the industry. Then hopefully you will come back to this House with a bill that is worth supporting by the consumers out there and by this House.

Mr Peter Kormos (Niagara Centre): New Democrats appreciate the advance notice we received of this announcement and of this bill being introduced. I appreciate the timely delivery of a copy of the bill. I've given it but cursory examination. The bill in many respects appears to be a consolidation of but existing legislation. This isn't atypical from this particular minister, because the House has been dealing with his so-called Consumer Protection Act, which is but a re-statement, in so many respects, of the existing law.

I want to tell you that members of this New Democratic Party caucus, be they from the north or Toronto or Hamilton or Niagara, have very good reports to give to this House about the conduct of funeral home operators in their communities. I speak very specifically about the types of funeral homes and funeral directors that tend to prevail especially in smaller-town Ontario, like the communities I come from, which are family-owned and family-operated funeral homes.

New Democrats ask other members of this Legislature to do as we intend to do, and that is to ensure that those small family-operated and -owned funeral homes have an opportunity to examine this legislation, and to ensure that those same operators have access to a public hearing process, which necessarily should follow second reading debate on this bill.

First, it's acknowledged, it's been stated and it will be restated during the course of discussion around this that a funeral expenditure is one of the largest single expenditures any family faces. Second, the cost of funerals, according to the anecdotal evidence we're receiving, is increasing. Perhaps that's the nature of the beast.

One of the concerns we have is that legislation like this ensure that families of a deceased family member or friend have access to the most economically possible funeral arrangements that can legally be provided. We think it's imperative that that option has to be given to griever at the time of making funeral arrangements. Quite frankly, we've witnessed far too many funeral scenarios wherein the costs accepted by the people, arranging the funeral at a point of incredible grief and intense emotion, have become almost crippling, if not indeed crippling, to those families after the emotions have soothed a little and there is the realization of what's happened to them as they've gone about making arrangements.

Of particular concern of course is the combination proposal, funeral home operators also owning funeral plots. I call upon members in this assembly to very carefully scrutinize it with the assistance of their owner-operated funeral homes, like I have down in Niagara Centre and like every other member of this caucus and most members of this Legislature have. I know it's been a matter of concern in the past. I suspect it will warrant some consideration now.

I regret to note there's very little in this bill addressing the heritage nature of burial sites in this bill, in and of itself. You know, Speaker, that there are a number of areas across the province where that issue is very much causing great concern with ethnic communities, among others, as to ownership and control of historical and heritage burial sites.

The act does make reference to aboriginal burial grounds. I noted with interest that one of the people consulted was Marcel Beaubien. We all know that Mr Beaubien has some very specific experience with respect to aboriginal burial grounds. I'm not sure of the extent to which he influenced the consideration in the bill of aboriginal burial grounds, but we know he's had a great deal of experience, most of it as of yet undisclosed, as we await discovery on the lawsuits that are very much in action and that this government clearly doesn't want to resolve with a public inquiry into the killing of Dudley George, now far too long ago but still in fresh in the memory of every member of this province.

Concern about the fact that the Red Tape Commission made submissions or had some impact on the bill causes us to be cautious about the legislation. It warrants consideration; it warrants thorough debate. Quite frankly, it warrants committee hearings. I don't know what promises the minister made to participants in the advisory process, but the minister had better be prepared to get this bill called for second reading debate. He's scheduling it for committee. New Democrats are going to insist on it.

Mrs Leona Dombrowsky (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): On a point of order, Speaker: To recognize National Child Day, Voices for Children sent every member of the Legislature a button which reads, "Listen to a child today." I would seek unanimous consent that we would be allowed to wear these buttons today in the legislature.

The Speaker: Is there unanimous consent? I'm afraid I heard some noes.

VISITORS

Mr Dominic Agostino (Hamilton East): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: It is my pleasure to introduce today a delegation from my riding of Hamilton East, behind us, and along with the delegation my mother, of course, which means that one day of the year I'm actually going to behave in here. Thank you.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): We certainly welcome Mrs Agostino and her group again this year. Welcome.

Mr Howard Hampton (Kenora-Rainy River): On a point of order, Speaker: I ask for unanimous consent for third and fourth reading of Bill 204, the No Freezing in the Dark Act, since people continue to have their hydro shut off.

Hon Chris Stockwell (Minister of the Environment, Government House Leader): I've never heard of a fourth reading.

The Speaker: We stand corrected. The member is asking for second and third reading of Bill 204. Is there unanimous consent? I'm afraid I hear some noes.

ORAL QUESTIONS

COMPETITIVE ELECTRICITY MARKET

Mr Michael Bryant (St Paul's): The question is to the Premier. Premier, did you consult with Chairman Bill Farlinger of OPG prior to the electricity marketplace opening on May 1?

Hon Ernie Eves (Premier, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs): No, I did not.

Mr Bryant: I find it unbelievable, or unbelievably reckless, that the Premier of Ontario did not contact the chairman of Ontario Power Generation before opening up the marketplace. One of the most momentous decisions that you made as the Premier of Ontario, after becoming the Premier, one of the biggest decisions that you had to make was with respect to the opening of this marketplace. It had enormous consequences. The question is this: what assurances did you receive from Ontario Power Generation that justified your opening the marketplace on May 1?

Hon Mr Eves: The honourable member goes on and on about Ontario Hydro. I see his leader is here to talk about energy and his energy policy. I haven't checked the Web site today to see if they have one today. We do have ministers of the crown who are responsible to run their ministries. It's not appropriate for the Premier of the province to check every single decision that is made in every single ministry or by every single government agency.

Mr Bryant: This wasn't just any decision made by the Premier of Ontario. This was whether or not to open up the electricity marketplace. Your predecessor, Mike Harris, picked up the phone and called the Chair of Ontario Power Generation before announcing that the market would open on May 1. But you're telling us that you're just a little too busy and too taxed to do the homework and find out whether or not in fact the electricity marketplace was ready before you opened it? Either you didn't do your homework or you were reckless beyond belief in opening up the marketplace on May 1. Which is it?

Premier, I'll tell you something. If you think the people of Ontario think it's OK that the Premier of Ontario was too busy to do his homework and find out, before the electricity marketplace was opened, that it was ready, I think you are going to receive a rude awakening at the ballot box. I would say to you, sir, what homework did you do before the marketplace opened on May 1 that justified your opening up—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): The member's time is up. Premier?

Hon Mr Eves: To the honourable member for St Paul's, that was a great three-minute speech and 10-second question.

With respect to his point about OPG and the opening of the marketplace, first of all, as we have explained in this Legislature many times, there were several factors that contributed to high fluctuations in prices per kilowatt hour, being the hottest summer—

Interjections.

Hon Mr Eves: I didn't check with Bill Farlinger to see if it was going to be the hottest summer on record since 1955. I didn't check with Bill Farlinger to see if the experts at OPG, with respect to the nuclear facility at Pickering—to see if it was going to be delayed after the market opened, for yet a seventh time. I didn't check with Bill Farlinger to see whether or not one of the units at Bruce, during routine maintenance, might be accidentally damaged and therefore be down for two or three months.

But you are so wise, I say to the honourable member for St Paul's, you're taking so many acting lessons and you're so good on TV that I think you should tell us today what the weather's going to be like next July, August and September. You should tell us whether or not there's going to be any damage done to any unit during any maintenance next year, and you should tell us, because you're obviously smarter than any nuclear physicist out there—

The Speaker: The Premier's time is up. New question.

EDUCATION FUNDING

Mr Joseph Cordiano (York South-Weston): I have a question of the Premier. Yesterday the people of Toronto learned that you are no different from Mike Harris when it comes to cutting services out of public education. On top of the $2 billion you cut while you were Minister of Finance, your appointed supervisor wants to cut even more from the city of Toronto. The York Adult Day School in my riding and the Maplewood school in Scarborough are slated to close this year. Some 3,000 adult students will see their programs cut. The remaining adult education centres have waiting lists. They can't take on any more students.

Premier, you more than anyone should know that we are in a knowledge-based economy. At a time when we should be encouraging more people to acquire the skills they need, you are turning your back on these people. Is this the way you show your commitment, or your supposed commitment, to public education—by shutting these students out?

Hon Ernie Eves (Premier, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs): To the honourable member, with respect to the Toronto District School Board, first of all, many Liberal members have stood up in this Legislature and predicted many things when a supervisor was appointed to go in—and in fact, when you go back to when an inspector was appointed to go in—and look at the Toronto District School Board. You said that special education would be cut; it has not been. You said that the number of teachers would be reduced; it has not been. You said that the pools would be closed; they have not been. On almost every single point that you and your Liberal colleagues made, you were wrong.

In fact, the supervisor has now managed to increase funding to the classroom, which is where it belongs, and in case you're interested, they put more money into textbooks, more money into computers, more money into the classroom, more money into hall monitors, more money into school safety.

For your information, the education system is about the education of the child, not about how many staff that are doing nothing we can have in an administrative building belonging to a union.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Supplementary?

Mr Monte Kwinter (York Centre): Mr Premier, in the age of information technology we learned yesterday that you are prepared to sit idly by while $10 million is slashed from the Toronto school board's computer budget. Students that could have had access to the latest technology will instead have outdated, old computers or, worse, nothing at all. You're going from one out of six to one out of 10. Premier, it is frankly unbelievable that you're prepared to take this money out of the children's classroom.

It is unfathomable that in this knowledge-based economy you refuse to recognize that our children need and deserve to have access to the very latest technology available. Premier, would you tell Toronto parents and students how cutting the budget for computers and technology is going to help them?

Hon Mr Eves: First of all, we are increasing the suggested budget by the supervisor, increasing spending on computers in the classroom. The previous question suggested that education spending has been reduced; it has not been reduced.

Interjection.

Hon Mr Eves: It has not. It started out at $12.9 billion and it's now at $14.36 billion. That's an increase, in case you're interested, of $1.5 billion. Dr Rozanski is reviewing the funding formula on top of that, and we increased funding during the fiscal year by $557 million.

I know Liberals have problems with numbers. Their problems with numbers translated into a $10-billion increase in our provincial debt while they were there, and on top of that they increased the debt of Ontario Hydro by $8 billion. They claim they balanced the books when they really had a $700-million deficit. So I'm not about to take any advice from you about numbers. Only a Liberal could think 12.9 was larger than 14.4.

The Speaker: Final supplementary.

Mr Mike Colle (Eglinton-Lawrence): Mr Premier, for eight years I've seen you stand up in the House. I've seen John Snobelen, I've seen all your Ministers of Education and yourself stand up and say you cared about education. Well, here's what you've done. For the last eight years you have caused havoc in our public schools. You have closed schools, you have cut programs, you have created chaos in our public schools, and now you stand up and gloat about it. You're proud of it.

Yesterday you cut $90 million out of our schools. That means there are 100 fewer secretaries in our schools. They're the gatekeepers in our schools. There's 65 fewer vice-principals. They take care of discipline in our schools. They're not going to be there any more. I've got schools in my riding where the roofs aren't going to be fixed. I have toilets that aren't going to be fixed. I have schools falling apart, and you have the guts to stand up there and say you are proud of this cut—

The Chair: I'm afraid the member's time is up.

Hon Mr Eves: First of all, money spent in the classroom is actually increased under the supervisor's recommendation. He talks about the commitment to education of this government. This government has increased education spending by $1.5 billion and we are reviewing the funding formula, as we promised to do, at the same time.

We are the first government in the history of the province of Ontario that has made sure that special education funding actually goes to special education.

We have built more schools than David Peterson's government did or than Bob Rae's government did during a five-year period of time.

1430

We will continue to improve public education in the province of Ontario, but I can assure you of one thing: we won't say one thing in Timmins and another thing in Toronto, like your leader does, about public education.

Interjections.

The Speaker: Order. This is the last warning for the member for Eglinton-Lawrence. If he continues shouting across, we'll just throw him out for the day.

It is now time for the leader of the third party's question.

ELECTRICITY SUPPLY AND DEMAND

Mr Howard Hampton (Kenora-Rainy River): Premier, this is a new report released by the North American Electric Reliability Council. They do studies across North America to tell us if there will be enough hydro this winter and they're warning that the situation in Ontario this winter "could spell trouble." They say that with just normal winter temperatures, Ontario's average electricity capacity margin is only 10%. It's over 18% in Quebec and over 20% in California.

Premier, you try to hide the skyrocketing cost of privatized, deregulated hydroelectricity from hydro consumers with your pre-election rebate scheme. How are you going to hide the brownouts and the blackouts?

Hon Ernie Eves (Premier, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs): Mr Speaker, he's a great—

Mr Gregory S. Sorbara (Vaughan-King-Aurora): You'll declare them illegal: no brownouts under the Eves government.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): The member for Vaughan-King-Aurora, come to order, please.

Hon Mr Eves: Mr Speaker, I feel that the member for Vaughan-King-Aurora is feeling a little lonely. Maybe he'd like to join the NDP caucus so he could get a question on in question period.

Interjections.

Hon Mr Eves: On second thought, maybe that's not such a good idea.

We have taken steps to protect the consumer, as you are aware. I presume you're in favour of that and will support that when the legislation is introduced shortly.

A lot of fearmongering went on at this time about a year ago that the leader of the third party—

Interjections.

Hon Mr Eves: The leader of the third party then suggested brownouts and blackouts. Perhaps he'd like to itemize all the hundreds of blackouts and brownouts we've had in Ontario in the last 12 months. Would you like to itemize them all for us, please?

Mr Hampton: Premier, the question was—even international experts now are identifying that under your scheme of hydro privatization and deregulation over the last seven years, you've left us with not enough electricity. I just asked you, how are you going to cover up the brownouts and blackouts? It's so obvious that your rebate cheques for hydro are an attempt to cover up the high cost and an attempt, by the way, to buy a few votes before the election.

It's pretty clear that not enough electricity does mean the possibility of brownouts and blackouts and it does mean that those private hydro companies that you want to see in the province will jack up the price, and then taxpayers' dollars will have to go to pay them off, to hide it from the consumers.

I know you believe that you can fool the people with a $75 cheque just before the election, but how do you prevent the brownouts and blackouts?

Hon Mr Eves: First of all, there has not been a brownout or a blackout in the province of Ontario. He said the same thing a year ago. He was wrong then and he's wrong again. What has he got against consumers being reimbursed every cent they were charged above 4.3 cents per kilowatt hour since May 1? What has he got against that, and does he not want that to happen?

Mr Hampton: Premier, I'm not prepared to take part in what is so obviously a pre-election bribe. You have a tête-à-tête with Ralph Klein and he says to you, "Ernie, this is what we did in Alberta: we gave them a fat rebate just before the election, and then as soon as the election was over we took the rebate off and the hydro bills went sky high again." And what does Ernie do 10 days later? He announces the Alberta rebate and says, "Oh, before the election we're going to send you out a cheque, but don't ask what happens afterwards. Don't ask about electricity supply. Don't ask where the money comes from when the private companies jack the price of hydro up to $1,000 a megawatt hour."

Premier, the question is this: if you think you can bribe people with a pre-election $75 cheque, at least tell them as well how you prevent the brownouts and blackouts because your hydro privatization plan isn't drawing any new electricity supply to the province. You owe people that. What's the answer?

Hon Mr Eves: To the leader of the third party, first of all, he keeps talking about brownouts and blackouts, knowing full well that none has occurred and none is going to occur. He's the greatest fearmonger going. He's driven around the province in his little bus trying to tell people there's going to be a blackout any day now. He's been doing that for a year, and he's been wrong every single day for 365 days in a row. The odds are not good for your being right one of these days, Howie.

We have a nine-point plan that deals with protecting consumers as we go forward. We also have a plan that protects consumers until at least 2006. We also have a plan that will encourage people to locate generating facilities here in Ontario. You will have an opportunity to vote against the consumers if you want, to vote against the initiatives to try to encourage people to locate here and generate more power-producing facilities in the province. You can vote against all of that if you want to. We'll be interested to see how you vote.

DIAGNOSTIC SERVICES

Mr Howard Hampton (Kenora-Rainy River): Again, to the Premier: I would have thought that your painful experience with hydro would have taught you that privatization isn't the answer. But last week at midnight your government sends out requests for proposals for private MRI clinics. Why would you send them out at midnight unless you have something to hide? You've already announced that you also want to get into private hospitals.

I know of course that the Liberals want to keep an open mind on privatized health care, but I want you to know where New Democrats stand. Privatized health care doesn't work for people. Privatized health care may work for corporate profits, but it doesn't work for people. Premier, while we're waiting for Mr Romanow to provide his report to the Canadian people, will you call off your scheme for private MRIs and privately built hospitals?

Hon Ernie Eves (Premier, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs): Mr Speaker, I refer the question to the Minister of Health.

Hon Tony Clement (Minister of Health and Long-Term Care): There are a few points that should get on the record. First of all, this initiative of greater access to diagnostic services, universally accessible, part of our publicly funded system, was announced in the throne speech; it was announced in the budget. I myself made an announcement that we were moving ahead with the project.

The honourable member, the leader of the third party, should get his facts straight. This has been part of public discourse for months. This government is committed to greater diagnostic services in hospitals and we announced three new MRIs last week as well, which he didn't mention in his question, I noticed. But the cities of Ottawa and Owen Sound are certainly grateful that we have moved ahead with MRIs in hospitals, and we are moving ahead with stand-alone clinics just as the NDP government moved ahead with independent health facilities in previous governments.

This is an established practice by the government of Ontario to increase accessibility. You use your OHIP card; universally accessible; consistent with the Canada Health Act; greater services to the people of Ontario—that's what this government is all about.

Mr Hampton: The Premier ought to know that the Romanow commission has already gathered together a number of studies that show that in fact the patient results from a privately operated health care system are substandard compared to a publicly operated system. Just today, yet another report was released showing that for-profit hospitals mean substandard care.

It's quite interesting. You put out your request for proposals for private MRIs at 11:59 pm, one minute before midnight, as if you're afraid to let the public of Ontario see it. Premier, if you're that afraid and if the so-called meetings to discuss the request for proposals are closed to the public, if someone from the public who wants to go to them can't get in, why don't you call off your whole agenda and let the Romanow commission put forward a program for medicare—a program for publicly funded health care, publicly administered health care—rather than the backdoor privatization that seems to have such favour with you? Why won't you at least do that?

Hon Mr Clement: Well, we're having a little bit of fun on this side of the House. Perhaps he thinks we are using crop circles to announce these things as well. Did you not read the throne speech? Did you not read the budget?

The honourable member should be aware that this has been established practice to increase accessibility for the people of Ontario when it comes to diagnostics. In his own riding, in his own community, there are diagnostic services being performed right now by stand-alone clinics that have been part of the Ontario health system for decades.

The fact of the matter is, we have a system that ensures universal accessibility, that ensures that people have access through their OHIP card. That's what this government is committed to. That's what we are all about. The honourable member can talk all he wants about studies about what happens in Arkansas or Alabama or I don't care where, but that's a for-profit system where the patient is charged at source. That is not allowed under our acts, it is not allowed under the Canada Health Act. This government wants to increase accessibility, and we will use creative means and every means possible to do so, because we believe in accessibility.

AFFORDABLE HOUSING

Mr Dominic Agostino (Hamilton East): My question is to the Premier. Premier, I want to ask you about affordable housing in this province. As of today, in the city of Peterborough over 1,100 households are on a waiting list for affordable housing. It can be a wait of up to 10 years to get into one of these facilities in Peterborough. In the city of London there are 3,500 households with up to a four-year waiting period. There are 10% fewer rental units on the market in London today than there were since your government took office. In Guelph-Wellington, 26,000 households are on a waiting list, with a wait of three to five years; 4% less availability on the market today than when you took office.

Premier, we know what you've done. You've gutted rent controls. You've abandoned support for non-profit housing and affordable housing. Can you tell us the other side of the story? Can you tell us how many new affordable housing units have been built in Peterborough, London and Guelph-Wellington since your government took office?

Hon Ernie Eves (Premier, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs): I refer the question to the Associate Minister for Urban Affairs.

Hon Tina R. Molinari (Associate Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing): On May 30, 2002, the federal government signed a deal with the province to ensure funds for affordable housing under the affordable housing agreement. The Ontario government and the municipalities are pleased that the federal government has remained committed to seeing that the deal goes through.

We recognize that affordable housing is a joint responsibility requiring the support of three levels of government. The proposed new affordable housing program is a short-term step to encourage new affordable housing in construction. The province is close to launching the new program. The first project funded by the program will be starting this year.

Mr Agostino: That answer certainly helps the people of Guelph-Wellington, London and Peterborough who are waiting four to 10 years for housing. The deal you signed with the federal government is a joke. You have not put one new cent of money into that program. You've taken money that was in place and you've moved it around with the municipalities—not one new cent. In the city of Hamilton there are 3,500 households on a waiting list for up to five years, with 5% less market availability today than there was five years ago.

Interjection.

Mr Agostino: The member from London likes to heckle, but can he tell his residents why they have to wait five years to get affordable housing in the city of London? The reality is, you gutted rent controls, you walked away from the table, you abandoned municipalities, you abandoned individuals in Ontario when it comes to non-profit housing. It is a disgrace that in this province that people in cities such as Peterborough have to wait 10 years for affordable housing, that in London you have to wait five years and in Guelph you have to wait four years. It is an embarrassment to this province and this government. You are responsible for this, Minister. Again, today, can you explain to the people of London, Guelph, Wellington and St Catharines how many new units have been built since your government came to power in 1995?

Hon Mrs Molinari: This government believes in tax incentives and the creation of more affordable housing for business. Let me put on the record the Liberal government's housing record.

Interjections.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Keep it down. It's getting noisy in here. The same crew is always yelling and screaming across.

Hon Mrs Molinari: It's nice to have silence in the room when I put the Liberal government's record in the open. The average rent increase under the Liberal government was 12% yearly. The money they wasted: $27 million for six housing projects in Toronto that were never built; the NDP and Liberal legacy of a $1-billion housing boondoggle; $300 million for consultants' fees—

Interjections.

The Speaker: Members, take their seats. The member for Kingston and the Islands, I'm naming him and I'm asking Mr Gerretsen to leave the chamber right now—number 34 that I've now removed during question period.

Mr Gerretsen was escorted from the chamber.

The Speaker: Associate Minister, we've lost a little bit of time, but you can start over and continue, please.

Hon Mrs Molinari: I can start over? OK. So the average rent increase during the Liberals' reign was 12% yearly. The money they wasted: $27 million for six housing projects in Toronto that were never built; the NDP and Liberal legacy of a $1-billion housing boondoggle; $300 million for consultants' fees; $550 million for architectural fees; $50 million for legal fees. Philip Dewan, chief of staff for Dalton McGuinty and former president and CEO of Fair Rental Policy Organization, said, "Much of the criticism has justifiably focused on Ottawa, which has failed to act on urgently required measures such as fair tax treatment of rental housing to make new construction affordable"—

The Speaker: The minister's time is up.

AUTISM SERVICES

Mr Raminder Gill (Bramalea-Gore-Malton-Springdale): My question today is for the Minister of Community, Family and Children's Services. This past Monday I was very pleased to join you and the Minister of Citizenship in an announcement for substantial new autism funding. This announcement is particularly interesting to me because autism affects many families in my riding of Bramalea-Gore-Malton-Springdale. I realize that you explained during the news conference that the new funding was for autism. I want to make sure that my constituents did not miss this very important announcement. Could you please tell my constituents and this House exactly what this announcement was about?

Hon Brenda Elliott (Minister of Community, Family and Children's Services): I thank my colleague for Bramalea-Gore-Malton-Springdale for his attendance at the event and for the question today. I was also joined at the news conference by my colleague the Minister of Citizenship, the representative of Mississauga East. It was a wonderful announcement. Today, as we celebrate the International Day of the Child, we have a great deal to celebrate on this side of the House. We have done so much for children and we're particularly proud of this landmark announcement.

Over the last few years, Ontario has shown itself to be a leader in offering services to autistic children and their families. This new announcement has secured our position as a North American leader in both the scope and the breadth of the comprehensive program. I announced an additional $58.6 million for services for children with autism, which will bring our government's total commitment, on behalf of Premier Eves, to almost $100 million by 2006-07. This new money is going to two kinds of programs: intensive behavioural intervention and broad traditional programs.

Mr Gill: I know that families across Ontario will be very pleased to learn about this new funding. It is especially good to know that this government is doing everything it can do to address the waiting lists by providing additional funding and the recruitment and training strategy. Minister, my constituents would like to more about how the government plans to address the shortage of professionals to provide IBI, which is intensive behavioural intervention, and I would like to know how this new funding helps families with children over six years of age.

Hon Mrs Elliott: Thanks to my colleague. This program will invest in two kinds of programs—intensive intervention programs for children aged two to five. One of our difficulties is that we have a shortage of professionals. That is why we are looking for ways to find people to enter this field to eliminate the waiting lists that presently exist and to build capacity so that we can address the problem.

With the help of colleges and universities, as part of this program we are going to develop curricula for training programs. We are going to invest in a recruitment strategy. For children who are over the age of six, we are going to have different kinds of programs: a transitional and support service to ease children from the early intervention programs into the school age. We are also, under the Minister of Education, going to pilot autism program standards in the year 2003-04. These will be forums to teach teachers and special education teachers more about how to help children with autism.

Finally, it can't be forgotten that we have four other programs that offer services to children with autism, in addition to the $500 million that we've increased in special education programs. A landmark program—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): The minister's time is up. New question.

HAZARDOUS WASTE

Mr David Ramsay (Timiskaming-Cochrane): My question is to the Minister of the Environment. Minister, as you know, on November 1, the Ministry of the Environment issued a deficiency statement regarding the Bennett hazardous waste incinerator EA that was unprecedented in its scope and magnitude. In fact, the four-page letter pointed out not only examples of the gross omissions, inconsistencies and discrepancies in the EA, but it ordered Bennett to overhaul their whole documentation and all its appendices. It is apparent you should have terminated the process, but instead you have given the company a second chance to resubmit their application.

Minister, isn't it clear that a company such as this that is so careless and reckless with its EA documentation can't really be trusted to run a toxic waste incinerator 1,200 metres from homes and schools in the town of Kirkland Lake?

Hon Chris Stockwell (Minister of the Environment, Government House Leader): No, that is not an accurate synopsis of the circumstances. What happened was, they made their application and the Ministry of the Environment reported back that it was deficient. We felt it was significantly deficient. We then issued that letter to Bennett. They have an option under the act to reapply within seven days; that's the law. They can choose to reapply in seven days or not, but there's no way in the world that the Ministry of the Environment can say that if they don't apply within seven days, they can never apply again. It is a free country. It is a democracy. If they choose to make application, they may do so.

But this has got to be clear to you and the good folks around there: this Ministry of the Environment is very conscious, very cognizant, very aware of the environmental issues. They made a very straightforward and stern decision, addressed the issues, and said they were deficient; in some cases, woefully deficient. I think we should take our hats off to the good people at the Ministry of the Environment.

Mr Ramsay: It is very clear to the 50 people from my riding who have come down here today that basically the process allows a second opportunity and maybe a third opportunity—as you say, it's a free country—for this company to continually apply to position a hazardous waste incinerator in northern Ontario, in the town of Kirkland Lake.

By allowing this process to restart, you're again inflicting great pain and anguish on all the people who want to stop this and protect their environment. You will again be putting the onus on ordinary citizens to really do the public fight to protect the environment, a job that you should be doing, with their private resources and their time and their energy. That's the point of this. Hundreds of people have given their time and money and effort to protect their environment and their livelihood, and now you say they might have to start the battle all over again. This process is wrong and it's punitive to all the people in Ontario.

Minister, who's going to compensate my constituents for this continuing battle they have to wage to protect the environment? When are you going to provide intervenor funding so that we can get proper, professional opposition to these projects so that we can start to debate the science and make sure that Ontario's environment is safe?

Hon Mr Stockwell: The fact remains, and I suppose the second answer is going to be very similar to the first answer, we can't unilaterally tell somebody in this democratic free nation that we live in, "No, you can't make application for use of your land." What we can do as the Ministry of the Environment is to ensure that any application meets the very tough, stringent environmental laws and rules that were put in place by this government and previous governments.

The argument you make is rather moot, I suppose, because when both opposition parties were in government, you could have drafted a bill that said, "You get one application and one application only, and you may never make it again." But the point of the matter is simply this: we have a democracy where they can make application and the Ministry of the Environment can review that application with environmental goals and deeds as the end game. Now, they didn't meet the environmental goals and deeds of the end game. The Ministry of the Environment did their job. It is protecting the people of this province. All I can tell you is that this was a system you worked under, it's a system we're working under, and we believe it's a good system.

HEALTH SERVICES

Mr R. Gary Stewart (Peterborough): A clarification for Hamilton East: there are a number of affordable housing projects on the table at the moment in Peterborough. Get your facts straight.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Take your seat. Don't start with that. You don't get to—

Interjection.

The Speaker: Take your seat. Don't start doing that. That's what gets this place going, when you make stupid statements like that. I'd ask that you not do it. Member for Peterborough, ask your question.

Mr Stewart: I don't think it was a stupid question, Mr Speaker.

The Speaker: You're not going to get in an argument with me. You're not allowed to go across to the other side during questions; you don't get to ask questions of the opposition. I ask that you not do it. Do you want your question or not? Otherwise, we'll go in the rotation to the next person if you want. It's up to you: do you want the question or not?

Mr Stewart: Yes.

The Speaker: Good. Go ahead.

Mr Stewart: My question is for the Minister of Health and Long-Term Care. During constituency week, I had the opportunity to speak with a number of my constituents about a very important issue to rural Ontario: nurse practitioners. As you know, the pilot project for the nurse practitioner program is in my riding, in the municipality of Havelock-Belmont-Methuen. Since its inception last year, there have been a number of rumours and media reports within the community that the government is going to pull the funding and the area will lose its nurse practitioner.

Minister, can you clarify this situation once and for all so that I can assure the people of Havelock-Belmont-Methuen that their government is committed to providing them with access to primary health care?

Hon Tony Clement (Minister of Health and Long-Term Care): If I may, I'm glad that my colleague from Peterborough raised this issue, because I know it's one that he has taken a great personal interest in, providing a great deal of hard work on behalf of his constituents. I think that is appreciated, if I may say so, by my fellow caucus members as well.

I can announce at this time, and I can do so to this chamber and to the people of Peterborough county, that the nurse practitioner program will in fact continue in Havelock-Belmont-Methuen township next year. Last night, the Peterborough Victorian Order of Nurses advisory board came forward and agreed to sponsor this very program. The Ernie Eves government will now provide funds to the VON in order to ensure continuous nurse practitioner coverage in the township.

I would like to thank all of those who were involved for their effort and hard work on this issue, and I can tell you that the nurse practitioner program is another example of the Ernie Eves government providing the best publicly funded and universally available health care possible.

Mr Stewart: Thank you, Minister, for your response. I'd also like to thank you, the Eves government and all of the people in the community of Havelock-Belmont-Methuen for your involvement in this particular issue.

I also understand that the Ministry of Health attended the World Health Organization conference last week. I heard that at the conference, Ontario and the Ernie Eves government received a special recognition that praised Ontario's universal influenza vaccination program. This is a great accomplishment. As Ontarians, we all should be proud of this achievement. It just proves that if you want the best health care anywhere in the world, you should come to Ontario.

I was wondering if the Minister of Health could inform my constituents about where to find information about the vaccination program and where they can get the flu shot in the Peterborough area.

Hon Mr Clement: I'm happy to inform the honourable member in this House that it was an honour to represent Ontario at the World Health Organization conference, where in fact we as a province were recognized by Klaus Stohr, the program leader of the global influenza program for the World Health Organization, for Ontario's world-leading role in the fight to eradicate the flu, and we should be proud of this accomplishment.

1500

For more information on the flu shot, I encourage Ontarians to phone 1-866-FLU-NYOU, or 1-866-358-6968. Of course, one can always access HealthyOntario.com. That is one other way to get that personal information. They can also phone the Peterborough County-City Health Unit at 705-743-1000, or they can visit clinics in their community, for instance the one at the Peterborough Regional Health Centre tomorrow and Friday of this week, located at One Hospital Drive. The clinic will be open from 10 am to 10 pm. Please get your flu shot. It's important for yourself and the health of your community as well.

EDUCATION FUNDING

Mr Rosario Marchese (Trinity-Spadina): My question is to the Minister of Education. If your supervisor is allowed to cut hundreds of responsible adults from our schools, our students, I put to you, will be put in danger.

Vice-principals, lunchroom supervisors, educational assistants, school secretaries, caretakers, youth counsellors and attendance counsellors—all are responsible adults who watch over our children every day in more ways than one. Principals told me that cutting them from our schools is an accident waiting to happen. They warned of a Walkerton in our schools.

Why are you putting our children at risk by removing more responsible adults who watch over them from our schools?

Hon Elizabeth Witmer (Deputy Premier, Minister of Education): Unfortunately, we continue with the same type of dire predictions as we heard prior to Mr Christie announcing his balanced budget. You talked about the parenting centres going, the pools going, cuts in the classroom, cuts in special education: none of that has materialized. In fact, we have increased funding for classroom teachers, textbooks and classroom supplies. We have increased the spending on hall monitors, so we have increased school safety. Everything that has been done has been to focus on the child in the classroom.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Supplementary?

Ms Marilyn Churley (Toronto-Danforth): Minister, when I warned your government about privatizing the water testing labs, I got the same answer. Then Walkerton happened.

Let me tell you that a six-year-old child was sexually assaulted in a school in my riding. The accident has already happened there and the parents, that child and the community are still trying to deal with it. People are already concerned about their children's safety.

The administration that you're talking about are real people. They are the men and women, the eyes and the ears in the school, who watch and look after our children. When you mention administration, Minister, you are talking about the eyes and ears who watch our children. I'm asking you today to face reality. These children are now being put at risk. Tell it like it is. Tell us that you will put these people back in our schools.

Hon Mrs Witmer: I appreciate the member's concern for our children, but the member needs to keep in mind a couple of things: number one, our government has recognized that our schools need to be safe environments. That's why we introduced the Safe Schools Act. That is very important.

Furthermore, Mr Christie has responded to the need as well by increasing the number of hall monitors. This has been taken into consideration. I would just—

Interjections.

Ms Marilyn Mushinski (Scarborough Centre): Hall monitors. That means more security.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Order. The member for Scarborough Centre can't continue with that. I ask Mrs Mushinski to leave as well. Her minister had to sit down because of her own member.

Mrs Mushinski was escorted from the chamber.

The Speaker: Stop the clock, sir. I think we lost track of time a little. I think the minister had some more time, if she wishes.

Hon Mrs Witmer: I simply wanted to emphasize the fact that the issue of hall monitors was a very important issue. The number of hall monitors in order to help and protect students and keep students safe under this budget has actually been increased.

IPPERWASH PROVINCIAL PARK

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): My question is to the Premier. Today we have more evidence of the need for a public inquiry into Ipperwash. You'd be aware that the judge at the trial involving the death of Dudley George said, "I find that the accused ... knew that ... Dudley George did not have any firearms on his person when he shot him," and that the story of the rifle and muzzle flash "was concocted ex post facto in an ill-fated attempt to disguise the fact that an unarmed man had been shot."

Today we find in the government document that the government is saying the protesters were armed. How in the world can the government say that the protesters were armed when the judge, supported by the Supreme Court of Canada, concluded that the protesters were not armed?

Hon Ernie Eves (Premier, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs): I refer this to the Attorney General.

Hon David Young (Attorney General, minister responsible for native affairs): Indeed the honourable member has raised very similar issues in this assembly on numerous prior occasions. I have said on those occasions that this is a matter in front of the Superior Court of Justice of Ontario. I think we should be respectful of that fact. This is a matter that should be determined by an independent, impartial trier of fact. It is not a matter that a politician who is partisan should determine, regardless of which side of the Legislative Assembly they happen to sit on. These are all facts that are in front of the court, and I have the utmost confidence that in due course they will make the right decision.

Mr Phillips: I realize that former Premier Harris has a civil case. But just because there are civil cases before the courts does not stop me from asking questions here in the Legislature and should not stop a public inquiry.

I want to raise a second point that the government has said. You have said that the protesters were illegal occupiers. You should be aware, Attorney General, that your own crown attorney was forced in court, when he acknowledged that you had evidence of a burial ground, to drop all of the charges against the protesters. In fact, it says here in your own document from your crown attorney, "Further, it has been clearly indicated by the provincial division judges at pretrials that this defence will succeed in all instances when it is raised," ie, of the burial ground, and therefore the crown withdraws all charges.

Again I say to you, you have said in the court document today that they were illegal occupiers, but your crown attorney was forced to drop the charges against these people in court because you had no evidence that they were there illegally. Why in the world are you putting out documents saying they were illegal occupiers when you yourself, the government, dropped the charges because you knew you had no evidence that they were illegal occupiers?

Hon Mr Young: I say again that this is not the appropriate forum to determine matters in dispute that are in front of the court. The honourable member has chosen a paragraph to refer to in what is indeed, as I have here, a 37-page factum that has been filed by the court. He's chosen to ignore all the other paragraphs. He's done so presumably because it advances his partisan case, his position.

I say to you, sir, with the greatest respect, we should leave this matter to the independent, impartial court that has been assigned to deal with it.

MUNICIPALITIES

Mr Steve Gilchrist (Scarborough East): My question is for the Associate Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing responsible for urban issues. As you know, Scarborough East is a predominantly urban riding. I must admit I'm pleased to hear the dialogue coming from the government concerning the vitality of urban centres all across this province. I believe it's important for those who live in urban areas to be assured that we, the Conservative government, have invested in strong communities that will remain globally competitive in the 21st century.

Minister, yesterday the federal government finally realized, through the Sgro report, that different urban regions actually have unique needs. Can you please tell this House how our government has already recognized the unique needs of urban communities across this province?

Hon Tina R. Molinari (Associate Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing): I thank the member for Scarborough East for his question and for his interest for his community. This is an important issue not only for the constituents of Scarborough East but for constituents in all of Ontario.

This year at the AMO conference, Premier Eves emphasized the need to respond to the challenges facing cities and urban centres. Our province is willing to join in the emerging dialogue as long as it addresses the real needs of our cities. The process surrounding this dialogue must involve all levels of government working toward co-operative, long-term solutions for municipalities rather than ad hoc, one-off solutions.

I am pleased to report that my urban forums have been an excellent way to better understand and address the issues of all the opportunities within the urban centres.

Mr Gilchrist: I'm certainly happy to hear you are making great progress meeting with representatives from urban municipalities across the province to better understand their issues. I'm also happy to hear that the government's commitments are being followed up by actions.

But yesterday the federal government laid out its plans for Canadian municipalities in the Sgro urban task force report. I have to admit I was encouraged by the direction that was taken to ensure our cities remain competitive globally. But knowing that Ontario gives $32 billion a year more to Ottawa than we get back, let me say it's high time the federal government recognized that they should be making reinvestments, in our province, the province that carries the rest of Confederation behind it.

Tell me, Minister, as you've been meeting with the people you described in those urban town hall meetings across the province, are they encouraged by the federal report and the federal Liberal promises?

Hon Mrs Molinari: We are encouraged by the direction the federal government laid out in the Sgro report. Our government agrees that the continued competitiveness in urban centres is important. We are pleased that the feds have also clearly recognized what we, the province, have been saying all along; that is, the feds have a significant role to play in the long-term needs in helping municipalities deal with infrastructure challenges.

We will continue to demand that the federal government play a greater role as a full partner to help fund infrastructure needs and that they are coordinated with the provincial governments and for municipal priorities. Our government looks forward to working in partnership with the federal government once they make long-term funding guarantees for municipalities. They must also recognize the fiscal imbalance that is existent between the federal government and the province of Ontario and all the provinces.

HAZARDOUS WASTE

Ms Caroline Di Cocco (Sarnia-Lambton): My question is for the Minister of the Environment. On November 6, I asked if you had stopped the tar pond sludge from Sydney, Nova Scotia, from being accepted into Ontario and dumped into the landfill in St Clair township. From the response you provided at the time, you obviously didn't understand the question, nor did you know your facts.

On November 8, 2002, the waste management branch of the environment ministry confirmed that the Brigden site near Sarnia is the only site in the province with a permit to bury untreated hazardous waste. I'd like to go further: it is the only place in North America that allows this type of dumping. So I'll ask you again: will you stop the highly toxic tar pond sludge from Sydney, Nova Scotia, from being dumped in Ontario?

Hon Chris Stockwell (Minister of the Environment, Government House Leader): The fact is that we have harmonized with the neighbouring jurisdictions our levels for dumping with respect to sludge. There is a certain requirement that anyone who wants to do that would have to meet according to Ontario provincial standards. The only way they can do the dumping is that they meet the Ontario provincial standards, which have been harmonized.

To put the case to the point, if you look back to the dumping in previous administrations, hazardous waste imports have now gone down by over 31%. Why did they go down 31%? Because we changed the regulations to force people who were trying to dump this sludge in the province to conform to tighter regulations that conform to other jurisdictions around us. So it's going down, and next year we expect it to go down again. Our regulations are tough, we've made them tougher and the fact of the matter is that they have been harmonized, something previous administrations didn't do.

Ms Di Cocco: Minister, you've harmonized it so well that we're trucking it in from Sydney, Nova Scotia. There's nothing closer that will take the waste. I'll tell you, you really are a piece of work. How is it in the best interests of Ontario to allow 9.3 million pounds of this highly toxic substance from the Domtar tanks in Sydney, Nova Scotia, to be dumped in Ontario? You tell me how that is in the best interests of the public and the best interests of the people of Ontario. Your ministry doesn't know that you've changed the regulations, and neither does the site in Brigden. Have you changed their certificate of approval? I don't think so. Minister, will you stop that substance from coming into Ontario?

Hon Mr Stockwell: Well, here's how the system works: you change it by regulation. The regulations were changed by this government to force any people who are importing this stuff to meet the requirements and regulations that the government has set down. We changed the regulations. That's why it has been reduced by 31%. The question that you put forward is that the staff doesn't know about this—

Interjection.

Hon Mr Stockwell: Oh, that's way out of order. I saw what she said. It was far worse than what my friend the minister said the other day, and I think you should stand up and withdraw that.

Mr Speaker, the honourable member did the honourable thing yesterday and withdrew. I think that honourable member should do the honourable thing and withdraw that comment.

Ms Di Cocco: On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I will withdraw the comment that I made.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): I thank the member, and the minister I think has about 10 seconds to wrap up.

Hon Mr Stockwell: What I want to say is that that material—and I'll go even further. If you have a community group that would like to meet with me so I can explain the new regulations and tell them all the work that we've done to make sure that this meets the requirements, I'll be happy to meet with that community and explain to them the process. I think we should get into direct dialogue between me and that community rather than you and that community, so I can get them educated.

INTERJURISDICTIONAL SUPPORT ORDERS

Mr John O'Toole (Durham): My question is to our Attorney General. Minister, I know that the people of Durham and the people of Ontario share your commitment that families and children who rely on support orders receive the payments they are entitled to. It's simply a question of fairness and respect, not the least of which is the law. I'm very disappointed that some individuals try to avoid their legal responsibilities by moving out of the province, indeed out of the country. These people feel that by leaving Ontario's borders they are able to turn their backs on their communities, perhaps their families, and indeed the law.

Minister, these people need to know that leaving Ontario—they should realize they can run but they can't hide from their obligations—

Interjections.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Order. We'll let the member speak. Order, please. We almost have—time's up, and the member wants to ask the question. I'll let the member start over again.

Mr O'Toole: Thank you, Mr Speaker.

The Speaker: You're almost done now.

Mr O'Toole: In that case, there's more to be said on this issue, but certainly I want to leave our Attorney General an appropriate amount of time to respond in defence, not just of the people of Durham, but in fact of Ontario. You can run but you can't hide from our Attorney General, and I can tell you that those individuals fleeing the law and the court orders are denying access to their families and their children.

What recent actions, Minister, have you taken to ensure that the money owed to these families will be collected regardless of where the parent lives? Indeed, Speaker, this is all about protecting children. I know our Attorney General wants to respond to this.

Hon David Young (Attorney General, minister responsible for native affairs): This is indeed an important point. I appreciate that it's the end of question period, but there are a lot of individuals across this province, and indeed across the country, who would be very interested in this very positive development.

No child should ever go without simply because one parent moves into another jurisdiction across this country, or for that matter anywhere. What we have done under the leadership of Premier Eves is we have brought forward legislation that was signed into law yesterday, Bill 131, the Interjurisdictional Support Orders Act, that will simplify the method by which parents in one jurisdiction can have support orders enforced in other jurisdictions. It is reciprocal. I'm very proud of that fact. I'm very proud of the fact that literally thousands of families will now find it easier to have those support orders honoured and to have the funds delivered to where they are supposed to be delivered, in most cases to some of the most vulnerable people in our society, young children.

NOTICE OF DISSATISFACTION

Mr Joseph Cordiano (York South-Weston): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I wish to express my dissatisfaction with the Premier's answer to my question today. I have filed the appropriate document challenging the Premier. I know he won't show up—but it would be different—to a late show.

Interjections.

Mr Cordiano: Why not? That would be the appropriate—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): I thank the member. He has filed that; that's very good. We will make sure that happens.

RESPONSES TO PETITIONS

Mr Michael Prue (Beaches-East York): Mr Speaker, on a point of order: On September 23, I tabled a petition in this House and it was to be responded to by the Minister of Housing. We have no response to date, and the 24 sessional days are long past. I am seeking that an answer be given.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): I thank the member for the point of order. The members will know that the requirement has gone past the time, I do believe, so the minister, hopefully, will get a chance to respond to that and I'm sure he will.

PETITIONS

HAZARDOUS WASTE

Mr David Ramsay (Timiskaming-Cochrane): I have a petition here signed by 8,080 people from Timiskaming-Cochrane in regard to Bennett Environmental toxic waste application.

"Whereas the Ontario Environmental Assessment Act has been significantly weakened with regard to the regulations concerning the siting of landfills, incinerators and other project proposals, thereby allowing northern Ontario to be unduly targeted as a waste zone; and

"Whereas American experience has show that all, even state-of-the-art, incinerators produce and emit dioxins, furons, lead, mercury and cadmium at levels that create significant measurable health impacts on the affected communities; and

"Whereas the proposed Bennett incinerator is in violation of the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment guidelines;

"We, the undersigned, petition you, as the Premier of the province of Ontario, to turn down the current application for the Bennett toxic waste incinerator proposed for Kirkland Lake; and

"We, the undersigned, further petition you, as Premier of the province of Ontario, to replace the current Environmental Assessment Act with legislation that gives affected communities a full environmental assessment including intervenor funding and a comprehensive and public hearing."

I will affix my signature to this.

CHILD CARE

Ms Shelley Martel (Nickel Belt): This petition has been sent to me by Jubilee Heritage Family Resources in Sudbury. It reads as follows:

"Whereas 70% of Ontario women with children under age 12 are in the paid workforce;

"Whereas high-quality, safe, affordable child care is critical to them and their families;

"Whereas the Early Years Study done for the Conservative government by Dr Fraser Mustard and the Honourable Margaret McCain concluded quality child care enhances early childhood development;

"Whereas this government has cut funding for regulated child care instead of supporting Ontario families by investing in early learning and care;

"Therefore, be it resolved that the Ontario government adopt the NDP's $10-a-day child care plan and begin implementation by reducing full child care fees to $10 a day for children aged two to five currently enrolled in regulated child care, by providing capital funds to expand existing child care centres and build new ones, by funding pay equity for staff, and by creating new $10-a-day child care spaces in the province."

I agree with the petitioners. I have affixed my signature to this.

HYDRO RATES

Mr Ted Arnott (Waterloo-Wellington): I'm presenting this petition on behalf of the member for Oakville. It reads as follows:

"Whereas the province has stated its commitment to ensuring affordable hydro rates for the citizens of Ontario;

"Whereas the province's recent move to deregulate hydro rates and place them within the competitive context of the open market has resulted in actual and high rate increases, including retroactive ones, for Ontarians, summer heat waves notwithstanding;

"Whereas these hydro rate increases, above and beyond what citizens have paid before deregulation, present a great burden to many young families and those who are on fixed incomes;

"Whereas the province itself admits that a review of hydro rates is necessary and has inaugurated one, albeit one with an overly lengthy mandate;

"We, the undersigned, petition the Parliament of Ontario as follows:

"That the province be directed to freeze hydro rates to last year's levels immediately during its current review of its deregulation policy and move forward to protect citizens of Ontario against such exorbitant rate hikes."

It's signed by many hundreds of constituents of the riding of Oakville. Might I add, the member for Oakville was absolutely right.

NATURAL GAS RATES

Mr Michael Gravelle (Thunder Bay-Superior North): I have more petitions related to the Union Gas retroactive delivery charge and the need for the government to act, which backs up the plea made earlier in the day by my colleague from Sudbury, Rick Bartolucci.

"To the Legislative Assembly of Ontario:

"Whereas the Ontario Energy Board has consented to allow Union Gas to retroactively charge $40 per month for a three-month period to recover additional system operation costs that occurred during the winter of 2000-01 totalling approximately $150 million;

"Whereas Union Gas will recover accrued costs over the peak heating season, causing undue hardship;

"Whereas this retroactive charge will affect all customers who receive Union Gas, including new homeowners and new customers to Union Gas;

"Therefore we demand that the Ernie Eves government issue a policy directive under section 27.1 of the Ontario Energy Board Act disallowing the retroactive rate hike granted to Union Gas, and we further demand that the Legislature examine the Ontario Energy Board, its processes and its resources, and make changes that will protect consumers from further retroactive rate increases."

I am strongly in support of this and am happy to sign my name. I will pass it off to Jared, one of our new pages. Thank you very much.

CUSTODIAL CARE

Mr Peter Kormos (Niagara Centre): I have a petition to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario.

"The regional council of Niagara have presented to the social services minister the following recommended changes to the legislation:

"(1) That the province of Ontario amend the Child and Family Services Act to recognize custodial care by extended family members as a legitimate intervention and that the related funding to support these care arrangements be made available;

"(2) That the temporary care allowance rate pursuant to the Ontario Works Act be altered to reflect established rates for similar care by foster parents;

"(3) That the regional municipality of Niagara, along with the Niagara Family and Children's Services, train their respective staff on the program options available to extended family members wishing to care for children;

"(4) That the region of Niagara, along with Family and Children's Services, advocate for the recommended changes with the Ministry of Community and Social Services as well as relevant associations, such as the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies;

"(5) That other consolidated municipal services managers be informed of this issue through circulation of this committee report;

"(6) That the province of Ontario be encouraged to consider a legislative change to permit open adoptions;

"(7) That the regional chair correspond with the Minister of Community and Social Services to advise the minister of these recommendations;

"We, the undersigned support these recommended changes to the legislation."

I of course have affixed my signature as well and I send it to you with page Brian from Sarnia.

SCHOOL BUS SAFETY

Mr Pat Hoy (Chatham-Kent Essex): To the Legislative Assembly of Ontario:

"Whereas some motorists are recklessly endangering the lives of children by not obeying the highway traffic law requiring them to stop for school buses with their warning lights activated;

"Whereas the current law has no teeth to protect the children who ride the school buses of Ontario, and who are at risk and their safety is in jeopardy;

"Whereas the current school bus law is difficult to enforce, since not only is a licence plate number required but positive identification of the driver and vehicle as well, which makes it extremely difficult to obtain a conviction;

"Therefore, be it resolved that we, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario as follows:

"That the measures contained in private member's Bill 112, An Act to amend the Highway Traffic Act to protect children while on school buses, presented by Pat Hoy, MPP, Chatham-Kent-Essex, be immediately enacted. Bill 112 received the unanimous all-party support of the Ontario Legislature at second reading on June 13, 2002.

"Bill 112 imposed liability on the owner of a vehicle who fails to stop for a school bus that has its overhead red signal lights flashing....

"And we ask for the support of all members of the Legislature."

I have affixed my name to this petition.

COMPETITIVE ELECTRICITY MARKET

Ms Shelley Martel (Nickel Belt): These petitions are from residents of Hamilton. They read as follows.

"To the Ontario Legislature:

"Whereas the Harris government's plan to privatize and deregulate Ontario's electricity system will lead to higher rates because private owners will sell more power to US customers whose rates are typically 50% higher than Ontario's; and

"Whereas selling coal plants like Nanticoke to the private sector will lead to more pollution because the private owners will run the plants at full capacity to earn a profit; and

"Whereas electricity deregulation in California has led to sky-high rates and blackouts; and

"Whereas Ontario needs a system of public power that will ensure rate stability, environmental protection and secure access to power;

"Therefore, be it resolved that the undersigned call on the government to scrap electricity deregulation and privatization and bring in a system of accountable public power. The first priority for such a public power system must be incentives for energy conservation and green power. Electricity rates and major energy projects must be subject to full public hearings and binding rulings by a public regulator instead of leaving energy rates to private profit."

I agree with the petitioners and I have affixed my signature to this.

HIGHWAY 69

Mr Rick Bartolucci (Sudbury): This is a continuing petition with regard to the multi-laning of Highway 69 between Sudbury and Parry Sound. It's to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario.

"Whereas modern highways are economic lifelines for the north; and

"Whereas the stretch of Highway 69 from Sudbury south to Parry Sound is a treacherous road with a trail of death and destruction; and

"Whereas the carnage on Highway 69 has been staggering; and"

Whereas in the last three years, 46 people have died on that stretch of highway between Sudbury and Parry Sound; and

Whereas so far this year 10 people have been tragically killed on that highway between Sudbury and Parry Sound; and

"Whereas the Harris-Eves government has shown gross irresponsibility in not four-laning the stretch of Highway 69 between Sudbury and Parry Sound; and

"Whereas immediate action is needed to prevent more needless loss of life; and"

Whereas the Premier of this province, Ernie Eves, will be in Sudbury tomorrow night; and

Whereas the community of Sudbury demand that the Premier of this province announce a start date for the four-laning of Highway 69 tomorrow night in Sudbury; and

"Whereas it is the responsibility of a government to provide safe roads for its citizens, and the Eves government has failed to do so;

"Be it resolved that we, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario to urge the Eves government to begin construction immediately and four-lane Highway 69 between Sudbury and Parry Sound so that the carnage on Death Road North will cease."

I affix my signature to this petition and give it to Lauren, our new page, to bring to the table.

KIDNEY DISEASE

Ms Shelley Martel (Nickel Belt): This petition is signed by people from Hamilton. It reads as follows:

"To the Legislative Assembly of Ontario:

"Whereas we, the undersigned residents of Ontario, draw the attention of the Legislature to the following:

"Whereas kidney disease is a huge and growing problem in Canada;

"Whereas real progress is being made in various ways of preventing and coping with kidney disease;

"We, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario to encourage the Canadian Institutes of Health Research to explicitly include kidney research as one of the institutes in its system, to be named the Institute of Kidney and Urinary Tract Diseases."

I have affixed my signature to this.

LONG-TERM CARE

Mr James J. Bradley (St Catharines): My petition is to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario.

"Whereas the Eves government has increased the fees paid for by seniors and the most vulnerable living in long-term-care facilities by 15% over three years, or $3.02 per diem in the first year and $2 in the second year and $2 in the third year, effective September 1, 2002; and

"Whereas this fee increase will cost seniors and our most vulnerable more than $200 a month after three years; and

"Whereas this increase is above the rent increase guidelines for tenants in the province of Ontario for 2002; and

"Whereas the long-term-care funding partnership has been based on government accepting the responsibility to fund the care and services that residents need; and

"Whereas government needs to increase long-term-care operating funding by $750 million over the next three years to raise the level of service for Ontario's long-term-care residents to those in Saskatchewan in 1999; and

"Whereas this province has been built by seniors who should be able to live out their lives with dignity, respect and comfort in this province;

"We, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario as follows:

"Demand that Premier Eves reduce the 15% increase over three years in accommodation costs to no more than the cost-of-living increase annually and the provincial government provide adequate funding for nursing and personal care to a level that is at least at the average standard for nursing and personal care in those 10 jurisdictions included in the government's own study."

I affix my signature. I'm in agreement with the petition.

COMPETITIVE ELECTRICITY MARKET

Mr Peter Kormos (Niagara Centre): This is a petition addressed to the government of Ontario.

"We, the undersigned residents of Ontario, recognize that:

"(1) Electricity rates in deregulated, private, for-profit markets such as Alberta and California fluctuate wildly in supply and price, and are a much higher price than in comparable public power systems;

"(2) Deregulation in California caused more blackouts than Ontario has suffered from ice storms or other natural disasters while public power has protected us from market fluctuations in supply as well as price;

"(3) At-cost electricity has helped build and support Ontario's economy, while deregulation would destabilize the economy, with soaring rates, reduced reliability and increased production costs leading to plant closures, job loss and economic decline;

"(4) Soaring electricity rates would put a significant burden on school boards, hospitals, public transit and other public services which cannot afford to pay double for their electricity;

"(5) Seniors and other members of our communities on fixed incomes would be hard-hit by increasing rates, and the living standards of millions of Ontarians will be harmed;

"(6) Privatization will trigger NAFTA provisions, making it practically impossible to reverse this dangerous experiment and would cost us Canadian control over electricity;

"(7) Privatization, deregulation and loss of sovereignty would close the door on public accountability of the industry in regard to environmental safety and energy security concerns; and

"(8) An alternative exists in the form of a truly accountable, transparent and affordable publicly owned and controlled system operated at cost for the benefit of all Ontarians;

"Therefore, we demand that the Ontario government immediately halt the planned privatization, sell-off and deregulation of the public electricity system."

I have affixed my signature as well, as has Ms Martel from northern Ontario, my colleague in the NDP caucus.

EDUCATION FUNDING

Mr David Caplan (Don Valley East): I have a petition to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario.

"Whereas the Progressive Conservative government promised in 1995 not to cut classroom spending, but has already cut at least $2 billion "from our schools and is now closing many classrooms completely; and

"Whereas international language weekend classes are a needed part of learning for many students in our neighbourhood; and

"Whereas the Education Act, specifically regulation 285(5), mandates provision of these programs where demand exists; and

"Whereas the Conservative government funding formula is forcing the Toronto District School Board to cancel these Saturday classes for groups who want this programming;

"Therefore, be it resolved that we, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario to instruct the Minister of Education to restore meaningful and flexible funding to the Toronto District School Board, to ensure that they are able to continue to accommodate these Saturday international languages classes."

I wholeheartedly agree with this petition, as do my colleagues, and I have affixed my signature to it.

OPPOSITION DAY

COMPETITIVE ELECTRICITY MARKET

The Deputy Speaker (Mr Bert Johnson): The Chair recognizes the leader of the third party, Mr Hampton from Rainy River.

Mr Howard Hampton (Kenora-Rainy River): I move the following resolution:

Be it resolved that skyrocketing hydro bills have shown beyond any doubt that Ontario's hydro system must be operated as a non-profit public service;

That no portion of Hydro One or Ontario Power Generation should be sold or otherwise transferred into the control of profit-seeking corporations;

That hydro bills for all customers, including the price of the electricity itself, must be regulated on the basis of power at cost by an independent public utilities commission;

That Ontario Power Generation should get back into the business of building generating capacity, starting with a major commitment to green power, conservation and efficiency but also including a significant amount of gas-fired power. Enough new generation should be built to allow all Ontario's coal-fired generating plants to be shut down by 2007. OPG's plans for new capacity should be subject to public review and a final decision by the independent public utilities commission; and

That it is now urgent to terminate the disastrous experiment with a so-called competitive market in electricity.

The Deputy Speaker: Mr Hampton has moved opposition day number 3. There was one misprint in mine. Should that be 2007?

Mr Hampton: Yes, 2007.

The Deputy Speaker: Thank you. The Chair recognizes the leader of the third party, from Kenora-Rainy River. I'm sorry to have missed the "Kenora" earlier.

1540

Mr Hampton: That's all right, Speaker. I know that as constituencies change with every federal redistribution, your constituency may disappear in this election.

I can think of no issue that is more urgent for people across this province. We have seen over the last four years a Conservative government tell the people of Ontario that privatizing our hydro system, turning what has been a not-for-profit hydro system into one that is owned by several profit-driven companies, and deregula-ting the price would be good for consumers. That was the government's line. In fact, they spent millions of dollars on television advertising campaigns, on newspaper advertising campaigns, telling people across the province that privatized, deregulated hydro would increase supply and lower the price.

For our part as New Democrats we pointed out time and time again to people that no matter where you look, privatized and deregulated hydroelectricity has indeed not worked very well. Certainly the instant examples that come to mind include the situation in California, where prices literally went through the roof and where there were rolling brownouts and blackouts. And we learned after the fact that there never really was an electricity shortage in California; it was just that when profit-making companies get their hands on the generation and supply of electricity, they have every incentive to engage in market manipulation, creating artificial electricity shortages and then driving up the price and gouging consumers. That happened in California, and people know about it.

Then we saw the episode in Alberta, where people literally saw, after deregulation and partial privatization of the system, that people's hydro bills went up 500%. Montana: people saw their hydro bills, after deregulation in the state, go up four times. If we want to look farther abroad, many parts of urban New Zealand went without hydroelectricity on a continuing brownout and blackout basis for months following hydro deregulation there. And then we have the case of Great Britain, where they essentially had to re-regulate the system in order to cut out some of the market manipulation, but the re-regulating of the system has meant that some of the companies that were in fact gouging consumers before are now bankrupt; British Energy comes to mind.

New Democrats pointed out time and time again that deregulation-privatization was not going to result in adequate or reliable or predictable supply of electricity; if anything it would create conditions of chaotic supply. And what do we have now? Today a report comes out from an independent body, the North American Electric Reliability Council. It's their winter report for 2002-03, and what do they say about Ontario? They say that the reserve capacity in Ontario, for those days when you have peak demand or peak need for electricity, isn't sufficient. They say that we've only got a 10% reserve supply. Even California has an oversupply of 20%. Quebec, next door to Ontario and which has not-for-profit, publicly owned hydroelectricity, has an over 18% reserve capacity. But following five years of this government's fascination with privatized, deregulated hydroelectricity in the province, we are in a situation where we could well face brownouts and blackouts this winter. Imagine, when it's 20 below zero or 30 below zero in a community in this province and the power goes off and there's no electric heat.

This government wants to pretend that's not a problem. In fact, this government believes that by mailing out some $75 rebate cheques they can cover up the problem, they can hide the problem. This government has created a very, very serious problem indeed, and merely mailing out some pre-election hydro rebate cheques, a sort of pre-election bribe to people, in the hope that they can cover up the problem by doing that just illustrates how bankrupt this government is in terms of its whole misguided hydro privatization and deregulation—completely bankrupt.

In the months of August, September and October, people across the province started to figure this out; in the months of June and July, they started figuring it out too. The government said there'd be lots of power, but the hydroelectric Independent Market Operator, about every second week during the summer, was putting out an advisory, "Please, consumers of Ontario, can you shut off the air conditioner? Can you stop using the electricity that you need, because we're in a brownout situation?"

It was very interesting in question period today. The Premier tried to deny that there had been brownouts. Somebody needs to inform the Premier that this summer the IMO categorically states there were no less than six brownouts in the province of Ontario. A brownout is defined as a situation where there is not enough electricity to meet the demand, and you then either face rolling voltage problems or you have to ask people to reduce their demand for electricity in order to avoid a real disaster. Somebody needs to inform the Premier that there were in fact six brownouts this summer.

In the summer you can perhaps deal with those without too serious consequences, but in the winter when it's 30 below, or colder in many communities in the province, and you face a brownout, that is very serious stuff indeed. This government needs to recognize that it is its misguided hydro privatization and deregulation scheme that has led us to this point and put people at this kind of risk.

The people discovered, this summer and this fall when they started getting their hydro bills, what hydro privatization and deregulation means when they started getting all these warnings from the IMO: "Please turn off your air conditioner. Please turn off your lights." I don't think the government's propaganda campaign is going to fool anyone. I don't think the $75 pre-election bribery cheque is going to fool anyone either.

People know what happened in Alberta. They know that the Premier had a tête-à-tête with Alberta Premier Ralph Klein two weeks ago. Ralph Klein told Premier Eves two weeks ago, "After the price of electricity went through the roof in Alberta following privatization and deregulation, we were in political trouble there too. But we just floated some pre-election rebate cheques and people swallowed it. And then after the election we ended the rebate cheques, and their hydro bills went through the roof—but we still got re-elected." That was the Alberta strategy.

It's very clear that Premier Eves and the Conservative government think the same pre-election bribery will work here in Ontario. But I have to tell you, I think Ontario people have been watching what happened in California, Alberta and Montana. People are aware that Montana, in the state elections two weeks ago, voted overwhelmingly to get rid of the deregulation scheme and re-regulate the price and supply of hydroelectricity in that state. So I don't think people are going to fall for this pre-election bribe, this $75 gift in the mail, just before the election.

There are very serious issues here that have to be addressed. I want to address them. Unlike our counterparts in the Liberal Party—it's hard to say what their policy is now on electricity. It was pretty clear, though, for four years there that they wanted to tell the public one thing; meanwhile, they were trolling up and down Bay Street telling the companies interested in private electricity, "Contribute money to the Liberal Party, because if we form the government we're going to continue privatization and deregulation." I think it's only as the Liberals have been found out, when the microphone has been pressed in their face and they've been forced to clarify their position, that they've move around a bit. It was interesting.

On Monday, the Liberals said that they were going to abandon privatization and deregulation of hydro, but on the same day a fundraising letter went out to those same Bay Street companies that want privatized and deregulated hydro, that want the hydro prices through the roof, and this letter, the same day the Liberals were out there saying, "We're opposed to deregulated hydro, opposed to selling off the hydro system," this fundraising letter is out there saying to the same companies that want privatized hydro and want deregulated hydro, "With Dalton McGuinty's Liberals, we'll get the plan Ontario needs to attract investments"—private investments in hydro. And then it says, "I urge you to contribute today. Your maximum annual contribution to the Ontario Liberal fund is $7,500 with the opportunity to donate an additional $5,000 to individual riding associations."

They're still doing it. They are still telling the public of Ontario, or trying to tell them, that they are opposed to hydro privatization and deregulation, but then they're out there trolling up and down Bay Street saying to the same companies that want privatized hydro and want deregulated hydro, "Send your cheques to the Liberal Party. Wink, wink, nudge, nudge. After the next election, if the Liberals form the government, don't worry, hydro privatization and hydro deregulation will continue."

Talk about duplicity. Talk about saying one thing on Main Street and the opposite thing on Bay Street. The Liberals continue to think they'll get away with that. I've got news for you. You, the Conservative government, won't get away with a pre-election bribe, and the Liberals won't get away with telling two different stories, one to the consumers who don't want hydro privatization and another to the investors who want it so badly. Neither of you will get away with it.

What do we need to do? I want to point out, for all those people who hear this propaganda that you should privatize and deregulate hydro, look at Hydro-Québec, in the province immediately to the east of us. Quebec isn't privatizing or deregulating their hydro. Quebec recognizes that the supply of hydroelectricity is something that is fundamentally essential to the operation of their economy, fundamentally essential to people in their daily lives and to the schools and the hospitals and the colleges and the universities, and that something that is a fundamental public necessity should not be put in the hands of profit-driven corporations that will have every incentive in the world to create artificial electricity shortages so they can drive up the price and make more profit. Quebec recognizes that this public necessity should be kept in public hands and operated on a not-for-profit basis so that people will be able to afford to turn on the lights and turn on the heat. When it's 30 below in the winter, by God, they'd better be able to turn on the lights and turn on the heat.

Manitoba, to the west of us: Manitoba isn't privatizing their hydro. Manitoba Hydro is publicly owned, publicly operated, not-for-profit, and has the lowest electricity rates in North America. Imagine that. When in my constituency of Kenora-Rainy River, people in Kenora were getting hydro bills this summer, they expected a hydro bill for $80, which is what it had been in the past, but they got one for $160. And then they'd phone up their son or daughter or niece or nephew in Winnipeg and say, "What are you paying for hydro in Winnipeg?" And they would say, "We have the lowest prices in North America. Our system operates on a non-profit basis. We don't have to worry in Manitoba about Enrons trying to force up the price." They don't have to worry in Manitoba about Brascan funding the Premier's leadership contest to the tune of $140,000 and then driving up the price of electricity in places like Wawa or Sault Ste Marie. They don't have to worry about those situations.

I just say to the people of Ontario, no matter where you look in this fiasco of hydro privatization and deregulation, a number of things happen. One, the supply of electricity becomes more chaotic. If I were a profit-driven hydro company, would I want to build new supply if I could create an artificial electricity shortage and then drive up the price? No, I'd want to have a situation where in fact there was almost a chronic shortage of electricity. I'd want the highest prices possible. That's how I'd line my pockets; that's how I'd make a lot of profit.

Wherever you find privatized, deregulated hydro systems, the supply of electricity—what you need when it's 40 below, what you need when it's midnight and you need some lights—is chaotic. The other thing that happens in a privatized, deregulated system, as people in Ontario found out, is that the price goes up. Why? Because the generating company wants a profit. If they can make a 40% profit, good. If they can make a 50% profit, if they can double the price and make a 100% profit, they'll do it. Then the transmission company wants a profit. If they can get 15% or 20%, they'll take it. And the distribution company wants a profit. If they can make 15% or 20% profit, they'll add that to the bill.

Then you've got the door-to-door electricity marketers that this government has brought into Ontario. You know, Direct Energy, that literally went to people's doorsteps and lied to them to get them to sign contracts, that forged contracts. People discovered after they had listened to the flim-flam that they were going to be paying at least 40% more for the raw price of electricity. Imagine when people got their hydro bill, expecting it would go down, and it doubled. So when you add in all these new profit-takers, fee-takers, commission-takers and then the people standing in the background, the Bay Street people who want their fee, it's no wonder people's hydro bills doubled. That's the difference between not-for-profit hydro and a hydro bill where you've got eight or nine profit-takers, fee-takers and commission-takers who are all trying to get into the consumer's pocket. That's what people have discovered here in Ontario.

What do we need to do? Again I make this point to people: this is an essential public service. It is a public necessity. It's not like buying a car. If General Motors, Ford, Chrysler, Honda, Toyota and all the rest doubled the price of cars next week, as a consumer I would still have a choice. I could say to them, "I'll keep my old car and fix it up," or I could say, "I'll buy a second-hand car," or I could talk to my colleague here from Niagara Centre and say, "We'll car pool for a while. But I'll be damned if I'm going to get ripped off by somebody who's doubled the price of cars." Do you know what? Those cars would sit there on the lot for six months or seven months until they brought the price down.

It's not like that with electricity. First of all, you can't store electricity on the lot. Second of all, I need it every day. Try to run your refrigerator without having electricity every day. See what happens to the safety of your food. Try running your furnace at 40 below when you don't have electricity and see what happens. That's the reality of electricity. It's a necessity every day. You can't store it, and you can't say, "Because you've doubled the price, I'm not going to buy any for a week."

The other reality is that it takes four, five or six years to bring on new supply. So when you privatize and deregulate the market and the Enrons and the Mirants and the others jack up the price, what are consumers supposed to do for six years? Get down on their knees while the private companies jack up the price? Or, the other side of things, the government announced last week, much for the cameras—actually I think they made the announcement for Hydrozilla—that they were going to engage in some kind of immediate conservation plan. The reality of hydro electricity is that you can't implement some sort of immediate conservation plan. If you are going to have an effective, workable conservation plan, it has to be something that you implement over a period of time and that you work at consistently for a period of time.

So Hydrozilla really did quite enjoy this bogus, phony, public relations announcement by the government, where they drove up in a car fuelled by bacon fat as if to suggest to people that bacon fat was the answer to high electricity prices. You know, this government thinks a pork barrel will do many things. But a pork barrel will not get us out of the privatized, deregulated hydro mess they've created.

What do we need to do? I just want to lay it out here straight. The Liberals can flip-flop and the Conservatives can try to hide and cover up, but what we need to do is to get all the profit-takers, fee-takers and commission-takers out of the system. We need to recognize that hydro is a public necessity and should be provided on a not-for-profit basis across the province. That's what New Democrats would do. We would pass immediate legislation telling the Direct Energys who have been lying to people and manipulating people on the doorstep, "Get out of the province. We don't want you." I realize that would be some sacrifice to the Conservative Party, because Direct Energy has made a number of financial contributions to the Conservative Party. But I'm sorry, fellas, you just have to suffer. The needs of electricity consumers, the needs of the Ontario people come before your need for money—payola—from Direct Energy. So you get rid of the profit-takers.

The second thing we need to do is re-regulate the price so it is power-at-cost, not power-at-cost plus 40% profit or commission.

The third thing we need to do is stop privatization, stop selling off what are essential assets for the province, the most important economic assets for us in terms of the fundamental underpinning of the economy. Initially, the government tried to say, "The reason you have to sell off hydro is because hydro has a debt." Yes, hydro has a debt. The reason hydro has a debt is because Conservative governments that this crew doesn't want to think about, doesn't want to remember, had this deep love affair with nuclear power. They thought, in the late 1970s and early 1980s that nuclear plants would be cheap to build, would require no maintenance, and you didn't have to worry about storing the nuclear waste—that wasn't a problem—and you didn't have to worry about the cost of decommissioning the nuclear plants when they reached the end of their lifetime. That was the Conservative line then. So they started building a lot of nuclear plants.

Just as an illustration of where the debt comes from, the Conservatives in 1978-79, when they proposed Darlington, said, "It will cost less than $5 billion." They said it would cost less than $5 billion. In 1989, when it was finished, the final price was $15 billion. I have to be very clear here. The Conservatives started Darlington; the Liberals, between 1985 and 1990 also got on the nuclear bandwagon.

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, Minister responsible for francophone affairs): Did you support them?

Mr Hampton: The Minister of Energy wants to know, what was the NDP position? We voted against it. We consistently voted against it.

Hon Mr Baird: You propped them up.

Mr Hampton: No, between 1985 and 1987 Darlington was actually discontinued. After the Liberals got a majority government in 1987, then they started rebuilding it. I just want that to be clearly on the record.

The first thing we discovered is that the cost of nuclear power, of building it, was tens of billions of dollars more than they'd first anticipated. The second thing learned was that the cost of maintaining these nuclear plants on a year-to-year basis came to hundreds of millions of dollars in maintenance; they aren't maintenance-free. And now the bill starts to come home for storing the nuclear waste and for decommissioning those nuclear plants.

So who built up the debt at Ontario Hydro? None other than the same Conservative outfit that thought they had a fast answer then, the same Conservative government that now says to the people of Ontario, "We'll send you a $75 rebate cheque. Just pretend that there's no problem out there. Just pretend that hydro prices didn't go through the roof. Just pretend that the IMO didn't tell people this summer there were six brownouts. Just pretend that the North American Electric Reliability Council isn't telling people that brownouts and blackouts this winter aren't a real risk in Ontario."

The government says you have to privatize because Ontario's hydro system has a debt. Here's the government solution: they stick the people of Ontario with the debt and then they turn the Hydro assets over to private companies that get to collect the profit.

It's like this, Speaker: imagine if you bought a new home and took out a $100,000 mortgage, and then the Conservative government came to you and said, "Speaker, move out of your home. Let someone else live in it, but you continue to pay the debt." That's this government's answer with respect to hydro. They want to sell the assets so that British Energy and Brascan get to take the profit, but the people of Ontario get stuck with the debt. What an absurd scenario. People get it at both ends. They have to pay the higher cost of privatized hydro, but then they have to pay the debt that's left behind as well.

The government says that's a sound policy, but it's not. I just want to recite for government members the statements of the former—he's still the chair of Ontario Power Generation. He is the chair appointed by the Conservatives to Ontario Power Generation. His name is Bill Farlinger. In 1995 in the Hydro annual report he actually comes out and says that in fact, as a result of some of the changes that were made in 1992, 1993 and 1994, Hydro's debt is being paid down, that the pay-down of the debt is accelerating and will continue. Hydro's debt was actually being paid down. There is no magic answer in privatizing it, sticking the people with the debt and then the private owners with the profit.

I just want to point out something else. It's reported in the media that a number of the private, for-profit hydro companies across North America are having huge problems having their debt refinanced. This wonderful solution that the government proposed, that somehow privatizing answers all the questions, clearly isn't the answer. The private hydro companies—Duke Energy, Mirant—many of them are facing bankruptcy this year because they can't finance their debt.

Ms Shelley Martel (Nickel Belt): Look at British Energy.

Mr Hampton: British Energy comes to mind. It was supposed to be the answer for this government in terms of leasing out the Bruce nuclear facility. Now we find that British Energy is technically bankrupt. It's only being held afloat by an emergency loan from the British government.

New Democrats want to be very clear: hydroelectricity is an essential public service. It should not be privatized. It should not be put in the hands of foreign corporations. It needs to be publicly owned. It needs to provide hydro at cost, not at cost plus all the profit-takers and fee-takers this government has brought into the system. We need to focus overwhelmingly on a long-term conservation strategy, not just one that's done for the television cameras and for the benefit of hydro zealots; a long-term conservation strategy that looks at retrofitting buildings and homes that are not energy-efficient.

We need to look at retrofitting some of our power dams as well, because the turbines in many cases were built 30 and 40 years ago. More modern turbines will in fact increase the output of electricity at very little additional cost. We need to move on, as Manitoba and Quebec are, doing research and allocation programs for wind turbine energy, actually physically locating the sites and starting to build the plants.

This should be done publicly. It must be done on a non-profit basis so the people of Ontario will continue to enjoy environmentally responsible electricity, affordable electricity and a reliable supply of electricity, free of the profit-takers, fee-takers, commission-takers and parasites this government has brought into the system.

Mr Steve Gilchrist (Scarborough East): I'm very pleased to have an opportunity to respond to the comments made by the Leader of the Opposition and to the opposition day motion.

I guess we breathed a sigh of relief when the Clerk was corrected. The original motion read that he wanted all the new generation in place to allow coal-fired plants to be shut down by 2001. Even for the NDP, the idea of sucking back all the pollution that has gone out in the last year would be a little obtuse and extreme, to say the least. But we're dealing here with probably as great a contradiction in one resolution as we have ever seen in all the years that my colleagues have been here in the Legislature.

In the same breath Mr Hampton suggests that we need to stop doing anything to bring competition to the marketplace, we have to stop attracting private money, private expertise, the most advanced technology that's in place in countries all around the world, and instead we want to go back to that hidebound monopoly that did such a masterful job of providing electricity that its greatest legacy is a $38-billion debt. Three thousand dollars is owed by every man, woman and child in this province for the electricity that we used this past year, this past decade, in fact going all the way back to the late 1960s.

Mr Hampton suggests that there is an option out there to sell electricity at cost, that if we go back to the future, if we go back to that tired old model, that monopoly, the dinosaur that served Ontario so poorly for certainly the last 30 years, somehow we're going to have a panacea out here that there is going to be all sorts of new generation and new creativity.

That is not what we're seeing. The greatest contrast, and we haven't heard it from a single member of the NDP or of the Liberal Party for that matter, is the fact that the only significant asset that was owned by the old Ontario Hydro that has been leased or sold to the private sector is the reactors up near Kincardine, known as the Bruce nuclear facility. That facility has six reactors. Four of them are functioning; two of them are laid up. They are laid up as a result of the extraordinary lack of proper maintenance, the lack of discipline, a number of problems that under the old Ontario Hydro had rendered them not only uneconomical to operate, but in one case OPG definitively, in writing, said one of those reactors could never be made to work again. It had suffered an accident as a result of human negligence and it was absolutely a write-off.

You would ask yourself, why would any company, why would anyone in their right mind, put hundreds of millions of dollars to lease a facility if in fact all it boasted was reactors that could never work again? Well, by applying the same kind of technology that allowed them to upgrade many reactors over in Great Britain, the new lessee, British Energy, put their own money in, brought the new technology in, and at a fraction of what that great public utility Mr Hampton is trumpeting here today has spent down at Pickering. On budget, on schedule, those two reactors that have been laid up since 1997—yes, including the one that would never work again, according to OPG—will be operational this coming spring, the first one probably late spring, the second one a few weeks later in the early summer, adding in each case 769 megawatts of power, between them enough power to supply the needs of almost half the city of Toronto.

It gets better than that. This resolution suggests that only by giving more money, going back to the monopoly of Ontario Hydro, making sure no one else ever darkens our door who might have a new or better way to bring efficiencies to the generation of electricity—Mr Hampton should be challenged by the reality that if he went to Sarnia, if he actually took that diesel-powered bus in which he's been touring the province, trying to whip people into a frenzy about the state of electricity in this province—driving, I might again suggest, a vehicle with the dirtiest form of motive fuels that are used in this country, again a contradiction if ever there was one.

If in fact he'd headed over toward Sarnia, he would have seen that the TransAlta natural gas cogeneration facility is already up and running, undergoing its trial tests. It's going to come on-line, fully, early in the new year: another 490 megawatts of power.

Down near Brighton Beach, you'd find that ATCO, in a partnership with Ontario Power Generation—but you can guess who's coming up with the money and the drive—they've got another natural gas facility that will be up and running one year later: another 578 megawatts of power.

I've got to tell you that any one of these new operations would have given enough breathing room this past summer to have reduced our reliance on foreign—including the province of Quebec—sources of electricity to something in the neighbourhood of only 26 days this entire year. You would have seen far greater price stability, and that's what we had always expected when the original date for the opening of the marketplace was selected well back in 2001.

Unfortunately, the commitments made to us, again by the publicly owned utility, as to when the reactors in Pickering would come on-line proved to be, to be kind, less than accurate.

The minister has responded by laying down the law with OPG and suggesting that an external review is going to be applied to find out precisely why, in stark contrast to the private sector, in stark contrast to the extraordinary success that is the operation of the Bruce nuclear facility, Pickering continues to miss its deadlines and continues to see taxpayers' money going down into a black hole, a black hole that was supposed to have been filled after $1.1 billion and now we're told might gobble up two and a half times that.

Oh, I left something else out that really should be on the record when we're talking about the difference between the private operations and the publicly owned operations of nuclear reactors in this province. In that same barely two-year period that British Energy has been operating those nuclear facilities up in Kincardine, they have taken that entire complex, and working in partnership with the Power Workers' Union, one of the shareholders in the company, active participants in the crusade to bring private sector involvement into electricity generation in this province, together they have taken that facility and have now made it the most efficient Candu nuclear reactor anywhere in the world—in the entire world. That means that of the publicly owned electricity operators in Argentina, in India, in Romania, in South Korea, in New Brunswick, and yes, here in the province of Ontario, not one of them is able to get as much power out of a Candu reactor as the one private sector operator is doing up at Bruce.

I don't know why the facts continue to be lost on the NDP and, for that matter, the official opposition. Because you know, this is called opposition day, and I know the author of this resolution happens to be from one of the two opposition parties. But I was struck by the most recent flip-flop in the Liberal electricity policy.

I'm sure you heard yesterday, Mr Speaker, that anyone going on the Liberal Party Web site would have just seen a little note saying, "Comin' soon. We had an energy policy up until yesterday, but unfortunately our leader went out into the scrum and managed to fit both feet into his mouth at the same time." And scant minutes—minutes—after standing in his place, not once or twice, but eight or nine times, with questions and supplementary questions and castigating the government for putting in place a price cap and suggesting it was unworkable, and damning the government for proceeding with certain aspects but changing other aspects of the original vision we had in the marketplace based on the supply we thought would be there, Mr McGuinty took a couple of steps outside this chamber and proceeded to take diametrically opposed positions on the very questions he was posing in this chamber. I don't think the electorate is so blind that it won't notice such a stark contrast. If that wasn't bad enough, they patched things up today. If you go on the Liberal Web site, you'll find they have an electricity policy. Again, you have to be somewhat tolerant, because this has been cobbled together in less than 24 hours. I know one of their members suggested our policy was written on the back of an envelope. I would think theirs has been scribbled out on the back of one of the Orders and Notices motions here in the time it took somebody to run upstairs to their Web master after listening to Mr McGuinty's scrum.

When you go through this, it's really quite staggering. In the one breath they say they're going to keep the caps in place, and unlike the very specific recommendations our government has now made to promote green power, to get people committed to investments in wind, solar, biomass and geothermal—not airy-fairy speculation but tax incentives, tough new product standards, inducements to buy energy-efficient equipment—the Liberal Party has said, "We absolutely believe everything else the Tories are saying is good. We'd put the price caps on there and take time to review things." They even have, I think, a fairly glowing testimonial to the changes we've made to encourage green power. To give them credit, they don't suggest this is an original thought on their part.

But I think you've got to be struck by one section in particular. Without in any way coming up with concrete, specific suggestions—they don't say what taxes they'll cut, they don't say what technology they will promote—they're going to take 20% of all the electricity supply out of the marketplace less than one year, in fact seven months, after the price caps are removed, and somehow they think the prices are going to remain the same. I don't know how long members of the Liberal Party have been shopping for various products, but I would think it's fair to suggest that any time the demand stays the same and all of a sudden 20% of the supply in the marketplace is withdrawn, even they know that prices will go up, and not by a little bit.

Mr Hampton, in a question earlier today, tried to make it sound like a bad thing that the North American Electricity Reliability Council, which is a group composed of the utilities, large users, the federal regulators for electricity in the United States and many of the provincial regulators, has suggested there will be fully a 10% surplus in the amount of power available here in Ontario over the coming winter. He suggested 10% isn't good enough. If I had another hour, we could go into great detail about why traditionally the margin has been more like 2% or 3% and going to 10% is an extraordinary step forward, and that too does not recognize all those other facilities that I suggested would be opening by the springtime and early summer.

At the same time he's suggesting that 10% isn't good enough, we've got the Liberal Party suggesting they can take 20% like that—like that—out of the available supply to consumers and small businesses across Ontario and it won't do anything to drive up the price.

I will say to my colleagues in both parties that I will be opposing this resolution, not because it doesn't have some elements—again, the NDP goes on to flatter us. Remember this was tabled this week; that is, a full week after the government already announced what we're doing for clean, green power, already announced what we're doing to promote energy conservation, already announced that we're shutting down all the coal plants by 2015 but in the interim are going to be encouraging green power and, as we get more green power, obviously we'll need less coal power.

I don't want to suggest there aren't some elements, but it is absolutely ridiculous to suggest that the balance of this resolution has any merit. It is the private sector that has demonstrated the only efficiencies and effectiveness in rehabilitating reactors. They have demonstrated the greatest efficiency in operating reactors that were already up and running. They have demonstrated a willingness to make investments here in Ontario. I can tell you that this past week, after our announcements of the tax incentives, the wind and water power associations in particular have identified over 2,000 megawatts of new development that will be coming forward, that will be adding to supply, that will be driving down prices, that will be guaranteeing that we have cleaner electricity generation than has ever occurred in this province or that certainly hasn't occurred since the 1950s, when we started coal plants and, latterly, oil and natural gas plants.

There is a vision that takes Ontario to adequate supply, to clean air, to choices, to competition, that will always moderate and drive down prices. Only the government has offered that plan with any specific details.

The members opposite each had five years to bring their vision of how electricity could be generated better, cleaner and with greater supply in this province, and both failed miserably. Both allowed the debt of Hydro to reach astronomical proportions. Both allowed the air to get dirtier under the watches of Mr Bradley and Ms Churley. In both cases, we increased our use of coal.

This government has drawn a line in the sand. We were the first party to announce the closure of any coal plant. We are still the only party that has supplied any specificity, that has supplied any detail, that has told people how we're going to get from here to there.

So forget glib resolutions that try and cover all the bases, and forget the flip-flopping we are seeing from the official opposition. People can trust that the vision Premier Eves has brought to the table this past week is the one that is going to take us to a stable, secure, clean and adequate supply of electricity for decades to come.

Mr James J. Bradley (St Catharines): I find it most amusing to watch a lecture by a member of the government about flip-flopping on anything after the colossal flip-flop I saw by this government last week. I actually predicted it.

People were saying, "What do you think they're going to do?" I say to my good friend Mr Turnbull I said, "Don't be surprised if it's a 180-degree turn."

They said, "No, it can't be. It's a Conservative government. They have extolled the virtues of the wide open market of deregulation, of all kinds of privatization. They wanted to sell off Hydro One. They wanted to sell off OPG."

I said, "No, do not be surprised. You will see a complete reversal."

So when I hear a lecture from the government side about flip-flopping, I say to my friend from Oxford, I saw them out there, bringing in a trampoline for the Premier so he could do his flip-flop in Mississauga. There was a trampoline just outside that house he went to in Mississauga and was reading the teleprompter as to what he was going to say.

So there are no lectures. You could say a lot of things, if you want, but the last thing we need from government members today is a lecture on flip-flopping on anything. We saw, as one person said, the government go from right-wing idealogues to almost socialists on the other hand. It must make some of the government members shudder to think of this.

People asked me, "Do you think they'll put a price cap on?" I said, "Sure they will."

They said, "No, they won't, because they'll know that the wholesale price is going to be much higher than the retail price."

Hon David Turnbull (Associate Minister of Enterprise, Opportunity and Innovation): What are you going to do?

Mr Bradley: I'm just telling you what I said was going to happen.

I said, "There'll price caps and they'll be rolling out the rebates. I don't think it'll have anything to do with an upcoming election at all. I don't think their timing will be anything to do with an election, surely."

Mr Marcel Beaubien (Lambton-Kent-Middlesex): Are you running again?

Mr Bradley: The member from Lambton says it probably is going to be and so I suspect that's what's going to happen.

I was listening to your favourite radio station, I say to my friend from Don Valley West. You can guess which station that was—government radio, as some people say—CFRB. They were talking about flip-flops. I was going to call in and try to sound like Chris Stockwell phoning in, with his voice, but I couldn't quite match it, to tell them, "Had you missed something? Had you not seen the action in Mississauga on that particular day?" So I find it amusing. Everybody's got all these quotes that are rather interesting to read back to one another, but all I say is: please, no lectures from the other side after the mammoth flip-flop that Premier Eves initiated on behalf of the government on this issue. I think what it points out is how complicated the issue is and how governments can do a major change in policy almost overnight.

I should tell some of my friends on the government side that I was down to the edge of the Niagara River again. I've been down there many times to extol the virtues of proceeding with more generation at Niagara Falls, a project we call Beck 3. Every time I mention it to any of the government members they said: "Well, of course, it can't be done because it costs too much." I think even the former energy minister must have said that at some time or other. He denies it, but I think it's just that his recollection is fading a bit in these days of Kyoto.

I wanted to mention that Dalton McGuinty and I were down at the Niagara River again asking that the government proceed with Beck 3. That was just a few weeks ago that we were down there. The government members were saying: "Well, this is not possible." My good friend Steve Gilchrist, member for Scarborough East, said the following: "Beck 3 was stopped for a very good reason." He said that on September 30, 2002. Back in September they were arguing that, "Ontario Power Generation can't deliver Beck 3 without having its power costs more than 4.5 cents a kilowatt hour. If the competitive market keeps the price of power below that, Beck 3 would inflict a 20- or 40-year legacy of loss on taxpayers." That's again Steve Gilchrist, September 30.

So what I wondered was how on earth I could go down to Niagara Falls, where the Maid of the Mist launching pad is, and see the Minister of Energy announcing Beck 3, which his own members had denounced just a few weeks before. Well, what had happened was, panic had set in on the government benches. Some of the smart political operators—I'm sure my friend from Etobicoke Centre would be one of those because, if anything else, he's a smart political operator. I don't know about environment minister, but he's a smart political operator. He would have been counselling, along with some of the others, "It's time we turned this train around and headed in the opposite direction." And so they did. Even on Beck 3, which they were denouncing a few weeks before, they changed their minds. They were saying all this stuff about energy conservation—"It's not going to work." I think the members of the select committee might have thought it would, but some of the others were dismissing it out of hand. All of a sudden, the next week we have this announcement in Mississauga and rolled out over the next few days about government energy conservation, alternative fuels, and five or six other things. What we find out of course is that the government, in full panic mode, changed its policy completely.

Now, you say, what has to happen out there? I watched them follow the pattern of, first of all, Walkerton. They blamed the NDP. Some of my colleagues might join in that, but the government blamed the NDP. They said: "They're at fault for it." Then they blamed Floyd Laughren, who was the Chair of the Ontario Energy Board. Everybody knows that the government of Ontario dictates the conditions under which the Chair of the energy board works. The energy board doesn't have much flexibility. It works under the mandate that is set up by this government. They appoint everybody to the energy board. Then they blame the local utilities for raising the prices. They were looking for everybody to blame, when in fact their own backbenchers were saying that the government was to blame. That's why we saw this complete reversal on the part of the government.

Well, there's only one option that's going to be left in the foreseeable future, and that is, like them or not, the major player is going to be what I still call Ontario Hydro. Heaven knows, anybody who has sat in government, particularly in a cabinet position in the past, knows the record of Ontario Hydro when it comes to the environment, when it comes to the cost of producing electricity and so on, and when it comes to providing—shall I be kind and say "complete"—information to members of cabinet, to Premiers and to members of the Legislature, because not all the information was complete or, again, I'll use the word "accurate" because we can't use other terminology in this House. So we are stuck with that. When the government made this major change last week, it really leaves no alternative but to move in that direction.

Does that mean that we can't have some green energy companies come on-line? I hope not, because we—and the Chair of the select committee on alternative fuels is in the House. He would remember some of these non-profit, green-energy-type companies that wanted to get some juice on the grid.

Hon Chris Stockwell (Minister of the Environment, Government House Leader): NUGs.

Mr Bradley: "NUGs" is the terminology used: non-utility generating systems. I think that's what that stands for. Also I think there's going to be a place for cogeneration obviously coming up as well. So there are many ideas. I think conservation is going to be exceedingly important now.

One of the things we talked about on our select committee on alternative fuels was dealing with demand. I know some people who are skeptical about environmental things tend to discredit efforts at energy conservation. I see the Minister of the Environment trying to write a message on there. I know he can't hold it up because that would be against the rules, but the message is about that. Yes, and I want to say he is a person who, if he had his way, obviously would be burning coal from now until the end of this century. However, we know that he has promised to close one plant, which we will have closed—that is, the plant just outside the city of Toronto.

The government did everything it could to thwart any plans to close the plants by 2007—not with your government, because you're not going to make those plans—but you will see a major change in attitude: a massive conservation program; alternative fuels being provided; natural gas being provided for electricity out there and all of the other fuels that my friend the Chair of the select committee on alternative fuels knows exist. If that one machine works that will retain electricity and not lose that electricity, we could be in very good shape indeed.

Someone in the whip's office will tell me when I'm supposed to sit down in this regard. Is it yet?

Mr David Caplan (Don Valley East): No, you've got a minute and a half.

Mr Bradley: I have a minute and a half yet to extol the virtues of our committee, because we're together on that.

I believe that, for instance, wind turbines are going to be very viable. I believe that we're going to see solar power in this province. I believe that we can use a taxing mechanism which will help to bring this on. We recommended that as a committee. I believe we don't have to increase the rates by some 40%, as happened under the previous government. I believe that we should be renegotiating those contracts with the province of Alberta, contracts which were terminated by the Rae administration, because I think those contracts which were at very favourable prices with hydroelectric were good. I think the transmission lines to both the province of Quebec and the province of Manitoba are going to be an important component of what we are doing.

What we have witnessed is a complete reversal on the part of the government, which has changed all the rules of the game completely. We now must proceed, whether we like it or not, putting most of our eggs in the basket of Ontario Hydro. It's going to need much more supervision, very careful supervision and direction, if we're not to have those huge wastes of money taking place, if we're not to see the continued pollution that exists in Ontario, and if we're not to see these grandiose plans, again, not coming to fruition but still costing the province a lot of money.

I think this resolution points generally in that particular direction, and for that reason I believe it probably commends itself to the support of the members of this House.

Ms Martel: It's a pleasure for me to participate in the debate today, obviously because it's our opposition day motion and I'm supportive of it, but I really do believe that electricity—the price of, the supply of—is really top of mind for consumers these days. So it's quite appropriate that we are, as New Democrats, using our opposition day to highlight once again our ongoing commitment to public power at cost, which has been our commitment from the day this government brought in Bill 35, and we have not wavered in our position from that.

It's also very important that we put out some of the alternatives and other things we need to do in an electricity system that is managed in a non-profit way. I think that the opposition day motion my leader has outlined speaks to some very important issues. I know he spent some good time outlining them, so I will not go over all of them in detail.

Where I want to start from is the announcement made by the government on November 11. As I listened to some of the details trickle out on CBC as I was driving down from my last Remembrance Day service, I thought to myself, "If there was ever a reason to abandon hydro privatization and deregulation, it came with Monday's announcement." If there was ever an admission by this government that the dirty deal of hydro privatization and deregulation hasn't worked in Ontario, it came with the announcement on November 11.

It hasn't worked just in Ontario—and that is clear—it hasn't worked in Alberta, it hasn't worked in California, it hasn't worked in Montana, it hasn't worked in the UK. Why did the Conservative Party think it was going to work here? The problem is that the Conservative Party was so busy trying to kowtow to some of its major financiers of election campaigns that it was quite prepared to put our supply at risk and see consumers gouged with high energy prices. It is only because of the crisis that finally erupted in this province with respect to the high hydro bills consumers and small businesses were receiving that this government finally had to intervene.

Isn't it interesting? Here's a government intervening in a massive way in a system that they said needed to be competitive. I was at more than one of the public hearings on Bill 35, the government bill that led to this fiasco of hydro privatization and deregulation. I was there when the parliamentary assistant, Ms Johns, repeated over and over that competition in the electricity marketplace was going to lead to lower rates—lower rates—for consumers and small businesses. She said it time and again at those public hearings.

At every opportunity we had at those public hearings on Bill 35, our party—Mr Lessard, who was the critic at the time—moved a motion to say the government should then incorporate that into the law. If the government was so confident that privatization and deregulation of hydro was going to lead to lower rates, then put that right into the legislation. Well, of course, the government didn't do that, and the chickens have come home to roost. We have not seen lower hydro rates for residential consumers, farmers, hospitals, schools, colleges, universities, small business or big business. On the contrary, we have seen those people, those organizations, those companies gouged because of hydro privatization and deregulation.

Under this scheme, as my leader pointed out, everyone has a hand in picking the pockets of consumers. The folks out there like Direct Energy, with misleading information, other utilities that are now trying to make a profit because they've been told by this government that's what they should be doing—some of those energy companies are quite happy to take their power off-line during the summer, under the guise of maintenance or anything else so that those prices can be driven up, and we saw that happen this summer. All those people, all those Enrons, have been in the mix. All of them, because of their intervention in what is now a privatized, deregulated system, have driven prices up to the extremes we saw, which finally forced this government to intervene.

If competition was working so well, why did this government have to intervene in the way they did on November 11? If hydro privatization and deregulation was the mecca and the answer for Ontario, how come the government was intervening in the way it did on November 11?

The answer to that question is that hydro privatization and deregulation is not working, and the best thing this government could do is admit it now, end the dirty deal now and return to a system of public power in Ontario so that the needs of consumers and farmers and businesses could appropriately be served.

I know the government is hoping that the rebate scheme they announced and the cap on prices to individual consumers are going to be enough to buy them the next election. I know that's what they're hoping, because that's what the Alberta government did under Ralph Klein, when just before the election Alberta consumers had been gouged in the same unfortunate and regrettable way. Ralph Klein, who was, oh, so interested in winning the election, spent 2.3 billion taxpayer dollars to try and bribe Alberta consumers, $2.3 billion in a province whose population is far less than Ontario's. How much do you think it's going to cost for the government to try the pre-election bribe here? How much, Speaker?

It's interesting. We asked the question of the Minister of Energy on Monday: how much is this rebate system going to cost? The Minister of Energy, who is here today, didn't have an answer. He said, "We have a four-year plan, and we believe we will be able to manage it." Well, I would like to know what the costs are going to be. I think the public has a right to know what it's going to cost them for this government to try to implement a rebate scheme.

Not only would I like to know that, because I think the public should know that, but I think if that became a public matter, the hue and cry from the public would be even greater and the call to end the dirty deal would be even greater.

I was at a number of my post offices last week with our new leaflet on NDP support for public power, and I was talking to a number of people after the announcement on November 11. What was interesting was that two of the three people I spoke to, in two of the three different communities I was in, were the very people whose cases I had raised in the Legislature just the week before to show how they were being gouged under a deregulated, private scheme.

Bill Hedderson of Levack had seen his September hydro bill this year rise 36.3% in comparison to his bill last September. The other person, Cindy Bond of Capreol, had seen her family's September hydro bill rise 62% in comparison to the bill from the September before. The one person I didn't see whose case I raised was the person who had the highest increase, Benoit St Amour of Val Therese, who last October paid $75.05 for his hydro bill and this October paid $408.13 for his hydro bill, a 543% increase.

So I raised those cases, and there I was at the post office in Capreol and Ms Cindy Bond came up to say hello and thank me for raising her case. She said, "You know what? This government's rebate scheme, I'm not fooled by that. I know that I'm going to pay for that. I'm going to pay for that through my taxes or I'm going to pay for it through my property taxes. That's money I've been gouged out of, and the government's giving money back that I should have in my pocket already, that I shouldn't have had to put out on a hydro bill." She wasn't fooled.

Then I was up in Levack on Thursday, and I ran into Bill Hedderson. I thanked him again for allowing me to use his case, and he said, "No problem. Continue to use it in every way, shape or form you may need to. And by the way, I don't buy the government line about a rebate. I'm not going to be bought off by this government. The money for that rebate has to come from somewhere. That's going to come out of my taxes, and I'd like to know how much money is going to come out of my taxes to pay for that rebate."

So I don't think people are fooled. I think this government has a huge problem. They're trying to do what Klein did in Alberta, but people saw what Klein did in Alberta. As soon as he was elected, the price caps came off, the rebates went away, and people's hydro bills were jacked up one more time, and people know that's what is going to happen in this province; that's what this government is trying to do. That's why this government is so interested in getting these cheques in the mail before Christmas, if they can. That's exactly what they're going to try to do: a little pre-Christmas gift in the mail of $75 that sure isn't going to go anywhere for most of these people, and then call an election soon after, "so that we never have to disclose the price of those rebates and we don't really have to implement it after all."

What has also been very interesting is the Liberal flip-flop, flip-flop position. I've got to tell you that the reason I like this leaflet is that we say very clearly, "Don't be fooled by the Liberals. They're with the Conservatives. They support hydro privatization and deregulation too." We've got the quote from October 31, 2001, where the Libs said, "Dalton and the Ontario Liberals have been consistent supporters of the move to an open electricity market in Ontario," or when Dalton McGuinty said to the Toronto Globe and Mail on December 13, 2001, "Rates may very well have to go up. We've been getting a free ride here in Ontario."

I don't know what their position is today. I was listening really carefully, but I don't think the public is going to be fooled by the Liberal flip-flop on this either.

Hon Mr Baird: I am pleased to participate in this debate from my friends in the New Democratic Party. They don't like competition in electricity generation. They said that when they voted against Bill 35 back in 1988; they said that in virtually every part of the province, when the committee on Bill 35 travelled the province. They've always been against competition in generation. I have a begrudging respect for that.

On November 11, I had the privilege of attending Remembrance Day services in Nepean-Carleton. I'd attended the weekend before that, on the 9th and 10th, services in Vernon, in Kenmore and in Osgoode village, and I attended events in Nepean and Manotick. I went to get on the plane to make a late afternoon announcement with Premier Eves, and do you know whom I ran into at the Ottawa airport? I ran into Dalton McGuinty, and I wondered why Dalton was going back to Toronto. Dalton and I met as we were getting on the plane and I said, "Dalton, I hope you'll support my policy that we're going to announce today. You're a fellow Ottawa member. Your riding is right next to mine," and I never could have imagined that Dalton would. I've always brought in a lot of policies but Dalton has never agreed with any of them, but we finally found a policy that Dalton has embraced.

I was on the Liberal Web site. On Monday they had one policy which said they were consistent supporters of a move to an open wholesale market in generation. By Monday afternoon—this is the Liberal Web site—it said, "Energy. Update coming soon." We found this out before we heard about the scrum. Dalton McGuinty had a scrum outside this place which one journalist called a "melt-down," called it "the worst scrum of his life." Well, I haven't seen many of his scrums. But now the Liberals have a new policy. They've just updated the Web site and the first thing they talk is, "Price caps will stay in place." I want to thank Dalton McGuinty and the Ontario Liberal Party for supporting the Eves-Baird plan to provide relief to consumers. Not only is—

Hon David Young (Attorney General, minister responsible for native affairs): Better late than never.

Hon Mr Baird: "Better late than never," the Attorney General says. Not only has Dalton McGuinty endorsed my plan, I wanted to congratulate him, to thank him for endorsing our plan to provide relief to consumers, to working families, to small business and to farms. I wanted to thank him but I haven't seen him, Speaker. He's gone missing in action.

Hon Doug Galt (Minister without Portfolio): We're looking for him.

Hon Mr Baird: We're looking for him. If you're watching at home, if you're in the Liberal research office, where is Dalton? He has not been seen around Queen's Park; he has not faced the music with the media or with the government. We hope Dalton will come back tomorrow, because normally the leader of Her Majesty's official opposition wants to be here when the Premier of Ontario is attending question period. They normally choose to attend that day so they can go after their direct critic.

I say to the Attorney General that he should return my—if he touches it, I'll get him.

So Dalton has disappeared. He cannot be far. I wanted to congratulate him and thank him for supporting my policy but he has disappeared. Call him.

Ms Martel: He always has supported your policy. Come on.

Hon Mr Baird: No. He supports my price caps. I fear, though, the worst for Dalton McGuinty. I fear the NDP Hydrozilla has eaten Dalton McGuinty, because he has changed his mind again. When he said on November 18 that Dalton McGuinty and the Ontario Liberal Party now were against deregulation, were against a competitive market, the Liberals were also busy on November 18. Do you know what they were doing? They were sending out Liberal fundraising letters. The Ontario Liberal Fund, on the same day that Dalton McGuinty made his policy change, sent out a letter looking for money to the energy sector, where he was trolling for bucks on Bay Street. He said, "We've seen flip-flops, knee-jerk 'solutions' and apparent disregard for the grim consequences" of their actions. This is what the Liberal fundraiser said. This, when he had on the Web site that day, "Update coming soon," on the Liberal policy. But it gets better, I say to the associate.

Ms Martel: How much money do they want?

Hon Mr Baird: Just a minute. It says, "With Dalton McGuinty's Liberals, we'll get the plan Ontario needs," and—this is the part I like—they'll have "the leadership to stick to" the plan. This isn't the fundraising letter that they sent out last year; this is the fundraising letter they sent out on the very day that Dalton McGuinty and the Ontario Liberals changed their policy. I thought, "Were they asking for the $350 that they asked in the previous fundraising letter they put out?" No: "I urge you to contribute today"—$7,500. I think the honourable thing to do is that the poor schmucks in the energy sector who sent in $7,500 should get their money back. That would be the right thing to do.

They send out other fundraising letters. They do a lot of fundraising.

Ms Martel: What about the $5,000? There's more.

Hon Mr Baird: There's more. Oh, you're right. I say thank you to the member for Nickel Belt. Big help. If you're mad about Ernie Eves providing some relief to families and you're in the energy sector, you can do $7,500 to the Liberal Fund, but you can also send $5,000 to individual riding associations—an extra $51,000—which is most interesting. And this isn't the first time the Liberals have gone trolling for bucks on Bay Street. On October 31 last year, Halloween, they sent out a letter to the energy stakeholders. And you know what they said in that letter? They said, "Throughout Ontario's electricity restructuring process, Dalton and the Ontario Liberals have been consistent supporters of the move to an open electricity market in Ontario. Tickets are $350." So when they had the same policy as the government, they wanted $350. When they didn't like my price caps, they wanted $7,500. I want to know—we're going to give rebates. Ernie Eves wants to send rebates out to consumers right across the province to help them pay their hydro bills and provide some relief to them in the future. The rebates for Dalton McGuinty's energy fundraiser, the tax credits, they should be returned. I think if Dalton McGuinty wants to do the right thing, he will send back the $350 to all these people.

And who was the letter signed by? It was signed by Sean Conway, the MPP, the Liberal critic for energy. He hasn't asked any questions lately, this week. I suspect he's embarrassed by the policy, because I know—if there's been a sighting of Dalton, please call us and let us know. We're still looking for Dalton.

The Toronto Star said:

"Let's See Liberals' Plan...."

"Here's what their electricity plan says: 'We will create a genuinely competitive power generation environment that will include a mix of electricity providers—public and private, large and small, and those providing green power. Genuine competition and strong regulation will ensure sufficient power supply and is the only way to lower rates.'"

This was on the Web site on Monday morning. But they changed their mind.

Interjection: Again?

Hon Mr Baird: They've changed their mind again and it's quite remarkable. But this isn't the first time this has happened. Last December, McGuinty said, in a scrum on December 12, "I think it's important that we move ahead with competition both in terms of generation and in terms of the transmission." I don't know how the heck you get competition in transmission. Are you going to have two sets of competing transmission towers go across the province of Ontario? But that was part of Dalton McGuinty's plan. What did Sean Conway say? "Let me be clear, we need a competitive marketplace." I guess they've changed their minds, which is usual, for a Liberal to change his mind this often.

On October 28, Michael Bryant said, "The only way we're going to get more made-in-Ontario electricity is to permit the private sector to come in and build made-in-Ontario electricity." Well, that's gone, because Dalton McGuinty doesn't agree with Michael Bryant any more. We're not going to have the private sector building electricity in Ontario.

Let's just enumerate this: Dalton McGuinty said on Monday he wasn't going to guarantee that he was going to close the coal-fired generating stations; now he's saying he is, on his new Web site. The promised update arrived. Now he's saying he'll continue to close down all of the coal-fired plants by 2007 but he's not going to have any private sector generation being built in the province. He says none will be built now and he won't have any built when he gets elected. That means $6 billion or $7 billion of new infrastructure in debt in Ontario. So under Dalton McGuinty, the debt of Ontario Hydro will go up from $38 billion to $45 billion. Most interesting. I don't know what that will do to natural gas prices, because if we close one coal plant alone, that would use 24 billion cubic metres of natural gas. I'd like to be in the natural gas business if he does that; the private sector natural gas producers will make big bucks because the prices will soar.

I know another person who's going to be disappointed about Dalton McGuinty's announcement: my good friend Marie Bountrogianni. She said recently, "We on this side of the House are not against competition, particularly in green energy. We know that in some areas of the province you wouldn't have energy if it wasn't for privatization." I guess the green energy is gone, because Dalton McGuinty has changed his mind again.

What else did Dalton McGuinty say? "The responsible thing to do would be to bring the private sector in with the public sector and say, 'Look, folks, we're going to have to work together here in this place where there is real competition and tough regulations to make sure we have a sufficient amount of electricity.'" When was this said? This was said after the announcement of November 11. So once the world changed, Dalton McGuinty was still supporting his old policy, which is most interesting.

I wish Dalton McGuinty was here to defend himself, but he's gone missing. He's AWOL.

Hon Mr Turnbull: He's in a cave in Tora Bora.

Hon Mr Baird: He's in a cave in Tora Bora. I think the lizard, Hydrozilla, will find him. I was actually hoping the Liberal leader would stick to his position for once, because I was hoping the Hydrozilla would chase him around. But there's no justice in that.

What did Dalton McGuinty say about rate relief? "I'm saying today that I'm guaranteeing that we're going to leave this particular package in place." That's good. He said that we couldn't pay for our program, but several bond rating agencies have said that the plan is manageable. Dalton McGuinty says it will require billions to be borrowed, but he'll support it, which is rather interesting.

So we have a rather interesting scenario in the province of Ontario. I hope there will be a sighting of Dalton McGuinty by 6 o'clock, because I want to know whether he's changed his mind again and whether he'll vote for this.

Hon Mr Galt: Do you think he'll be here for the 6 o'clock vote?

Hon Mr Baird: Do I think he'll be here for the 6 o'clock vote? I don't know. If anyone in Mr McGuinty's office is watching, could you get him here for the 6 o'clock vote? I'll be wanting to see if the member for Renfrew North comes because I want to see what he thinks, as I listened very attentively to him during the Bill 35 committees. He was a very passionate spokesman and knows a lot about this issue.

On the issue of the rebates, we hope we can have a debate about that, because I think there would be a lot of value in that. There was a lot of discussion about what the rebate should be; there was media speculation as to what it would be. Dalton McGuinty himself was asked on Thursday, November 7, "What do you think it should be? How much do you think the rebate should be?" Now, he's the leader of Her Majesty's official opposition, once again riding at 50% in the polls, given a $4-million budget for research to help him do his job, and to "How much should the rebate be?" he said, "Well, I don't know. 'I mean, you know. I think you know.'" "No, I don't know." Then it was asked again, "What would make enough of a difference to people?" Do you know what he said? "I don't know. I honestly don't know."

Well, you've got to know. Working families in Ontario, small business people, farm operators and the hospitality industry want to know. We've said we'll refund the difference back to 4.3 cents from May 1 and provide some stability to deal with the bumps along the road. But on this side of the House we still believe in an open competitive market on the generation side. We've always been very consistent in that.

What else did Dalton McGuinty say? "Rates may very well have to go up." He's changed his mind again. He said that on December 13, 2001—most interesting.

Another time, on June 1, he said, "I've been very consistent with respect to Hydro One. I think it should be left in public hands. I've been very consistent with respect to generation. There should be competition." This is what the guy says: "I have been very consistent"—like he's hectoring anyone else for changing the position. I don't think he should hector anyone else about changing his position.

I hope the APB we put out on Dalton McGuinty works and he'll show up for the vote at 6 o'clock, because I want to know where he stands.

Mr Mike Colle (Eglinton-Lawrence): People all over, certainly in my riding and I think the province of Ontario, have taken this issue of their hydro bills very seriously. It's no wonder we're in the mess we're in when we see the Minister of Energy, the member for Nepean-Carleton, make a big joke of the thing as he's been doing from day one. He thinks this is funny. He thinks this thing is one big laugh as he's laughing, walking around the room. He doesn't have any appreciation or sensitivity for the mess they've created, the anxiety they've caused in people's homes.

The people have come to our MPPs' offices asking for help on how they pay their bill and are afraid they're going to be evicted out of their apartments, out of their homes, and they've got a Minister of Energy who clowns around about this type of thing. He has the audacity to clown around and spend all this time making jokes when they have upset the most important asset we have in this province next to health care and education, and that is our hydro.

He, his party members and Mr Eves have made such a farce of this thing from day one, where they did this on the back of a napkin. The Minister of Energy, the member from Nepean-Carleton, has the nerve to stand up in this House on this date to still make jokes about it when they have fouled up a most important thing to the people of Ontario as no one has ever fouled up something before. It's like a group of cowboys, from day to day, from hour to hour, playing with this thing. Now you see, if you just heard this member, the Minister of Energy, stand up like a teenager in this room making jokes about the damage they've done to hydro, damage they've done to people's lives and this reckless journey they've brought us on because they didn't take this seriously.

The Minister of Energy has never taken it seriously—he's still smiling now—because he doesn't appreciate the fact that people have to work and save to pay things like hydro bills. I don't think he's ever paid a hydro bill in his life, I'd bet. We knew he could never read one. He didn't know how to read one. That's why he thinks it's a big joke. He thinks it's a big joke to see hospitals and institutions unable to pay their bills because of this reckless, just total amateur hour they've taken us down in the last months since May or before when they never planned any of this. They didn't really know where they were going.

Premier Ernie Eves came in and from day to day he changed his policy. Talk about changing and flip-flopping. The Minister of Energy and Mr Eves should get the gold medal for what they've done, and they're supposed to be the government, who have hundreds of lawyers and researchers at their disposal. They've hired people to advise them, spin doctors, and they have fouled this up and made such a mess of this file, Ontario Hydro, which affects the lives of so many Ontarians, and they joke about it. That's what we've seen. To this party, the Conservative Party, and to Mr Eves, this whole thing is a joke. They treat it that way, and the people of Ontario suffer because we've got a juvenile in charge of the Ministry of Energy who thinks it's more important to make fun of things than find solutions. Well, he'd better start growing up, get the smirk off his face and get down to work and fix this mess you created and the millions and billions you're wasting because you think this is one big joke. I'll tell you, Minister of Energy: you're the joke who keeps treating this like some kind of prank when you're dealing with people's livelihoods. You have caused so much grief in this province that you couldn't measure it, and you have the audacity to start pointing fingers and blaming others when you won't come up with solutions.

You said you had the solution last Monday. Here we are, into the next week, and still no legislation. Where's this plan that all your high-paid consultants, your hundreds of staff people in your ministry, in the Premier's office—how could you have screwed this up so badly? Tell us that. Do you know why you did? Because you took this as some kind of juvenile prank, and that's how you've treated it. You've treated it not as a serious issue, which we've seen from our residents—we've seen people come to the office saying, "I cannot pay this hydro bill. It's more than I bring in. My pension is only $9,000 a year. I've got to pay rent; I've got to pay groceries. This bill is going to basically mean I either turn off my lights and my heat or I have to go without food."

This was not a rare occurrence. If you ask your own members, they will tell you this was coming to their doors, day in and day out. The Minister of Energy has the gall to consider what he did to them a joke. That's what he's saying. It's one big joke to him. I'll tell you, it's no big joke to put people through what they went through in the last number of months. With his record on this file for the last number of months, can you imagine what he's going to put us through for the next number of months as he tries to clean up the mess of the century that he helped create, along with Mr Eves?

He and Mr Eves have the gall to say, "It's the opposition, it's the local municipalities, it's the weather." Do you know why they do that? Because they know they can't defend the grossest screw-up ever perpetrated in this province. No one has mishandled such a major part of the government of Ontario like the Minister of Energy and Mr Eves have. It has never come to this level. Any objective observer will tell you that if you stop this battle of who said what when and what was quoted by whom and where who was at what time, if you get down to the bare facts, hydro is a critical, crucial, important issue for this province's economy, for this province's householders, for everybody. We rely on it. You don't have to tell the people of Ontario that. Yet they have basically treated it like some kind of political game from day one, where they could manoeuvre and shift and change and blame others and hide information.

You knew something was up when they passed that act where they said that hydro could not be subject to freedom of information requests. Why would you do that? Why would you block the public right to access information about this biggest change to hydro in the history of this province? They put a clause in the act that said the public could not find out what hydro was doing as it went through this change. They put that in on purpose because they didn't want people to see what they were up to and what their friends were up to. We know one thing they're up to: they're determined to sell off the rest of Hydro One, the other 49%, just like they sold off Highway 407 for a song. They sold it off to their friends at SNC-Lavalin, who then sold off part of it for four times what they bought it for from the taxpayer.

Here's the taxpayer who has this Highway 407 we've built with our money. The government sells it off at a fire sale. Now this private consortium is reaping a windfall profit daily by the highest tolls in North America, and they're doing it with our money. So we're getting gouged twice. We paid for it with our tax dollars and now the highest tolls are being collected.

This is the kind of deal they want to make with Hydro One. That's why they're going to sell it off in a fire sale to their friends, and again somebody like SNC-Lavalin or that Spanish consortium will be rich and the Minister of Energy will sit there and joke about it. He'll be here in this House laughing about it, as he has been for the last number of months on this issue.

How can the people of Ontario really take this seriously when they look at this Minister of Energy and the Premier basically treating this like some kind of juvenile prank? You hear him stand up here and joke and chortle and laugh. The people of Ontario have seen this government in action and have seen the way they have been recklessly bulldozing through our hospitals and what they've done to our schools—they cut another $90 million out of our schools yesterday in Toronto on top of the other $300 million they've cut out.

Interjections.

The Deputy Speaker: We don't have shouting across. If you'd like to stay with us, don't do it.

Mr Colle: It just shows. We've gone through so much grief, especially the parents and the students in all our schools in Toronto for the last seven years, with the likes of the member from Oklahoma, who takes off to Oklahoma, creates a crisis. They closed down our hospitals. They left our emergencies closed with people laying on gurneys and stretchers, and they still are today.

Then they do the same thing with hydro. These are a bunch of cowboys, like the Minister of Energy, who thinks this is all one big joke. You close the hospitals—it's funny. You cut another million dollars from our schools—he thinks it's funny. Hydro, what's happened to people—he thinks it's a comedy show where he can stand up and make fun of everybody on this very serious issue.

I'll tell you, the people of Ontario will not forget the fact that you made a big joke of this, Mr Energy Minister. They will not forget what you're doing and they're not going to be fooled by your spinning and massaging of the facts. You have created a mess and you're making fun of it, which is doubly worse.

Mr Ernie Hardeman (Oxford): We appreciate the opportunity to address this House this afternoon on such an important issue as hydro. We as a government have always put our electricity customers first, from designing our new wholesale market to consumer protection to safeguarding our future electricity supply, thereby ensuring safe and reliable power will continue to be supplied to our consumers. We have heard from our Minister of Energy about the position the Liberals don't have; in fact, it changes by the day.

I'd like to quickly address some of the issues and policies we have put forward in the last number of weeks to deal with the hydro situation. Over the past four months, many Ontarian households and businesses have experienced significant increases in their hydro bills. Many of my constituents expressed concerns about dealing with high and volatile prices.

The government is listening, and Premier Eves last week announced a series of measures to lower and stabilize prices while we work over the next few years to ensure a sustainable, cost-competitive and reliable electricity system for the province of Ontario. But we know those reasons don't matter much to seniors, single moms or small business owners facing large hydro bills. All that matters to them and to everyone in Ontario is acceptable electricity prices, and that's what our proposed action plan would achieve. That is true consumer protection.

With this in mind, the government will soon introduce legislation to lower hydro costs. Should it pass, the proposed legislation would lower the price families and small business consumers pay for power to 4.3 cents per kilowatt hour, effective December 1, 2002, until at least 2006. Our aim is to refund every penny of the difference between the 4.3 cents price of power and what consumers have actually paid, retroactive to May 1, 2002. The first instalment of the refund, a cheque for $75, would be sent out as soon as possible, in most cases before the end of the year. The remainder would be credited on future bills. Local distribution companies would credit the remainder on consumers' bills as soon as they are able to achieve that.

We are putting forward these measures to protect the consumers of Ontario. Some people have suggested that 4.3 cents per kilowatt hour of electricity is too low. I suggest that Ontario's electricity consumers would disagree with that assessment.

Under the government's proposed legislation, not only the price of the power itself but the price families and small businesses pay for the delivery of electricity to their homes would be capped at the current level. Consumer protection is all about ensuring that bills are fair and reasonable. Why would a monthly charge for residential electricity consumers be different in different areas, ranging from $5 to $25 a month? To answer this question and to ensure charges are reasonable, the government is ordering an independent review of how customer charges on electricity bills are calculated. Our review will also include the charges of the Independent Electricity Market Operator.

Right now there are no standards, no consistency between various hydro bills in Ontario. Consumers have seen some that are so complex and so confusing as to make a precise and itemized breakdown of the costs and services being billed next to impossible. That was certainly not the intent when this government required unbundling of bills. As recently as this morning, I had a consumer call me with two hydro bills from two separate properties received, and he could not identify the similarities or the differences and figure out whether he was paying the same price or what he was actually paying for the different hydro bills. That needs to be corrected. We believed then and we still believe now that an informed consumer is a protected consumer.

As part of our proposed review of electricity costs in Ontario, we will create a standard province-wide electricity bill that all of us can read and understand. We're not just proposing a graphic design exercise. The new standardized province-wide electricity bill format that we propose would ensure consumers can see at a glance what it is they're paying for.

Some things, consumers do control. The average household is using more electricity this year than it did last year. Ontario's electricity consumers can reduce their costs and help the environment by using less power. We're going to help consumers save money and let them take control. Our proposed action plan includes measures to promote electricity conservation. So while we are proposing measures to ensure that consumers' electricity bills do not go up, we're also proposing methods to help consumers actually reduce electricity costs.

Our long-term plan would include measures such as tax incentives and tax holidays to promote conservation, encourage alternative fuels and support clean electricity production. It would also include public education to help households reduce their electricity consumption. For example, we propose to allow municipalities to claim a tax credit for the cost of solar panels. We urge the federal government to follow suit on that.

Additionally, we believe that homes should have access to interval meters. In Woodstock we have meters called powerstats where consumers can purchase the power up front. As they see that, they can see the amount of power they are using and indeed I'm told by consumers that that helps them conserve energy.

We propose local hydro companies should promote this service. The Commissioner of Alternative Energy will begin discussions with the Electricity Distributors Association and the home builders' association on this proposal. Our proposed plan provides immediate help to Ontario consumers without sacrificing for one moment our long-term goals. The immediate measures of our action plan to lower the province's hydro bills would be in place at least until 2006. They would continue until sufficient supply, at reasonable prices, is available to meet Ontario's long-term needs. Ours is a balanced plan, not a simple recitation of some ivory tower ideology.

We are protecting consumers by creating an electricity sector that works, and will work long into the future. Our approach is to protect Ontario's electricity consumers while at the same time continuing to work toward a solution that keeps prices reasonable and ensures a stable supply of electricity for Ontario.

There's been a lot of rhetoric from the opposition about our electricity restructuring in Ontario. The truth is that the government has worked hard to ensure there are helpful and meaningful regulations to protect consumers and ensure a stable and efficient energy sector.

To that end, our government has launched a review of the Ontario Energy Board mandate. There have been ongoing changes within the energy sector, and the rules and procedures governing the energy board need to be examined. We want to ensure that the energy board can continue to protect consumers in a changing energy world.

There are a lot of things people can do without, but electricity isn't one of them. Ontarians rely on having a safe, secure, and plentiful supply of electricity.

And just as other necessities such as groceries aren't taxed, we don't charge provincial sales tax on electricity. We don't believe the federal government in Ottawa should be charging GST on the electricity bill either, so we will continue to pressure the federal government to quit gouging the consumer by charging GST on the repayment of the debt that has been created by buying electricity on the credit card for so many years.

Some would have us turn back the clock, returning us to the time of a bloated, inefficient monopoly which was wasteful of the public's electricity. Our government has acted to correct the mistakes of previous administrations.

As a fiscally responsible government, we plan to continue to repay the $38-billion debt created by mismanagement and inefficiency at the old Ontario Hydro under previous governments, and plan to accelerate payments as soon as new supplies of electricity are on stream.

Who is responsible for the debt? Obviously, responsibility lies with successive governments and management teams who operated Ontario Hydro in the red. But we too, as individuals, bear some responsibility to fix the problem. After all, every one of us who has used electricity in past decades has used power paid for by credit card. This government took action to restructure the old Ontario Hydro so this would never happen again. But the billions on Ontario Hydro's old credit card still need to be paid off.

We are listening to the people of Ontario, and no one has told us they wish to go further in debt. We thank you very much.

Mr Ernie Parsons (Prince Edward-Hastings): I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this opposition day motion. Before I start to analyze some of what is going on with hydro—I certainly am getting calls at my office from constituents saying, “Will there be a hydro rebate?” My advice to you is, when it comes, buy a generator. You'll need to use it as your first payment on a gasoline generator and have it ready so that when the brownouts come, at least you'll be able to provide some basic services in your house. I think this is in effect a gasoline generator down payment cheque that will be coming. The government, I give them credit, recognize that the plan isn't going to work and we need to get some money out for that.

I've also had a request from the Ontario archives that if the government would kindly give them the envelope they put this energy plan together on, the archives believe it is a historical document and they would like to keep the envelope. They have some belief that it may be the same envelope that they planned health care and education on. It's probably getting half full now, but please keep that envelope and turn it over to the archives so that people can see how this government planned for our hydro in Ontario.

I think we could describe in many ways that to this government the province of Ontario has been a science lab to conduct experiments in. We've seen experiments conducted in our health care where any other government would have said, “OK we've got this plan. Let's try it at one hospital site or let's try it in one area and see how it works. If it doesn't work, we won't do it, and if it does work maybe we need to tweak it.” This government said, “Let's change every hospital in Ontario.” From an education viewpoint, “Let's try these major changes.” There's an expression—we have old expressions that I think are developed for a reason. One of them is that if you want to truly understand something, try to change it.

This government has radically changed education in their first year and they now have spent the next six trying to fix what they broke. They're trying to fix health care, which they broke. Every announcement they made—whether it be increased costs for seniors in long-term care—is followed by a reannouncement trying to undo the damage they did with the first announcement.

It is intriguing to me that everyone in Ontario believed that the electricity plan that the Harris-Eves government put together would not work. The people on the street, who are a long way from stupid, who understand the way things work, said it won't work. Everyone saw the problems coming except Premier Harris and Premier Eves, who had this innate belief: “Let's go ahead and give it a try.” We've seen them go ahead and give a try to changing our water. They went ahead and gave a try to changing our electricity. We got to where we are because certain decisions were made that couldn't be quickly changed on a philosophical, “Let's see how it works.”

I have perhaps said before that people have stated to me that a definition of insanity is doing the same thing over and over and expecting a different result each time. It did not work in California. I don't care how you massage the message, it did not work in California, and now they do have stabilized prices in California at US 11 cents per kilowatt hour. Those are stabilized prices. It did not work in Alberta, but it's been made to work because they're using government revenues to send cheques back to the very people who send the money to the government. When you get a cheque from the government, you know, you're getting some of your own money back. I think people understand that.

The plan was troubled from the beginning; the experts said it wouldn't work. But Premier Harris and Premier Eves said, “Let's give it a try,” and people have paid a substantial price for that. Not only did they radically change our electricity system in Ontario; they conveniently moved it into an arrangement that precluded the public from knowing what was going on under the freedom of information act. The Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act is, in a sense, the Freedom of Information and Protection of the Government Act, because even where there is access under freedom of information, this government has all too often put such costs on to it that organizations and individuals can't pay them.

As we've seen with the 407, as we've seen with the Bruce nuclear plant and as we've seen with privatized medical clinics in Toronto, the public couldn't get access to what was going on at Hydro One and OPG. Very conveniently, public business was moved behind closed doors—fundamentally wrong. If a decision is a good decision, if the actions are good actions, they will withstand the light of public scrutiny. This government moved to curtail and restrict as much information on it as they could from getting to the public.

I'm going to state some things that I think the average person in Ontario would say if they had an opportunity to speak in here. We are dealing with the bill today because Premier Eves broke the system. Eves told us on more than one occasion that prices would go down. They went up. Eves told us there was more than enough supply. We now find out there was a shortage of supply from the get-go. The people on the street, the consumers, were sheltered from knowing we didn't have enough electricity in Ontario to meet our own needs. I've had more than one citizen say to me, “Would it help if we stopped selling electricity to the US?" The answer is that we need to buy their electricity. During the peak periods, Ontario, which at one time had a richness of electricity, can't meet its own needs. The government knew that.

I was privileged to be on the select committee on alternative fuels, and we heard repeatedly that we need to purchase electricity from other sources. We don't have a glut of it; we have a shortage of it. You can't deregulate when there isn't enough of a particular commodity, a commodity that is so time-sensitive, a commodity that can't be saved and stored and used. When we needed it at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, we knew we couldn't produce it. The government knew the nuclear plants weren't producing, or they should have known. They are the government. They should have known we couldn't meet our own needs and that we're buying electricity at whatever the current price is.

Now we have a very real possibility of blackouts in Ontario, something unheard of, something that is a nuisance at our homes but catastrophic to our industry. I met today with a group of people representing the cement industry. They cannot tolerate a blackout. The auto production plants cannot tolerate a blackout. So industry that has to compete on a worldwide basis is now going to have to incur the additional cost of having alternate energy supplies that will kick in instantly so that they do not lose market share for the vehicles, cement or whatever. Now they're faced with additional costs, having to compete in a world market.

Premier Eves told us consumers would be protected. They were absolutely ripped off by Ontario Power Generation, our company. The government may appear to control it, but every person in this province owns Ontario Power Generation and we've been ripped off by the very industry we founded and own.

The Premier chose to ignore all the advice and the warnings. I don't understand that. The people who were giving advice were very articulate, intelligent, knowledgeable people, and the Premier chose to ignore them. Remember, although former Premier Harris is getting the credit for this hydro boondoggle, Premier Eves had been in power for five weeks when the market opened, and he owns it.

I referred earlier to the envelope that directed their plans for this. There is an impression in Ontario that Premier Eves kept all his promises, that if he said he was going to do something, he did it. He didn't do that, but he did say lots of times that he kept his promise. I don't remember him promising to close hospitals. I don't remember him promising to slash funding to classrooms. He created that image, but Premier Eves very clearly has not kept, in any sense, any clear path of, "This is what I'm going to do."

He said on April 26, "It's important Hydro One be privatized." That's in the Ottawa Citizen. The Toronto Star on May 2: "The largest privatization in Ontario history is in jeopardy after Ernie Eves, the Ontario Premier, said yesterday the $5.5-billion sale of Hydro One is 'off the table for the immediate time being.'" Now he did say "for the immediate time being." There was a nice little waffle phrase in there. People need to watch for these waffle phrases with this Premier.

Then, on May 8, Hydro One was back on the table. On May 15, he wanted the investment firms to give him advice because he didn't know what he was doing. On May 16, the Sudbury Star quotes him as saying, "I think that keeping it as a crown corporation or a public entity is indeed an option for the government."

How many waffles have there been over those two months?

May 30: The Premier tabled legislation to sell Hydro One. On June 7, he said he'd like to scrap the public stock offering and have it as an income trust. Then on June 13 it was said that he had killed the key initiative of his predecessor, that "the Tories would not turn over control of Hydro One to the public sector through a share offering."

I hope somebody's keeping track of how many changes we've had at this point.

Then, on July 6, they said they would seek a buyer for a minority stake in Hydro One, although interestingly the legislation allows them to do anything they want. This is a pre-election, "We'll sell part of the share off." I'm not so sure they'll get a purchaser for it now. But the people of Ontario need to realize that when he sells 49% of our distribution system, the other 51% is probably still on the table to go. If we look at the Highway 407 privatization, it is very good for the private purchaser, but not for the people of Ontario.

Our member for Scarborough East reviewed commitments they had made, and I think we need to review some of the things he said. On June 18, the member for Scarborough East said, "The government believes there'll be lower prices. Everyone in the industry believes that. You're going to see it." Everybody in Ontario knew that wasn't going to be the case.

"The competition is going to be marvellous, and the results will be equally significant, because the projections we have heard in the last few weeks range from 5% to as high as 20% reduction in the price of electricity that can be expected once the competition takes hold." We didn't see that reduction; we saw up to 300% and 400% increases.

"Many of us remember the days not long ago when Ontario could boast having the cheapest electricity rates in North America. That day will come again. I have every confidence, and this bill is a guarantee of that." Well, this government clearly broke and put in jeopardy the financial and personal strength of everyone in this province. It is a disgrace. We acknowledge as Liberals that we didn't create the mess but it is very obvious we have to fix it.

1740

Mr David Ramsay (Timiskaming-Cochrane): I'm very pleased to get up on this opposition day debate today because I think, in my 17 and a half years that I have been in this place, I have never seen an issue that any government has mishandled in such a way as this

Harris-Eves government has mishandled the energy and electricity market in this province.

Unlike any other product or responsibility that Ontario has responsibility for, I would say energy is the one that affects everybody's day-to-day life every day. We depend on it. The people of Ontario depend on their government to manage that for them. Whether you're a big business, small business, you're a senior, a parent, a child, you're an institution, you're a householder, you're a tenant, all of us depend on electricity. We want two things: we want to make sure it's affordable but we also want to make sure it's there when you need it, because we need it for subsistence; we need it there for our existence; we need it for our heating and our cooking; we need it to make the economy go. That's why it has been a function of government, and we depend on the government to do that.

This government totally mismanaged this. I had people coming into my office over the last few months, absolutely petrified by what was going on. Unlike any other discretionary purchase, you can't put off this purchase. We depend on it. It comes into the house; we need it for everything that we do. We're using it all the time, constantly. I suppose we're using it without ever thinking about it. We expect when we go to the light switch and turn it on, that it works; when we put on our electric stove, that it works; that if you're on electric hot water, that it works. You depend on it; you count on it. We need it. And what did this government do? It put everything into chaos—one of the biggest crises that has ever happened in Ontario.

People came in afraid that they were going to lose their businesses. I had people who run meat shops in the south end of the riding coming in and saying, "Look what the cost of running our coolers is doing now. We're doubling and tripling the cost of running our business." One business person came in and said, "I've got 10 employees in my employ in this town of Noëlville. The town depends on my business. I can't continue with this business because this electricity bill is now eating up my profit. I am no longer profitable. What am I going to do?"

All of a sudden, overnight, people's worlds turn inside out. They were left absolutely helpless because they had nowhere to go, because something that they depended on, something that I suppose we take for granted, was all of a sudden out of control. What the problem was, what was causing the panic and the crisis there, was the total, uncontrolled volatility of the pricing of electricity. People just feared when that next bill would be coming up. Before, you could count on it. You knew you had a constant rate. Now you opened up your bill and you didn't know what you were getting. I saw bills that were as high as 9.6 cents per kilowatt hour, and also those new service charges that were all broken out. Obviously somebody was taking advantage of that too, because those were representing, in some cases, up to 70% of that bill.

So somebody was ripping off the people. The people were being ripped off and they were being put in a panic.

They were depending on their government to keep their power at an affordable rate, and the government failed them. I have never seen the voters across this province as angry and as mobilized as they were in the last few months. No wonder the government had to do an extreme about-face on this policy, because it wasn't working. And the people of Ontario were not just angered about this; I think they were frightened. The people of Ontario were absolutely frightened of what was happening with their power system.

It's a power system that, I guess, as Ontarians, we've had a great pride in. We were one of the foremost jurisdictions in North America that developed our hydraulic resources, particularly at Niagara. In the beginning of the last century we developed Niagara Falls. We're very, very proud that, with Sir Adam Beck, we developed one of the cleanest, most reliable, low-cost sources of power in the province. At the very beginning Niagara Falls could serve all of Ontario's needs and then some, and we exported right across the United States. As this province grew, so did Ontario Hydro.

But what this government did was to totally drop the ball, cause panic and fear across this province with people very upset and concerned that their electricity would no longer be reliable or affordable. That's the failure of this government and that's going to be the history of this government; it's going to be why, when the people go to the polls next time, they are going to remember that fear and panic that the Harris-Eves government put them through in threatening the supply of electricity. That is going to be the legacy.

I would tell you that we're going to make sure that we're going to do our job and remind the people of what happened: that one of the greatest responsibilities that people depend upon from their Ontario government was absolutely fumbled, and fumbled in such a bad way that caused fear and panic amongst everybody in this province. I had big businesses coming to me and saying, "We made a decision that we're not going to be processing a lot of this ore that we're bringing into Ontario. We're going to move it right over to Manitoba, miss north-eastern Ontario, because in Manitoba we can get power at 3.2 cents a kilowatt hour."

I quite frankly remember when we were going to have a deal with Manitoba on some of their hydraulic generation, and it was the previous government that decided to cancel that. We've basically got to open our borders to Quebec and to Manitoba and say, "We want your clean power coming in here." We've got to get on with Beck 3. We've got to get on with green power generation. We've got to encourage all our companies to start getting into cogeneration. All of us have to be more self-reliant in our conservation and producing power. We need those interval meters so that we can be rewarded for conservation, because a kilowatt hour saved is better than one more we have to produce.

The people of Ontario, given the incentive, would get on the conservation bandwagon. We'd all work together to make sure we used electricity in a more effective and efficient manner. We can all do that. We can give people the financial incentive to do that. That would be the way to go. We could start to lead rather than follow in this province, and say we want to make sure we have a strong economy and reliable power. The people of Ontario can do that together as a team. The government should lead that. Conservation is the way to do that, and we can all be part of that solution.

The Deputy Speaker: I wanted to draw to the attention of the House, in the members' west gallery, Bud Wildman, a long-time member of this Legislature representing Algoma. Welcome, Mr Wildman.

Hon Dianne Cunningham (Minister of Training, Colleges and Universities, minister responsible for women's issues): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: My colleague Marcel Beaubien from Lambton-Kent-Middlesex has here parents of head-injured boys. I would really like to take this opportunity to introduce representatives of the Ontario Association of Community-Based Boards for Acquired Brain Injury Services, who are visiting here at the Legislature this evening.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

HIGHWAY TRAFFIC AMENDMENT ACT (EMERGENCY VEHICLE SAFETY), 2002

LOI DE 2002 MODIFIANT LE CODE DE LA ROUTE (SÉCURITÉ DES VÉHICULES DE SECOURS)

Resuming the debate adjourned on October 30, 2002, on the motion for second reading of Bill 191, An Act to amend the Highway Traffic Act to ensure the safety of emergency vehicles stopped on a highway and people who are outside a stopped emergency vehicle / Projet de loi 191, Loi modifiant le Code de la route afin de garantir la sécurité des véhicules de secours arrêtés sur une voie publique et celle des personnes qui se trouvent à l'extérieur de tels véhicules.

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, minister responsible for francophone affairs): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I seek unanimous consent with respect to today's debate on Bill 191, that one hour be divided equally among the recognized parties for the purpose of tonight's debate. At the end of that time, the motion for adjournment of the House will be deemed to have been made and carried, and the Speaker shall adjourn the House. For the purposes of standing order 46, tonight's debate will be considered one full sessional day.

The Deputy Speaker (Mr Bert Johnson): Mr Baird has asked for unanimous consent. Is there consent? Agreed? It is agreed.

In debate, I recognize the member for Timmins-Cochrane.

Mr Gilles Bisson (Timmins-James Bay): Timmins-James Bay.

The Deputy Speaker: Timmins-James Bay. I'll get that right one of these times.

Mr Bisson: First of all, I want to start out in saying that we generally support what we're trying to do by way of this bill. Interestingly, we have House time that we can be dealing with pretty substantive pieces of legislation. For example, the government introduced their budget bill a couple of weeks ago and they have, contained within that, changes to the pension regime in the province of Ontario where you would see employers getting a right to strip benefits out of pension surpluses. I would hope that we could bring those particular bills into the House and have substantive debate by allowing that bill to be carved out of Bill 198 and brought into the House. But instead, we're here debating this particular bill in regard to emergency vehicles beside highways.

I just want to say at the beginning of this, for a government who says they've got a lot of really important business to deal with, I just say to myself, and I'm sure other people say it too, "Why aren't we dealing with more of the substantive issues?" If you take a look at this session, it's been rather interesting. The government has brought a whole bunch of bills like this that are OK—it's not that this is a bad bill; it's not that it won't do something positive, but you say to yourself, "Where's their priorities?" Is this more important than dealing with an issue such as the security of people's pensions in the province of Ontario? I would think we would want to deal with the latter rather than this one first, but we're here tonight to debate this one.

We'll support this bill. The Highway Traffic Amendment Act is, I think, to say in a very safe way, certainly a bill that's supported by a number of people in our province, especially people in the police departments who are going to be benefiting out of this. They understand that there's a danger, especially on the Highway 400 series, but it could also happen on two-lane highways, that if people don't take due regard when it comes to seeing an emergency vehicle parked on the side of the road giving assistance to some emergency or accident situation on the side of the highway, you need to make sure that there is some provision in order to deter people from speeding by and not taking due regard for safety of the emergency workers who are beside the highway.

We generally support what the bill does. I'm just going to read it out of the bill itself. Under part X of the Highway Traffic Act, 2002, by adding section 159.1, it says, "Upon approaching an emergency vehicle with its lamp producing intermittent flashes of red light that is stopped on a highway, the driver of a vehicle travelling on the same side of the highway shall slow down and proceed with caution...." I said the other day in debate, and I think it needs to be repeated again, a couple of points that we want to make. We think that this bill should be referred to committee—not for long; we don't believe that you have to have extensive public hearings on this—but we would like to get it into committee in order to make a couple of amendments by way of clause-by-clause. Under section 159.1, we would argue that we

Interestingly, we have House time that we can be dealing with pretty substantive pieces of legislation. For example, the government introduced their budget bill a couple of weeks ago and they have, contained within that, changes to the pension regime in the province of Ontario where you would see employers getting a right to strip benefits out of pension surpluses. Is this more important than dealing with an issue such as the security of people's pensions in the province of Ontario? I would think we would want to deal with the latter rather than this one first, but we're here tonight to debate this one.

We'll support this bill. The Highway Traffic Amendment Act is, I think, to say in a very safe way, certainly a bill that's supported by a number of people in our province, especially people in the police departments who are going to be benefiting out of this. They understand that there's a danger, especially on the Highway 400 series, but it could also happen on two-lane highways, that if people don't take due regard when it comes to seeing an emergency vehicle parked on the side of the road giving assistance to some emergency or accident situation on the side of the highway, you need to make sure that there is some provision in order to deter people from speeding by and not taking due regard for safety of the emergency workers who are beside the highway.

We generally support what the bill does. I'm just going to read it out of the bill itself. Under part X of the Highway Traffic Act, 2002, by adding section 159.1, it says, "Upon approaching an emergency vehicle with its lamp producing intermittent flashes of red light that is stopped on a highway, the driver of a vehicle travelling on the same side of the highway shall slow down and proceed with caution...." I said the other day in debate, and I think it needs to be repeated again, a couple of points that we want to make. We think that this bill should be referred to committee—not for long; we don't believe that you have to have extensive public hearings on this—but we would like to get it into committee in order to make a couple of amendments by way of clause-by-clause. Under section 159.1, we would argue that we should extend not just for red lights, but for all vehicles that are providing emergency assistance, or assistance of some type, on the side of highways.

I said the other day and I say again today, you don't just have police vehicles and fire trucks stopping beside situations where there's been an accident or an incident. You have ambulances, which are not necessarily red lights; they're orange lights. So what are we saying in this bill—"We're prepared to protect people who have red lights on their vehicles but we're not prepared to protect emergency workers in the ambulance sector because they happen to have orange lights"?

What about the volunteer firefighters that use the blue light? We passed a bill in this House not too long ago that says that if you're a volunteer firefighter you're allowed to carry a blue flashing light inside your car. If you're on your way to an emergency that you've been called to, the person can take the blue light, put it out on the dash or on top of the car, whatever type they have, and proceed with caution, within speed limits, to the area where they're giving assistance. I will argue, and as Madame Martel will know, in parts of the province that I come from, the people who do respond to emergencies are volunteer fire departments. They're not the police officers that give the primary care, as far as extracting the person out of the accident vehicle or dealing with putting down the Absorb All because there's been gas that's gone across the highway; they're volunteer firefighters. I would like to be able to include under section 159.1 the ability for volunteer firefighters to be protected by the same type of law.

What about tow truck drivers? They're obviously the ones who are called on—I see the government saying no, that we shouldn't protect them. I say we should, because you have an accident or you have a situation happen and the first person on the scene normally is the Ontario Provincial Police or local police. The ambulance shows up shortly after, you've got the fire department that shows up to do the extrication, and then, on top of that, you've got the tow truck that comes, so the tow truck is there as well.

Are we saying we're not going to protect people in the tow truck industry? They probably could use protection under this legislation. We're saying whoever stops to give assistance when it comes to an emergency on the side of the road, or to give assistance to somebody on the side of the road, we should have a law that basically says that upon approaching an emergency vehicle with its lamps producing intermittent flashes—I would spell it out and say all types of lights—motorists must slow down and proceed with caution. That way we're able to protect all those people who come on the scene of an accident. I think it would only be a reasonable thing to do.

The other thing that we think is a bit odd in the bill is how this bill is going to work. Just think about this for a second. Let's say they don't amend the bill and we just have red lights covered under this legislation. On Highway 11, somewhere in northern Ontario you have an Ontario Provincial Police officer who gives assistance to some driver who has pulled off on the side of the road because of a difficulty with his or her car. The police officer has pulled over and he puts on the flashing lights to indicate there is an emergency or there's a situation that you should be careful of. All of a sudden you get a car coming by that doesn't slow down. Zoom, the car goes by the OPP officer.

Hon Mr Baird: How does it go again?

Mr Bisson: I'll say it again. The car goes by, zoom. It goes by the OPP officer at 60 miles or 70 miles an hour. What's the OPP officer going to do if that person they're giving service to is actually in an emergency? Is that lone OPP officer going to jump back into his or her cruiser and go down Highway 11, trying to catch the person who went by? Of course not. They're going to provide assistance to the person who's in the emergency situation. They're not going to take off. There's no mechanism in this law that says, like other laws, that all the police officer has to do is take down the plate number and file a charge by way of the plate number. There's no provision for this in the legislation.

The only way you could lay a charge under section 159.1 of the Highway Traffic Act would be for the police officer to jump into the car, give pursuit, pull the person over and give the ticket. That's the only way you'll be able to do a charge under this section of the act. I say, why not give police officers the tools they need to do their job safely? First of all, we take a position in Ontario that high-speed pursuits should be in very limited circumstances. We should be doing all we can to protect citizens and police officers from being put in a position of danger by way of a high-speed pursuit.

One of the ways you can do that is by putting an amendment in the legislation that says, "If I'm a police officer, an ambulance worker, an emergency worker of some type, and I'm giving assistance on the side of the highway in a vehicle with intermittently flashing lights, and somebody endangers one of the parties giving assistance by zooming by the accident and almost hitting somebody, all that person has to do is take down the plate number and say, "Here's the plate number." They give it to the police officer and the police officer then can summarily charge the individual on the basis of the plate.

There are already provisions to do that in hit-and-runs. That's already in the legislation. There's already the provision to do it in a whole bunch of instances under the Highway Traffic Act, but it's odd that in this legislation we're not giving that provision to police officers.

We need to get this bill into committee and get into amendments because we've got to make sure we give our police officers the tools they need to properly apply this bill so that (a) it's really meaningful, and (b) they're not putting themselves or anybody else in danger in trying to apply this particular law. It's only right that we should give police officers, emergency workers and other parties involved in these types of situations the ability to say, "This person didn't slow down. They went by real quick.

They put somebody in danger." You take down the plate number and you summarily charge the person by way of the plate number.

I see a couple of members in this assembly who were former police officers. I think they would agree with me on that, because police officers know the last thing they want to do is to give high-speed pursuit, especially in a city or town. Quite frankly, police are well trained. Police officers understand that it's only in rare circumstances that they should give high-speed pursuit. They have to have reason to believe that the person is going to be endangering somebody else in the public and that there's a good reason to pull them over.

Something like this: the way this law is written, let's say there's an accident in downtown Timmins or downtown Sudbury. The police officer has pulled over, is trying to give assistance at the accident, and all of a sudden you've got some moron going by who doesn't slow down and puts the police officer and others at the scene of the accident in danger. You potentially have a situation where the police officer may say, "Who was that?", jump in the car, take off and give pursuit. Before you know it, he or she, the police officer, is chasing this person down the streets in the city of Sudbury or Azilda or Timmins or wherever it might be.

I'm saying we have one policy in the province that says we should limit those types of pursuits, and here's an opportunity to limit the pursuit by putting an amendment in the legislation that says, "We will give police officers the ability to charge by way of taking the plate number and charging the person summarily from there."

There is already precedent for that in the legislation. In all other kinds of situations, you can give tickets in that way. I'm sure the minister responsible for safety and whatever—the Solicitor General, as it used to be called—would agree with me. Police officers are responsible individuals who want to do their job right and they need the tools from us, the legislators, that allow them to do their jobs properly. I would argue that not putting that provision in the legislation would put police officers in the position of having to make a judgment call on the side of the highway or road that they may regret later. Why put them in that position? Let's give them the right under the legislation to be able to charge that way.

I come back to the other point: we should not only be protecting emergency vehicles with red lights; there are ambulances; there are volunteer fire departments; there are tow truck drivers; there are green lights—the Ministry of Transportation often is on the scene, especially when it comes to truck accidents. What you'll often see on a highway, and I see it quite often on Highway 11 as I drive around my riding, is that you get a truck that goes off the side of the road because road conditions are such that it's kind of hard to hold them on the middle of the road in the wintertime and they end up going into the ditch. All of a sudden you've got a load that has been strewn along the side of the highway. You've got logs everywhere, chips, all kinds of stuff going on. You end up calling who? You call the Ministry of Transportation often to come and deal with that issue that's applicable to MTO. So I'm saying, why don't we protect the MTO inspection officers who may have to be out there because of some condition that has happened in regard to trucking?

We're saying, "Good bill. Not a bad idea. Good step forward." We're going to vote for it at second reading. We think this is a pretty good piece of legislation, but we make the point that it has to go to committee. We need to deal with those two particular issues I raised as a way of being able to make this bill better so that police officers are able to do their jobs properly. Those are two of the points we want to make.

Hon Robert W. Runciman (Minister of Public Safety and Security): More delaying tactics.

Mr Bisson: Now the minister—I'm so surprised, I'm so hurt that the minister responsible for safety is saying, "This is delaying tactics." This is not delaying tactics. The reality is that this Legislature meets from time to time to deal with public business. As I understand it, this is a bill that will affect the public of Ontario.

Here we've got a bill that basically is going to do not a bad thing. All we're saying in the opposition is that we need some time to debate this bill so we can raise the issues. Through this debate, we have raised, and the Liberals have raised, points that I think are valid. In our particular case, in the NDP caucus, we are saying there are a couple of things we should do to make this bill better, to protect other emergency workers from being endangered by vehicles that don't slow down and proceed with care, by also giving police officers the tools, the ability to charge summarily by way of a licence plate, rather than jumping in their car and running away, and the minister responsible for safety says, "Oh, you're just delaying. This is delaying tactics."

I've got a whole 20 minutes to make the point, and I say to the minister, my God, of all people, I would think he would support these useful amendments, because I know Mr Runciman. He's an honourable member and he has made a bit of badge for himself. We call him Top Cop around here—you, know, the sheriff walks into the room. We know Mr Runciman likes to support police officers, and good for him, as we do. All I'm saying is, here is an opportunity, Minister, to be able—

Mrs Margaret Marland (Mississauga South): If you do, you would have passed this by now.

Mr Bisson: Now we've got the former minister responsible for seniors saying we're delaying. Come on, be real.

All we're doing, Bob, is saying, "Let's give those police officers the tools they need to do their job." That's not unreasonable.

Ms Shelley Martel (Nickel Belt): In northern Ontario, it's the paramedics on the side of the road.

Mr Bisson: There's the other issue. Exactly. My good colleague from Nickel Belt raises the point that the people on the scene in many of our communities up north are the paramedics. Often the police officers get there after the paramedics, quite frankly. Why aren't we protecting them? They're all emergency workers and I think we all agree as members of the Legislature that this is not a partisan issue. I don't see the three parties' names all over this and lines divided all over the place.

We're saying this is not a bad idea, but there's a way of improving on the idea. What's wrong with that? Don't draw a line in the sand, minister responsible for safety, public issues, former Solicitor General, whatever it is. Don't draw a line in the sand. Say, "I'm open-minded as a minister. I want to hear good suggestions." And I think you have to agree, these are good, positive suggestions. It gives the police officer the tools they need and we protect other emergency workers. What's wrong with that?

So we're saying, this is not delay. Send it off to committee; I'll agree to do committee in half a day. Send it off to committee for an hour. I just need an hour to table the amendments, to explain them and have the government vote for them. I would hope they want to protect other emergency workers and I would hope they want to give a police officer the tools, but if you refuse to go to committee, what are you saying to police officers and others? You're saying to all the other emergency workers, "I don't care, because only the police officers are worth protecting," and I know you don't want to say that. I would hope that you don't want to say that. If you don't go to committee, it means you don't want to give them the tools.

Who is here defending police officers and other emergency workers? In this case, it's the New Democratic Party of Ontario. We are standing here shoulder to shoulder with the brothers and sisters in the trenches who deal with emergency issues in the province of Ontario and we're saying, as New Democrats, give those people the support. What's wrong with that?

The other point is, to the government saying, "Oh, we're wasting time here debating. Boy, is democracy a lot of trouble, eh? Man, democracy just gets in the way of a government's ability to do what the heck it wants, and those pesky opposition members, they come into the Legislature and they say, 'I want an amendment on a piece of legislation.' Oh boy, you're pretty pesky over there," well, you know what? Last time I checked, this still is a democracy; at least I want to believe it is. It doesn't work as well as it used to, since you guys got the power, but that's for another debate. But I just say, somebody's got to come to this Legislature and raise these points, because all that happens on the government side of the benches is you guys come in with your prepared script that says, "I am a Conservative member. I am reading the script that's prepared by the Premier's office. I will tout the party line." It's like a bunch of automatons.

I'd like someone for once—Mr Mazzilli, for example, who is a former police officer—to stand up in a debate and say, "Yeah, I agree with Mr Bisson and the New Democratic Party. As a former police officer, I agree that other people are put in danger on the side of the highway when it comes to dealing with accidents. And it's not just police officers that have to be protected, it's our paramedics, it's our firefighters, it's our volunteer firefighters, it's all of those workers, including tow truck drivers. And yes, I agree with Mr Bisson. Give us, the police officers, the tools that we need to protect, give us the opportunity to do that."

But no, I get the front bench of the Conservative caucus going, "Oh, you're coming in here and you're delaying this legislation. Oh, you're getting in the way. Pass the bill without debate."

I know my good friends across the way, like Mr Turnbull, would support reasoned amendments like this. I know they would, if they were only given the ability, if only the Premier's office would release the shackles around their legs, those big shackles they put around their ankles, and allow them to walk free within the caucus chamber and allow them to walk free in the Legislature. Just pull those chains and shackles off and stand up and say, "Yes, we are with the New Democratic Party. We want to support police officers, we want to support the paramedics, we want to support all those workers out there who are put in danger at the side of road. And Ernie, we throw away these prepared texts that you give us. We don't believe that. We want to support the New Democrats because you know what, Ernie? Like on Hydro, they're right, and when, God, the New Democrats are right, they're right, and we should support them."

We're just saying that's not an unreasonable thing to ask for. We take our responsibility very seriously here, as New Democrats. It wasn't popular coming in here six months ago, a year ago, and saying Hydro deregulation is a bad thing, market opening is a bad thing. We came in the House, we used every tactic we could in order to be able to make that point, and the government across the way said, "Ah, you're wrong, you're stalling, these are scare tactics. It ain't gonna happen."

Look what happens. Now the Liberals have flip-flopped and even they agree with us now. I saw them both this afternoon in the House. They supported the NDP resolution on hydro. We talked about how the Liberals took everything off their Web site when it comes to hydro policy and it's a big blank. Now they've put, "Press this link. Go to the NDP Web page and you'll get hydro policy for the Liberal Party," because they'll press a link from the Liberal page and it will bring them to Howard Hampton's page and into public power. So I say to the ministers across the way, throw off those shackles. Become the free spirits that you should be. Stand up for democracy. Assist the emergency workers in this province and support the New Democratic Party with its reasoned amendments to give all emergency workers the protection they need under this bill. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Further debate. The Chair recognizes the member for Halton.

Interjections.

Mr Ted Chudleigh (Halton): I'm sorry, Mr Speaker. Did you introduce me? I didn't hear you.

The Acting Speaker: Yes, and there's a reason you didn't hear me. It will not happen again. Take my word for it. The Chair recognizes the member for Halton.

Mr Chudleigh: I'm very pleased to enter this debate.

Mr Bisson: Throw the speech away. Throw off the shackles.

Mr Chudleigh: I'm going to throw a big part of it away, Mr Bisson, and I'll address some of your comments.

I will be sharing my time with Mr McDonald, the honourable member for Nipissing, this evening. What I don't cover I'm sure you'll find he will cover very well.

Now that we have finished with the member from Timmins-James Bay, the hyperbole, and some might say hypocritical—but that might be going a little too far.

The Acting Speaker: I would ask you to withdraw.

Mr Chudleigh: I apologize. I withdraw.

I'd like to thank Mr Frank Mazzilli and also the honourable David Turnbull for doing the background effort and bringing this important piece of legislation forward. My esteemed colleagues have already pointed out, as this is the second day of debate in this House, that the front-line police officers and firefighters in this great province of Ontario, and other emergency service personnel—and that's how it's defined in the Highway Traffic Act: "other emergency personnel." That covers ambulance workers, it covers paramedics, it covers all the people the member speaking before me would have included in amendments. They're already in. I appreciate that he hasn't had time. You may not have time to read every piece of legislation that comes before the House, and you can't really refer to Coles Notes. You really have to delve into the legislation to understand it.

Those people he was talking about are already in this piece of legislation and these people in Ontario, all of them, play a very important role in ensuring the safety of citizens in this province. Without them, life as we know it wouldn't exist. These people stand between the rule of law and total chaos in our province. We owe all of them a huge debt of gratitude. They go about their jobs with the full knowledge that the shift they are currently working could be the last. They accept that possibility as one of the hazards that comes with doing something they love to do and something that they do extremely well. But they shouldn't have to be put in a position of being killed or seriously injured while performing such everyday functions as handing out tickets or tending to minor fender benders.

I can assure you that the Eves government intends to do whatever it takes and whatever it can do to protect these dedicated men and women who deserve our thanks and support. Bill 191, the legislation before the House this evening, goes a long way to providing that support. I encourage every member of this legislation to vote yes when this bill comes for a vote. The men and women who are putting their lives on the line for us every day are watching, and we won't let them down.

It seems to me that when this legislation does come before this House for a vote eventually, everyone in this House will support it. We were talking earlier about the need to debate some bills in this House for longer periods of time than we currently do, and there are pieces of legislation which we all agree to and which cover all of the appropriate clauses in the bill that we don't necessarily have to debate for long periods of time. But this bill will go on for three days of debate, we'll have one day of time allocation and then the bill will be passed for second reading.

Before the House right now there is Bill 198, which is a very long and thick budget bill covering a myriad of subjects that really deserves a longer period of time in debate, as does Bill 180, a similar large bill. We would have time to debate those bills. We could debate them six days, eight days, 10 days. We could put them in committee. We could do all kinds of things in debating those bills if we could get the co-operation of the opposition on bills like this that don't deserve four days of debate. We all agree to them. We should pass them and get on with it.

The other bills—the budget bill, the consumers' act bill—could be debated more thoroughly by this House if we had that kind of co-operation. I would encourage the opposition parties to think about what they are doing to the democratic process when they refuse to move expeditiously on bills that we all agree on.

As my colleagues have indicated, the Eves government is very serious about this piece of legislation. I would like to take a moment or two to explain what the legislation is and how it works and how it could be enforced and then the penalties that are associated with it.

The legislation mandates that drivers that are approaching vehicles going in the same direction as the vehicle stopped by the side of the highway, and with their red emergency lights flashing, must slow down to a reasonable speed, a very slow speed. What is reasonable will be dictated by the traffic flow, the posted speed limit on the roadway and, naturally, the current weather conditions, the current light conditions and whether it's day or night and that sort of thing.

It also calls for the driver to move into an adjacent lane prior to passing the stopped vehicle if the adjacent lane is free of traffic. That can only occur where there are at least two existing lanes travelling in the same direction as the traffic passing the stopped vehicle, and that it is safe to do so.

The legislation will apply to all vehicles, excluding school buses, with flashing red lights—which motorists in Ontario know that they should not pass when the flashing red lights are activated.

Section 62 of the Highway Traffic Act authorizes ambulance, fire, police, public utility, emergency vehicles and the Ministries of Transportation, Natural Resources and Environment vehicles to carry the red flashing lights. If the member opposite had read that section he wouldn't have been railing on about his amendments. Sixteen American states and the province of Saskatchewan have enacted similar legislation as Ontario's proposed law. However, Ontario's proposed law is among the toughest in Canada.

I think we will do whatever it takes to protect the lives of our police officers, firefighters and other emergency service personnel in Ontario. Over the past four years, with great sadness, it is unfortunate that we have seen four of these officers lose their lives while standing beside the road carrying out the laws of this province.

Those convicted of disobeying this new law, if it should pass, can expect to be dealt with very severely. For the first offence the fine will be not less than $400 and not more than $2,000. For the second or subsequent convictions, a fine of $1,000 to $4,000 would be assessed, and imprisonment for a maximum of six months, or both fine and imprisonment. It is a very serious situation. The court can also suspend the person's driver's licence for a maximum of two years.

These penalties are comparable to those assessed to drivers that fail to stop for school buses with their red lights flashing. We take extraordinary steps to protect our children. We should do no less for those that protect us and also those who protect our children.

The Ministers of Public Safety and Security and Transportation will work closely, once the legislation is passed, to ensure that the driving public is made aware of these new regulations. There will be a need for a phasing in of the law that gives the driving public an opportunity to adapt to these changes.

I can assure the House, however, that once the grace period is past, the government will see to it that the law is enforced. This province can't afford to lose even one more police officer, firefighter or other emergency service worker to a needless and somewhat avoidable accident.

Drivers who commit these crimes will pay the price, and they can count on it.

In closing, I'd like to once again encourage all members of the House to show their support for the front-line workers by passing this important piece of legislation unanimously—something that I'm very sure will happen eventually. In closing, I'd like to point out that it is the holiday season and I would like to encourage all the members of the House and those watching that they don't drink and drive, don't become a statistic or be the cause of a flashing light on the side of one of Ontario's roads.

Mr Pat Hoy (Chatham-Kent Essex): I am indeed pleased this evening to rise and speak on Bill 191. Of course, we will be supporting this bill. Dalton McGuinty and the Ontario Liberals agree with the government and all who believe that we should protect our emergency service workers and at the same time ensure the public is also provided with a degree of safety.

I want to comment on the fact that the member from Brant, when he read the title of this bill—An Act to amend the Highway Traffic Act to ensure the safety of emergency vehicles stopped on a highway and people who are outside a stopped emergency vehicle—noted in the title that the government has chosen to put the vehicles ahead of the people in the title. I would submit that if you want to ensure that they would move—

Interjection.

Mr Hoy:—to ensure, I say to the minister opposite, that you have vehicles ahead of the people. That's where we come from: protecting the people, not the vehicles, first. I think it's a minor issue, of course, but one that has significance to those people who ride in those emergency vehicles. I put it to the minister that perhaps they could just simply reverse the title to a small degree to ensure that we put people ahead of the vehicles.

The act calls for persons to move to the left when coming in contact with an emergency vehicle that has a red light flashing. I think that currently many people do this. I think many people automatically move to the left. They recognize there is an activity going on in front of them. I think what the government's trying to do here is ensure that this happens in all cases. I'm certain they are trying to set a good example to promote the issue that one should move to the left when this activity is taking place with any emergency vehicle with the red light flashing.

The question of enforcement has been raised by others in this House, on our side of the House and by the third party. In particular, when, for example, a police officer has pulled over someone who has perhaps had a driving infraction or simply needs assistance, how would they capture someone who is blatantly breaking this law? That has been put to the government on numerous occasions. I think that is part of why even the minister, who in all sincerity is trying to protect those emergency workers, recognizes that this is a strong piece of legislation aimed at ensuring that people who currently move to the left—have that occur in all instances. One should be doing that on a regular basis.

The number of injuries and deaths to those who provide those services is tragic. We need to ensure that people understand that we in Ontario will not tolerate aggressive or simply very poor judgment and poor driving. By way of example, this bill helps to move along the attitude that we must be responsible on our highways.

The bill does not say to what speed these vehicles should slow down. It does not say how much one should slow down when passing an activity that involves emergency vehicles with the red lights flashing. There is a great deal of discretion, it would appear, within the bill as to how much one should slow down. Of course, as I mentioned, how would one apprehend a person if they are the only officer or there is no officer involved at all? It could be another emergency vehicle, such as fire or ambulance, as mentioned by others.

We have a situation in my particular part of the riding where we have a part of Highway 401 which, due to so much tragedy on that highway, had been commonly called Carnage Alley. There today exist only two lanes going eastbound and westbound. There is no third lane. There is no left-hand paved shoulder and there's no median barrier.

I happened to be just recently near the site of an accident. According to press reports, no one was killed, thank goodness, but according to the press a tow truck crossed Highway 401 and hit oncoming cars in the eastbound lane—two vehicles. As the traffic stopped and backed down the 401 because of the accident in the roadway—I was perhaps 10 transport lengths back from the accident—the police were called to assist. They could not cross the highway from the westbound side on to the east and get on to the right-hand paved shoulder because of all the traffic backed up. So the police officers were driving down the embankment, which is very, very steep in that particular section of 401, on a rakish angle on the passing-lane side.

I would say to the Minister of Transportation and the Minister of Public Safety that we need to have fully paved shoulders on both sides of the highway, not just one side of the highway. We need that extra lane. I think those officers were put at some risk driving down the left-hand median.

Hon David Turnbull (Associate Minister of Enterprise, Opportunity and Innovation): So why didn't your government spend any money on the roads?

Mr Hoy: The minister opposite has stated in the past, when he was Minister of Transportation, that he would look at this issue some 11 years from when he was Minister of Transportation; 11 years down the road he would look at that. So that's the commitment the government has given to date. "We'll look at it and maybe do something 11 years down the road." So we have no left-hand paved shoulder, we have no median barrier.

There's another section of Highway 401 between Woodstock and Cambridge that is nearly identical. It does not have a third lane. It does not have a paved shoulder on the left-hand side. It does not have a barrier. I've talked to police officers who say that every time they see black tire marks on that median they know that a life has been saved or at the very least injury has been put aside. Police officers tell me that.

The argument is this one: if we have three lanes, fully paved shoulders on both sides of the highway and a median barrier on some sections of the 401, therefore it must be a safety feature that can be enjoyed by all. However, we do not have continuity on the 401. We move from two lanes to three, back to two, and then of course in the GTA we have multiple lanes, beyond three.

In order to help our emergency workers—all of them: police, fire, emergency and others—we should have fully paved shoulders on both sides of our 400 series highways, allow for that room for people to get over, as this bill requires, and assist in a major way all the public who drive on the 401, and that includes our emergency service personnel.

I think the government should embark on a positive educational program in regard to this bill. Currently, we have a law that says that when an emergency vehicle approaches a vehicle you must move to the right-hand side of the road, get out of the way, let them go do their work, pull over to the right and stop. That's if an emergency vehicle is coming behind you and you hear the sirens, the bells perhaps, and of course the red lights flashing. You are to pull over to the right. Now we have a piece of legislation introduced here that requires vehicles in certain circumstances to pull to the left. So I think it would be prudent of the government to do positive, non-partisan advertising and explain to the public the situations whereby one is required to pull to the right-hand side of the road for emergency vehicles and in other situations you must pull to the left-hand side. I think we should certainly have the driving public understand what is required in both cases, and in all cases.

It's also interesting to note anecdotally, talking to the public and with some police officers, that the current law whereby a vehicle must pull over to the right has a fine to it. Yes, it does. So does this piece of legislation, Bill 191, have fines attached to it. But they tell me that people cherish the points on their licences. They don't want to have demerit points. Neither one of these pieces of legislation allows for points to be taken away from those who have an infraction under either one of these two laws in Ontario, should Bill 191 be passed. I know that people cherish their driving licence points. I further state that that perhaps also has an effect on their insurance rate, and people want to make sure their insurance rate is kept at a reasonable level, so they drive with that in mind.

Also on our highways, as mentioned by many, we have police officers, fire, ambulance and other emergency vehicles, and volunteer firefighters are on the scene as well. I would hope that the Minister of Transportation and the Minister of Public Safety would look at Bill 153, the Safety in Highway Construction Zones Statute Law Amendment Act, introduced by myself as a private member's bill. This bill would ensure and enhance the safety of our construction workers. Bill 153, introduced December 12, 2001, implements the recommendations made by the coroner's jury as a result of the inquest into the death of Dick Van Rooyen. Mr Van Rooyen was a construction worker killed in the Ridgetown area on Highway 401. Mr Van Rooyen's accident, his untimely death, occurred on Carnage Alley, on the 401, which happens to be the section of the 401 that's in my riding.

If the government would just take this bill and run with it; call it your own. Take this bill and protect our construction workers as well. It would amend the Highway Traffic Act by increasing the penalties if convicted of a driving offence in a construction zone. It would permit municipalities to designate construction zones as community safety zones. It would double the fines for speeding through construction zones—we would double the fines through construction zones, a strong deterrent—and it provides for the doubling of demerit points on that offence. The demerit points I was just talking about under Bill 191 would not be affected, nor are they put in place for those who fail to pull to the right for an emergency vehicle.

It also provides that traffic should be diverted to the other side of the road, with the contractor supplying a written traffic protection plan. By "the other side of the road"—we're talking about the 400 series highways.

I have talked to construction workers who favour this bill. It is supported by the Construction Safety Association of Ontario, the Ontario Road Builders' Association and the Transportation Health and Safety Association of Ontario. I say to the government, take this bill, take it upon yourselves, bring it in under the Ministry of Transportation or perhaps—the minister is here tonight—the Ministry of Public Safety and Security and have it passed so that we can protect our construction workers.

I have talked to construction persons who, while working, have had rakes and shovels taken right out of their hands by cars and other vehicles going by. That's very close. They were very fortunate they weren't injured or killed. Mr Van Rooyen was killed. Not only that, it's gotten to the point where the tolerance of people going through construction zones appears to be challenged. They will throw things at construction workers. Can you imagine a car or any other motorized vehicle moving at a high rate of speed and they're throwing pop cans at construction workers? At the very least, let's slow these vehicles down and ensure a degree of safety for construction workers, and let's do it in the name of Dick Van Rooyen. As a matter of fact, Mr Van Rooyen's name appears in the title of the bill, in his memory. I'm pleased that the family has worked along with me in this regard.

So we have demerit points that will be doubled, we have fines that will be doubled, and where a court or judge has convicted a person for a contravention of subsection (14.1) and has determined that the person convicted was driving at a rate of speed of 50 or more kilometres per hour greater than the maximum speed limit, the court may suspend the driver's licence of that person for a period of not more than 60 days.

This is a strong bill. It contains at least three different deterrents, that being doubling the fines for speeding, doubling the demerit points, and also one could lose their licence. I think this House would agree with me that Bill 153 should have been passed into law immediately after being introduced on December 12, 2001, as a private member's bill.

I want to move on. The bill, as was pointed out by the members of the government opposite, does provide a section that says "'emergency vehicle' means a vehicle described in subsection 62," which does include other than just police vehicles. But it goes on to say that it does not include a school bus. It mentions right in the bill that we're discussing tonight, Bill 191, that it does not pertain to school buses. However, I have a private member's bill that deals with school buses. I think the government should allow it, after second reading has occurred in this House, to move to committee, be brought back for third reading and made into law.

Bill 112 would protect the 810,000 children who ride school buses each and every day. It would assist the over 16,000 buses that are out on our roads and streets each and every day. It would protect the children and provide a strong deterrent for those who recklessly pass school buses when the red lights are flashing. This occurs far too often. School bus owners, school bus drivers, tell me it happens two and three times per shift, and it must stop—it must stop.

I have introduced this bill five times. Successive Ministers of Transportation have spoken against it, or at the very least have not allowed it to go through the process of this House beyond second reading.

I have been very fortunate in the lottery we have here in terms of private member's bills. I have had the opportunity to introduce this five times with the support of 30,000 names on petitions, with the support of Larry and Colleen Marcuzzi, whose 16-year-old daughter Ryan was killed by someone who passed a school bus when the red lights were flashing. It's very difficult for the Marcuzzi family to talk about their young daughter Ryan. But over time, Mrs Marcuzzi has told me that every bone in her body was broken.

We have to ensure that the driving public knows that we will not allow in Ontario the blatant disregard for those red lights flashing on a school bus. They are there to protect the children. There is not in this province a strong deterrent. What we have is the lack of a conviction mechanism. By that I mean the school bus driver must identify the face of the offending driver. It's virtually impossible—blacked-out windows, time of day, speed of the vehicle. If the vehicle is passing from the back to the front of the bus they only see the back of one's head. My bill would allow for the identification of the licence number, better known as vehicle liability. The government allows vehicle liability on the 407 to collect money. They allow vehicle liability at red-light cameras. But they seem not to want to protect the children of Ontario, those 810,000 who ride school buses every day, with vehicle liability. School bus owners, operators and police have told me that this bill would certainly provide a conviction mechanism to those who witness a crime and could be cross-examined about it.

The Deputy Speaker: Further debate?

Mr AL McDonald (Nipissing): It's my pleasure to join in the debate regarding Bill 191, the Highway Traffic Amendment Act (Emergency Vehicle Safety), 2002, which is designed to enhance the safety of police officers, firefighters and other emergency personnel and to modify driver behaviour.

This legislation will apply to all vehicles, excluding school buses, with flashing red lights. Subsection 62(15.1) of the Highway Traffic Act authorizes ambulance, fire, police, public utility emergency vehicles, and Ministries of Transportation, Natural Resources, and Environment vehicles to carry a red light. So this bill covers all emergency personnel, all emergency vehicles.

The other day I had three police officers visit me here at Queen's Park from my riding of Nipissing: Sergeant Mike Tarini, Constable Noel Coulas, and Constable Shawn Devine. They all have children. They pleaded with us to put this bill through and pass it so that they could be protected, so that their kids wouldn't have to worry about some driver running them over while they are out there trying to protect us. The fact that we're looking after emergency personnel and we're looking after these individuals who are there to protect and serve us deserves consideration when we are reading this.

We talk about all the important bills that are before the Legislature, like safe, clean drinking water and consumer protection. This, to me, is a no-brainer. So if I could, I'd like to ask for unanimous consent for second and third reading of Bill 191, the emergency vehicle safety act, 2002.

The Deputy Speaker: Mr McDonald has requested unanimous consent to pass second and third reading of Bill 191. Agreed? It is not agreed.

The Chair recognizes the member for Nipissing.

Mr McDonald: Many of us don't recognize the high risk that front-line police officers can face during traffic stops. When an officer has pulled his or her cruiser off to the side of the highway to issue a speeding ticket or a warning, to provide help or investigate an accident, we don't necessarily think of this as a very dangerous part of their job. But this is a very dangerous part of their job. In the past five years, several police officers have lost their lives as a result of being involved in traffic accidents while stopped on the side of our provincial highways. Many others have narrowly missed being run over. Not only is this endangering the life of an officer; it also leads to the possibility of these trucks hitting other vehicles that might stop on the shoulder of the roadway.

This is the kind of driver behaviour this legislation is designed to eliminate. These officers and other emergency personnel are there to protect us. They understand that their job is, by its very nature, dangerous. However, they shouldn't have to worry about their life being at risk needlessly because of inappropriate action of irresponsible drivers.

This legislation will lessen the risk these hard-working men and women take in performing their duties of protecting the rest of us. Bill 191, if passed, will make the public more aware of emergency vehicles stopped on the shoulder of the highway, increase the safety of police and other emergency personnel, remind drivers of their responsibilities as drivers and deter driving recklessly.

Many of these people who actually take these risks, who put their lives on the line as part of their job, are with us today. We're joined this evening by Mr Bruce Miller and Ed Kinnear. Together they represent over 20,000 front-line police officers in municipal police services in the Ontario Provincial Police across the province. So welcome to both these gentlemen here tonight.

I'd like to take this opportunity on behalf of the Honourable Bob Runciman, the Minister of Public Safety and Security, to thank the OPA and the OPPA and the various other organizations that contributed their comments and suggestions to help us draft this legislation. We appreciate their efforts, their commitment and their co-operation in fighting for what's right: the safety of the men and women who ably represent us, who keep us safe.

I think it's fair to say that the people who actually wear those shoes, the people who actually step out of their cruisers in close proximity to the vehicles travelling at high speeds, support this legislation. They want this legislation. They believe it will improve their on-the-job safety, and this government agrees. We're confident that the citizens of Ontario will embrace this legislation as well.

Bill 191, if passed, will see Ontario in the forefront of jurisdictions that make officer safety a priority. Ontario has always been a leader in supporting our police officers, our firefighters and other emergency personnel, and we intend to continue that. Even one more death of an officer or an emergency worker as a result of this type of accident is unacceptable and can be avoided here in Ontario.

The Eves government is determined to protect the safety and well-being of our front-line officers and other emergency personnel. Everyone who uses our provincial highways will benefit from this legislation because we all benefit when these hard-working men and women are able to concentrate on the task at hand.

By forcing drivers to slow down to a reasonable speed or, where it's feasible and safe to do so, move to the adjacent lane, we are protecting those whose job it is to protect us. I encourage all members of this Legislature to support this legislation.

In closing, Mr Speaker—we're running out of time here tonight—I'd like to remind the members of this Legislature of a very sobering thought. Each year the Minister of Public Safety and Security and most of my colleagues here in the Legislature attend memorial services throughout the province to honour police officers and firefighters who have lost their lives in the line of duty. This legislation won't necessarily prevent additional names from being added to the memorials, but it will go a long way toward providing greater safety for these men and women. Even one death of this nature is unacceptable and can be avoided here in Ontario.

The Eves government is determined to protect the safety and well-being of our front-line officers and our emergency personnel. It needn't take the death of another police officer, firefighter or emergency personnel for this House to recognize the seriousness of this situation. These people are valuable resources; they are wives, husbands, mothers, fathers, sons and daughters.

Let us put a stop to these needless, avoidable deaths now by passing this legislation.

I would like to continue to speak, but I see my time is up, so I'd like to thank you for the opportunity to speak on Bill 191.

Hon Mr Baird: I'd like to indicate the strong support of my constituents in Nepean-Carleton and a lot of police officers in Ottawa-Carleton for this important piece of legislation.

The Deputy Speaker: In accordance with the agreement made earlier tonight, this House stands adjourned until 10 am tomorrow.

The House adjourned at 1947.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BUSINESS

GRAFFITI AND ADVERTISING SIGNS CONTROL ACT, 2002

LOI DE 2002

SUR LE CONTRÔLE DES GRAFFITIS ET DES PANNEAUX PUBLICITAIRES

Mr Kells moved second reading of the following bill:

Bill 205, An Act to control graffiti on public and private property and advertising signs on public property / Projet de loi 205, Loi visant à contrôler les graffitis sur des biens publics et privés et des panneaux publicitaires sur des biens publics.

The Acting Speaker (Mr Michael A. Brown): The member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore has 10 minutes for his presentation.

Mr Morley Kells (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): I rise today to address the Legislature on the merits of my Graffiti and Advertising Signs Control Act, 2002, and the necessity to have the province take action to protect the property rights of the public.

Graffiti takes place on both private and public property, while illegal advertising signs are usually placed at random on public property near well-travelled thoroughfares. I'm going to quote from an article by author Jake Reichert, in a journal article out of Winnipeg:

"Graffiti has existed in one form or another as long as writing. The earliest known cave paintings dated from 20,000 years ago sometimes seem to have more in common with modern graffiti than with writing.

"Confining a person's avenues of graphic and decorative expressions to books, canvases and printed pages—instead of spreading them out on communal surfaces—is a relatively recent practice and is part of our culture's obsession with private property."

Right from the start let me be clear: graffiti is one thing and illegal signs another, but the one thing they have in common is that they intrude on the public consciousness without permission. They both assault your privacy and show utter disregard for property rights, whether we are referring to public property infrastructure or the walls of homes and commercial properties.

With this in mind, I will begin with graffiti, for it is by far the most pervasive of the two, and obviously the most difficult to police and eliminate as a public nuisance. The original graffiti artists I suppose could be called the media writers of ancient and medieval times, for often their drawings told a story of events of the era, and often in vivid colour and description, without the use of language, which hadn't yet been created. To these unknown purveyors of the realities of life, we owe an incredible vote of thanks. But we've come a long way since the days of cave art and their messages, and current graffiti relates little of value unless you believe that "John luvs Judy" painted on a subway wall delivers a sublime message of some kind.

Before I get ahead of my story, let me tell you why I feel so strongly that something has to be done before our capital city of Toronto begins to resemble and suffer the fate of some of Europe's great cities.

Just last year I was fortunate enough, along with my wife and a group of friends, to visit Hungary and their capital of Budapest, a charming city to be sure, with a metropolitan area that is resplendent with churches, government buildings and commercial structures that glorify the landscape. Unfortunately, it's all spoiled by an overwhelming display of graffiti on building after building up and down the main streets of the city. These are not fresh displays. Their existence relates the frustrating struggle of hundreds of wounded and captive spirits over the years to have their joys and sorrows on record.

Perhaps I'm being overly kind here when I credit the scribbles with a motive other than vandalism, but let's accept the presumption of a lack of malice. Nonetheless, the architecture of these twin cities separated by the Danube is degraded by those unwanted frescos.

Upon my return to Toronto, I began to notice just how much this defacing of walls, postboxes, telephone and electricity units has expanded in our fair city. Toronto and other urban centres now face a similar fate, unless we take steps to eliminate new displays of graffiti and eradicate the offending renderings that have grown to assault our senses as subway trains, buses and cars roll by or be forced to endure these unwanted intrusions forever.

A review of the efforts of Canadian cities, through their municipal councils, is in order.

Vancouver, way back in 1994, declared war on the rascals smearing city walls with graffiti by these punitive measures: every owner of real property must remove from that real property any unsightly accumulation of graffiti within 10 days after the director of permits and licences causes a notice to be served upon the owner requiring such removal. Secondly, if an owner defaults in removing any unsightly accumulation of graffiti, the city, by its workers or others, may enter the real property and effect such removal at the cost of the defaulting owner. Finally, if an owner defaults in paying to the city, within 30 days after receipt of demand for payment from the city, the city may recover from the owner by putting their cost on the tax bill.

Victoria responded to this menace with even harsher penalties. A 23-year-old Victoria man has already served jail time for doing thousands of dollars of damage to three local businesses. He spent 16 days in jail after pleading guilty in provincial court out there to three counts of mischief under $5,000 for tagging buildings. Three other people have been charged and their cases are before the courts.

It is estimated that graffiti removal costs $2 million to $3 million a year in downtown Victoria. The police believe 12 to 15 hard-core addicts are responsible for 80% of the graffiti in the downtown area.

Then there's Montreal's experience when they had to shut down their contribution to the Great Millennium Wall of Canada project back in 2001 after the graffiti applicators chased out the real artists and destroyed their mural. "Right now, Montreal does not have any laws about graffiti removal," said Montreal city officials. Montreal has spent millions of dollars, including $1 million this year, helping property owners clean up graffiti on their walls, but ultimately it isn't the city's responsibility and will have to be done by owners.

Chicago, Philadelphia and New York require building owners to remove graffiti at their own expense.

Yet nobody has tried harder and more recently than Toronto with its proclamation that declared May 2002 as Graffiti Reduction Month. Graffiti, as embodied within the program context, is specific to the unlawful defacing of both private and public property through the use of this kind of writing.

1010

Here are the common targets, and if you look around Toronto you will quickly relate to the list: public and private buildings; parks and recreational facilities; public transit vehicles, stations and shelters; public telephone booths; railway cars; bridges and overpasses. That's why I'm suggesting that a $5,000 fine for each offence is in order.

The dimension of the graffiti problem is clear and well chronicled, and the least the members of this House can do is support my bill and let our municipalities know that the senior level of government supports their efforts to clean up and maintain the public's right to have unwanted, unintelligible etchings rendered unacceptable in our society.

The problem of erecting or attaching advertising signs to public property is a much easier law to enforce. Simply put, the offender is clearly identified by the message on the sign. It is patently a scheme dreamed up by some companies to advertise without cost. I recall that when Avenue Road Roofing started this trend and were quickly joined by Alpine Roofing, then an assortment of other roofing firms got in on the act. Lately, they've been erecting these unwanted signs around the Queen's Park Legislature, and I think this is the final straw. Many intersections are littered with 1-800-GOT-JUNK signs, and now an ever-increasing list of small business offerings are sprouting up like weeds.

If the bill becomes an act, through third reading and royal proclamation, we should encourage our municipalities and police forces to crack down on the well-known offenders. What's the use of beautifying the main streets in our cities and towns and then letting them be marred by unwanted and illegal advertising messages?

The offence is straightforward and remedial action should be swift: get the gratuitous signs off our public property or pay the consequences.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): I'm pleased to join the debate to offer my support for the bill and congratulate the member for bringing it forward. I think it's actually quite an important bill.

I've watched with interest New York City's rejuvenation. In a 10-year period, New York City has recovered enormously. One of the things they did was to clean up the city, and one thing they cleaned up was the graffiti. For those who may remember New York City 15 years ago, when you rode the subway there it was filled with graffiti. Not that I visit there very often, but I did go down a year ago for Canada Loves New York—all at my own expense, by the way, just in case the taxpayers are understandably worried about politicians using their money. I took my grandson down, and my daughter. You have to be impressed with what New York City has done.

I came to understand this issue through a very good friend of mine, a police officer who was on the Toronto police force as an emergency task force officer. I coached hockey with this individual. He got in a car accident and became a quadriplegic, had no use of his hands or lower body. I give the Toronto Police Service a lot of credit. He went back to the Toronto Police Service full-time as a constable under then Chief McCormack, by the way, and then Chief Boothby and then Chief Fantino, all of whom were supportive of this.

One of his jobs was to deal with youth gangs. He became Canada's expert on youth gangs. No one knew more about youth gangs than my friend Brian Keown. We'd drive around Toronto—he drove an adapted van; quite an extraordinary individual—and he would point out graffiti for me. He'd say, "That's X gang. That's Y gang." He could identify virtually all the graffiti and could tell you what youth gang it was associated with. My friend Brian would tell me that it is important that we not allow this to continue, that, quite apart from the points my colleague Mr Kells mentioned about just the sight of our city, there's another aspect to this that's real. My friend Brian Keown would, not lecture me, but kind of encourage me to recognize that this isn't simply a case of some individuals deciding to take their artistic merit and display it on a wall or a freight car or the side of an arena; it also had, in many cases, some other implications.

So I think this piece of legislation, while seemingly relatively minor, is important on a variety of fronts on the graffiti side. I take to heart the New York City experience. I think there are things we can learn from what happened in New York City. One of the things they did was that they recognized—and you can actually see this in your own life. If a neighbour's house begins to deteriorate a little bit, it influences the neighbourhood, whether we like to acknowledge that or not. If we were to allow this to continue to grow, I think it does have a synergistic effect on how clean our urban areas are; it's probably not just related to an urban area, but it tends to be where it's most prevalent. So it is, in my opinion, a solid idea.

I am also supportive of the part on the illegal signs. On a personal note, we have a cottage up north, and as I drive up there, I'm a little bit discouraged at the increasing number of signs along the side of the road. The Haliburton area is a gorgeous area that I love to drive through because it's beautiful, but almost weekly, as I drive there, there are more of these signs along the side of the road. And certainly I represent an area in Toronto and I see these signs growing, particularly over the weekends when they know there aren't crews out there to take them down, so you'll see on a Friday night, in the community I live in, these illegal signs put out visually polluting the neighbourhood. As my colleague pointed out, from a fairness to business point of view, it is unfair that someone can put up a sign illegally to advertise when other businesses do the legal thing and advertise through normal commercial channels. From a commercial point of view but certainly from a visual point of view it's wrong.

As we look ahead, as we've often talked about here in the Legislature, our services, our police services, our municipal services, have got fewer and fewer resources. It's just a fact of life. Our police services obviously are dealing with major issues. Our municipal services are also dealing with major issues. This should not be an area to which they have to constantly be allocating resources; this should be an area where we as a society say, let's collectively find a way that we either eliminate or dramatically reduce this as a problem, the two problems mentioned in this bill: the graffiti part and the illegal signs. I think it's unfortunate that scarce municipal resources are required to go out, often on a Monday, and take these signs down, or else they simply stay up. In the area I represent, there is a roofing company that has many signs up. I won't mention their name. It sounds like Alpine, though, I think. It's a blue sign—not a Conservative blue sign, an Alpine sign.

We're here dealing with private members' business, and a member has taken the time to bring forward I think a constructive piece of legislation. Now, there may or may not be some things in here that require some fine-tuning; I simply don't know. I would hope the Legislature would pass it and it could go a committee so that municipalities or police services or those directly affected by it might have an opportunity to comment on it. But that's not to be interpreted as any lack of support; I am wholeheartedly in support of it.

I want to return to where I began. I know a little bit about this issue primarily because of a very good friend of mine. I mentioned that this friend, Brian Keown, was on the police emergency task force, got in a car accident and became a quadriplegic, and the police services hired him back as a full-time regular constable. By the way, he was promoted to detective; he competed against 500 people and he's one of the relatively few who were promoted. I take my hat off to the Toronto Police Service for making sure they were able to accommodate that. We coached hockey together before he had his accident and we kept coaching for 15 or 16 years after that. He had an electric wheelchair and he'd go on the ice and coach. He was one of the really fine coaches in the league I was in. Tragically, by the way, he passed away on February 10 at a young age, of cancer. Actually, the city of Toronto is recognizing him in an award ceremony next Monday at Toronto city hall. It's well deserved.

As I say, I come to this issue with some pretty direct experience in it. The messages I got from my friend Brian Keown, originally Constable Brian Keown and then Sergeant Brian Keown, was that this is not simply a harmless expression of creative talent. In many, many cases it is a way of gangs staking territory. We have a challenge in the province, particularly in the major urban areas: there are gangs. That is a reality that our police services are attempting to deal with. I believe it is not simply a policing matter. I think there are things we can do to assist the police in it, both in terms of resources to try and get at the root causes—and by the way, Chief Fantino has talked often about that, that he needs help from the rest of the community in dealing with some of the root causes that lead to individuals participating in gangs. Having said that, the fact is that there are gangs of individuals that need to be dealt with. You may say, "Well, this is but a small part of it," and it's true; it's but a small part of the gangs, but it is a part that we can deal directly with.

The cost associated with this vandalism is not insignificant. Again, as I understand the experience in New York City, if you don't aggressively deal with this, it just keeps expanding and expanding and expanding and the costs of dealing with it rise. But for New York City they were finding that it was also impacting on tourism, it was impacting on the economic well-being of the city of New York and it was in some different ways affecting gang activities.

So I think this bill, as Mr Kells, the member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore said, is partially a signal to our municipal partners that we understand this is an issue and we will do what we can to support them in dealing with it. But to the public who are watching it and saying, "Is this an issue, really? What are you doing spending time on this?" I say it is an issue. It is an issue of cost for our municipalities to try and deal with the symptoms of this. It's an issue that, if not dealt with, continues to grow. It's a—cancer is too strong a word; it is an activity that kind of feeds on itself if you don't deal with it, and if we simply accept it, you stop seeing its growth, stop seeing that it's getting out of hand. So I agree with dealing with it and dealing with it quite aggressively, which I think this bill does.

As I said before, I would hope and suspect that it might go to a committee, although maybe the member has already checked with those affected, AMO, the Association of Municipalities of Ontario, and our police services, and maybe they're quite comfortable with all the details of it, and so be it. Frankly, I would rather have it passed than go to committee and die, obviously.

As the member from Etobicoke-Lakeshore said, it is primarily dealing with graffiti, and then there's the other aspect of illegal signs, which I too support him on because I see in my own community the growth of it. There's an unfairness to the rest of our, dare I say, honest businesses that are prepared to invest their money in advertising only to find that somebody else is doing it essentially for free right under their nose.

It's a bill worthy of our support. I would hope we will see it passed today, but more importantly, that it will get its way moving quickly into law so we can show our municipal partners we're with them.

Mr Michael Prue (Beaches-East York): First of all, I commend the member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore, Mr Kells, for bringing forward this bill and for an opportunity to debate it today. I do have to tell him that I don't know how the rest of my caucus is going to vote on this, but I personally think it is an idea that is deserving of some support.

As you travel around this country, especially in urban areas, you will see increasing amounts of graffiti and we as governments, at all levels, seem to be powerless to stop it. You will see the graffiti in the form of signs. We've already talked about the roofing companies, but you will see all types of people putting up signs along our roadways, our streets and our parks in literally any place they are visible to passers-by, be they in a car or be they walking. You see those signs that are supposed to make us as consumers want to use the products. The first thing I would say to anyone who finds them offensive is to phone the company, as I did on one occasion, and tell them that if I ever needed my roof repaired they would be the last company on earth to whom I would go. I think that kind of thing that a consumer can do will speak volumes to a company that is attempting to use that kind of visible pollution of our environment.

You also see graffiti in terms of vandalism where people go out simply to vandalize a property by spray-painting it, usually with some ridiculous type of painting or something which I would not want to call public art in any of its forms. It is simply an act of vandalism for which the Criminal Code has just penalties of up to two years less a day.

You see graffiti that many people do not understand, but it is often in the form of hate messages. It has symbols from groups, sometimes ethnically based, sometimes not, sometimes skinheads, offering hate against other people in our society. The police will tell you what some of these are. I was absolutely shocked the first time I was given a whole list and the gangs to which they were related, to the ethnic rivalries they documented. Last but not least you have gang turf symbols, where people put these signs up to indicate to all and sundry that the gang is in control in that particular quarter or that particular neighbourhood of the city.

These are vandalisms to all of us and they need, quite frankly, to be stopped. There has been an overriding failure of the Criminal Code and the justice system and the police to deal with this. I'm not sure that this bill is going to stop any of that, but it certainly is not going to do any harm. For those municipalities that do not have a bylaw on graffiti, this will be at least a minimum for them to aspire to.

I suggest that what we really need in this society that might go beyond this bill are three things. First of all, we need an education forum. We need to get out to, primarily, the young people who are spray-painting; to the companies that are posterizing and putting up signs; and to gangs. We need to get out to everyone to tell them that this is a Criminal Code offence and it will not be tolerated. I'm going to speak a little bit later about the experience in the city of Ottawa. Certainly, education has to be prime, and I do not really see it in this bill. We need to be spending some resources, some monies, either in the schools or directly one-on-one with street people to ensure that they know this will not be tolerated.

The second thing we need to do as a community and as a province is to help fund those who would eradicate the graffiti. We need to fund the municipalities, the townships, the highway departments and the hydro commissions which are forced every day to go out there and remove the graffiti. We need to make sure that there is sufficient funding in our cities, which today are far too often finding it difficult to make ends meet. The tax base is not increasing, and we all know the difficulties that cities are having on a whole broad range of issues, from housing to transit, to maintenance of the parks and sewer and water systems. To add another cost to remove graffiti is simply beyond their abilities. A senior level of government, like the province, should be making funding available if we are serious about removing it throughout the length and breadth of this province, and making some sort of effort to get that funding.

Last but not least, and I think most importantly, we need to empower ordinary citizens. That is not in this bill. I am taken back to a time when I was still a councillor in the borough of East York before I became the mayor. There was a fellow councillor who has since sadly deceased, Jenner Jean-Marie, who represented the Leaside area of East York. He organized the people of the Leaside community to be graffiti busters. He encouraged them and told them how to go out and literally rip the signs off the lampposts. To this day, you will probably find fewer signs on lampposts in the Leaside community than anywhere else in the city. Even though Jenner Jean-Marie is gone, his little army continues. They go out and they tear down the signs whenever they see them on the lampposts. The community will not tolerate them. I invite any of you to go through that community, even today, and you will be surprised, you will hardly ever see a sign on a lamppost.

The community is tolerant of people who are holding a garage sale or lost a cat and put up a few signs, but they expect within their own community that someone will take those down after the garage sale is finished, or after the cat has been found, or after a reasonable period of time. If it is not, they take it down and they will actually take it back to the offender.

What we need to do as a society is to empower people to do this. I am convinced that if we do this in the beginning, and people feel confident to go and take those signs down, there will be far less vandalism and far fewer people willing or wanting to put them up.

Many municipalities already have more stringent bylaws, especially the big ones: Ottawa, Hamilton, Toronto and Windsor. They all have more stringent bylaws. The courts, though, have very much hurt the case of those who would fight against graffiti. Two cases—immediately, of course, is the famous case of the city of Peterborough and Supreme Court of Canada back in 1993, where the city lost its case before the Supreme Court in trying to prosecute someone who was putting up illegal posters contrary to the city bylaw. Of course, the Constitution and free speech was brought into that.

There was a second case that is not quite as well known, Regina v Quickfall, in which they said posterizing in and of itself, putting a poster on a hydro pole, was not an offence under the Criminal Code. I think this has caused considerable angst in all the municipalities.

There have been several suggestions today about New York City, talking about how they cleaned it up. With respect, they didn't clean it up with a bylaw like this. They cleaned it up through aggressive action in removing the graffiti and getting citizens to speak out and stop the graffiti from taking place in the first place. In the case of the United States, both in the city of Seattle and in New York City their bylaws on graffiti have been overturned by the courts. So I want us to be very cautious about thinking that this bylaw may in and of itself do what it's intended to do.

I support the bill because it does no harm. I support the bill because it gives all those municipalities that have not yet passed a bylaw something to cling to. There are some who will not support the bill, I'm sure, because it infringes upon the right of free speech, as set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in the famous Peterborough case.

I'd like to go back to where I started: the need for education. We need to go out to the young people and those who are committing the graffiti and tell them it is not acceptable. We need to inform every member of society it is not acceptable. Secondly, we need to fund cities and municipalities.

The city of Ottawa today spends $400,000 removing graffiti. That may sound like a lot of money and you would think you could do a lot of work with that, but in fact it is a very limited graffiti program. In the city of Ottawa they use some of the money, I understand around $100,000, to go out to people who are called taggers, those who actually put the graffiti on the walls and public buildings of our capital city. They try to educate them and tell them it is not acceptable and get them to cease and desist.

They have also set up areas where graffiti are allowed. They understand it is impossible to obliterate it everywhere. There are building hoardings and places where graffiti are allowed and where the taggers, if they must practise their art, are encouraged to go to a hoarding around a new development or a site where graffiti will be allowed, and it will be taken down and will not cause huge public harm to existing buildings.

They do other things. In the downtown core on Bank Street and Rideau Street they have an eradication policy. They have a paid contractor who goes out every day and looks up and down Bank Street and along Rideau Street, the two main commercial streets in that city, looking for graffiti. They have other paid contractors who do nothing except take those graffiti off the walls. This is very expensive. It's about $300,000 a year to do this in the Ottawa pilot project. One needs to understand that in a city that is, I think, the third-largest or fourth-largest city in Ontario—maybe it's even the second largest. I'm just trying to think about that.

Mr George Smitherman (Toronto Centre-Rosedale): Ottawa is second.

Mr Prue: Bigger than Hamilton?

Mr Smitherman: Yes, almost twice as big.

Mr Prue: All right. It's a large city. Their program at $400,000 does two streets. That's all. Ottawa cannot, with the monies available to it, eradicate graffiti throughout that capital city. That's their experience. They need help, and they need more help than is in this bylaw.

We have the city of Toronto. The city of Toronto has a bylaw that has not yet been enacted because they cannot get community consensus. They are attempting to limit signs and signage to 4,500 poles in the city of Toronto. There are approximately 100,000 hydro poles in this city and they are trying to limit it to 4,500 poles or about 4% of all of them. There is a proposal that there be a $60 fine for every illegal sign that is put on any of the balance of the 95,500 poles where you are not allowed to do it. They are going to put plastic sleeves on the ones where it is allowed.

But there is a huge community uprising against that, which might be surprising to people, because people believe in free speech and the right to put out their signs, whether it's to advertise a babysitting service, to find a lost cat or to do whatever, and the city of Toronto has been singularly unable, with the threat of being taken to court, to act.

We have the example of some cities. My assistant in my office has recently come back from Spain and she told me a remarkable story of how every morning there was a whole graffiti squad in the town she stayed in that goes out and, with high-powered sprays, literally sprays off the graffiti that were painted the night before and takes down the signs. That city is spending an inordinate amount of money, but they are doing it for tourist reasons. Something I think we should remember: tourists don't want to come to a city, don't want to come to Toronto or Ottawa or Hamilton or Niagara Falls or Thunder Bay and see graffiti all over everything. It is not the image we have of ourselves as Ontarians or Canadians.

Last but not least, we need to empower the citizens. We need to tell people it is OK to take the graffiti down. We need to tell them it is their duty to take the graffiti down. We need to tell them it is their duty to report when they see people spray painting or causing damage, and not to look the other way. We need to have ordinary citizens in our community understand that when that violation is done to a piece of property, is done to a street or a road or a roadway, it is a violation to all of us, that it reduces our value as Ontarians, reduces the value of our property, and really diminishes us as a society.

I commend the member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore for bringing this forward. I will be supporting it, but I ask all of us: we need to go the extra mile to eradicate that from Ontario.

The Acting Speaker: I would like to bring members' attention to the members' gallery west. We have a former member, Mr Ed Philip, from Etobicoke-Rexdale, who represented those fine people in this Legislature in the 32nd through 35th Parliaments.

Further debate.

Ms Marilyn Mushinski (Scarborough Centre): I'm particularly delighted today to address this important bill from my esteemed colleague from Etobicoke-Lakeshore, Mr Kells, because I believe it's an issue that affects all of us. It's of considerable importance, not only to my constituents in Scarborough Centre and myself but to all the residents, as we've already heard, in this great province of ours.

One of the underlying principles of a democratic society is the right to ownership and enjoyment of one's private property. Graffiti, illegal advertising and other forms of property defacement undermine this very basic principle of good government. Graffiti are a crime that victimizes not only the property owner, but also the property owner's neighbours. It affects entire communities. It can be used to promote hatred and violence, cause fear and lead to crime and disorder and the general disintegration of community standards within a community.

In my 20 years of service to the people of Scarborough, I have learned the value of civic pride and I have witnessed the demoralizing effects of graffiti and other forms of property defacement. Many years ago the streets of Scarborough were once lined with illegal advertising and unsightly billboards. Car dealer advertisements that had long since lost their appeal competed with run down and tattered billboards across the street. This made for neither a pleasant nor an inspiring drive through the city streets. It provided little, if any, incentive for investment. Property values suffered and economic development slowed. As a result, of course, the people of Scarborough suffered.

In addition, proliferation of graffiti raised public safety concerns in the community.

In order to protect the rights of citizens, the municipality adopted action plans to clean up city streets. In fact, it was the municipality of Scarborough in the late 1970s that introduced a sign code bylaw that has been challenged all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada—and has been upheld, I might add. To uphold this, we introduced stronger property standards enforcement which required timely cleanup of any illegal or unsightly advertising. We believe that the effect contributed to creating safer and cleaner communities, affected economic development in a positive way and brought back a revival of civic pride.

I believe that Scarborough residents are not alone in wanting better and more attractive neighbourhoods for themselves and their children. Concerns over graffiti and defacement of property have been echoed by many communities. An increasing number of jurisdictions, not only in Ontario but also in the rest of Canada as well as in the United States, have taken steps to combat this problem. In Toronto, May 2002 was proclaimed Graffiti Education Month. Communities and the police services worked together in an effort to revitalize urban areas, to make them more attractive to investment and to showcase the best that the city of Toronto has to offer.

But incentive for investment is not necessarily the primary objective of cleaning up our neighbourhoods. The partnerships that form between communities and the police services that seek to reduce crime promote social cohesiveness and reduce fear and disorder. Not only that; they send a clear message. They send the message that hatred and biased propaganda do not belong in our communities. They send the message that gang graffiti does not belong in our communities. They also send the message that cult graffiti does not belong in our communities.

I believe it's time for this House to extend the strong message to the rest of the province that we need to take steps to ensure that each and every resident in this province, regardless of the street or the community or the town or the city they live in, has the opportunity to enjoy their right to property. No citizen should be subjected to the distress and the fear that can result from hate propaganda. No city or community should be subjected to the distress that comes from freely showcased graffiti on building walls, private as well as public property.

We must support this initiative that encourages residents, especially youth, to take pride in their community. Of very special concern to me are the safety and security of my constituents. Community safety is tremendously important, and I'm sure that many members of this House share the same concern. I have repeatedly met with community leaders and members of the police services board to discuss crime and its management. As a result of these meetings, I can tell this House that evidence shows significant costs to graffiti crime. The most obvious of these is the cost of cleanup and the restoration of property and the judicial costs. There are, however, other costs that, although not as obvious, have a more damaging effect on the community and society as a whole, and these are the social costs that include decreased respect for law and order, citizen fear and diminished use of public spaces. In addition, graffiti crime increases the likelihood of supply theft, leading to mischief and carrying the potential of more serious offences.

Eradicating the defacement of property helps to reduce crime. It prevents citizens, and especially our youth, from treading on that very dangerous path that begins with a seemingly harmless prank but leads to serious disregard for the law and the safety of others.

These are serious concerns that plague many communities across our province. If we are to expect our citizens to take pride in their communities, we must address this serious symptom of social disorder. If we want our citizens to be active in crime management initiatives, community surveillance programs and other Crime Stopper initiatives, we must do our part and show our commitment to eradicating the problem of graffiti and property defacement.

Anti-graffiti legislation is not only a means by which we will encourage economic development and invite investment. It is not only a means by which we help our tourism industry to flourish. It is also a significant component of our war against crime. It is one more strategy we can utilize to ensure that Ontario is indeed the best place to live, work and raise a family.

Mr John O'Toole (Durham): It is indeed a pleasure to rise this morning. I do so, I might add at the beginning, in respect to the member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore and the interest he places on traditions and values. He is the member who previously introduced a private member's bill on the two-minute silence for Remembrance Day in respect to those who served their country, and it's in the same tradition that this bill pays respect in our communities and the ridings in which we live. This bill goes a long way in making a statement about making our communities, as the previous speaker said, better places to live and enhancing the quality of life and sense of safety.

In preparation for speaking on the member's bill, I got a copy of the bill. For those watching, I think it's important to recognize that it describes graffiti as including "any design, drawing or writing scratched, scribbled or applied by any means to or on any surface."

In fact graffiti, previous speakers might have mentioned, was a form of self-expression or a form of art or a modern-day kind of community—I don't know—territorialism in some respects. It may, in the gang sense, be demarcating their territory, and it certainly is in my view something that needs to have clear direction from the province.

I commend the member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore, because I did survey the three principal communities in my riding of Durham. For those viewing, my riding of Durham includes the north part of Oshawa where there are lots of commercial plazas and other areas where this certainly can be a problem. It also includes Port Perry, which is a wonderful community on the shores of Lake Scugog. In Palmer Park in the downtown area, they have had from time to time small problems with this situation on sidewalks, walls and other meeting spots, if you will, and also in the municipality of Clarington, which of course is a municipal area which includes a lot of communities, Bowmanville being the largest one, Newcastle and Orono, a smaller, rural-setting community where graffiti wouldn't be to a large extent, yet there are youth issues there that are being addressed on a continual basis. But it includes smaller communities like Hampton and more growing areas like Courtice. Young people to some extent get frustrated and they do tend to congregate because they may be bored or just want to hang out together.

When it comes to a general sense, in my research in Oshawa there is a municipal bylaw, which I'll mention to some extent later, but in Clarington there is no such bylaw—I think there's just a "good fences make good neighbours" approach to it—and in Port Perry there's no existing bylaw. This gives them a framework by which they have a tool to use as an enforcement mechanism to make our communities more beautiful, more pleasant and the sense of feeling safer, I suppose.

But to that extent there is a bylaw in the city of Oshawa, a very large city in the riding. I do share that with the member from Oshawa, the Honourable Jerry Ouellette. Their bylaw is bylaw 01-2002, so it's very recent. It's section 5.3.2. I'll read it. "Exterior walls of a building (and their components) shall be free of painted slogans, graffiti and similar defacements."

I was listening to the NDP member earlier. He talked about the very famous Peterborough case, where the courts determined that it was a freedom-of-expression issue. Well, I think freedoms have boundaries. I think with freedoms go responsibilities, or with rights go responsibilities. I think in many cases this activity is unacceptable and to some extent it could be slanderous, it could also be discriminatory, it could have messaging that is in conflict with what in our common community view is acceptable behaviour. But it runs very closely into the whole issue of vandalism. I think of most of it as being vandalism.

I guess there can and should be room for it being a forum for artistic expression. Well, do it on your own fence or do it on your own house. But I think it's important to recognize that it isn't acceptable in most cases.

But I will say that the municipality of Clarington has the Clarington youth group, which congregates at the Firehouse Youth Centre. It's administered by the John Howard Society. There are approximately 200 members.

They're supervised by adults and provided a bunch of activities under very capable leadership. It gives young people a place to collect. They work with the Durham Regional Police and community policing officers.

But I think a very important program, in the final moments I have here, is the Clarington youth group advisory committee, which received $6,000 recently from our provincial Solicitor General for the purpose of promoting youth development in the area. They intend to purchase anti-graffiti paint with the money. The idea is that the graffiti can be washed off, cleaning the surface with hot water and pressure. It is the intent of the Clarington youth advisory committee to use the paint purchased to create murals in some locations in Clarington where graffiti and vandalism are a problem. In fact, most of the design and work would be painted by those very members of the local youth group.

So there's a case where they are making a positive statement. I believe that this bill will be one more signal that this province promotes beautification in our communities for a great place to live, work and raise our families.

The Acting Speaker: Response?

Mr Kells: In the two minutes I have left, I'd like to summarize by saying I believe that my bill merits your support. There is no more decisive illustration of support than a strong section in the new Municipal Act, 2001, under the heading "Closing premises, public nuisance." This legislation passed during the spring sitting, and it allows the court to take action to prevent abuses of property. Under the "public nuisance" heading, the presence of graffiti is included as a reason for the court to take action to protect property rights. So this government has taken action and added graffiti right into the new Municipal Act.

Since I represented the minister at the committee meetings on this new bill, I know that our municipalities were pleased to learn of these extended powers to the Municipal Act. Yet it is possible to help these wayward artists if some effective communication can be established. I think the honourable member from the NDP spoke to that.

Now may I paraphrase a statement made in the House by Brenda Elliott, MPP for Guelph-Wellington, back in November of 1999. She said, "In the spring of 1996, Guelph police noticed a disturbing increase in the amount of graffiti in the city of Guelph. An officer took it upon himself to find a strategy to combat this problem.

"He first solicited the help of a known local graffiti artist" and then worked rather quickly to track the perpetrators down. He got them to put their graffiti on legitimate areas. It all worked out rather well.

This Legislature, in supporting my bill, will have sent a clear signal to perpetrators that we no longer tolerate these abuses of public and private property. The same thing goes with our ability to help municipal councils enforce their bylaws in our new legislation.

The Acting Speaker: This completes the time allotted for debate on this ballot item. I will place the question to decide this matter at 12 o'clock noon.

MOTORCYCLE AWARENESS WEEK ACT, 2002

LOI DE 2002 SUR LA SEMAINE
DE SENSIBILISATION
À LA MOTOCYCLETTE

Mr Stewart moved second reading of the following bill:

Bill 201, An Act to proclaim Motorcycle Awareness Week / Projet de loi 201, Loi proclamant la Semaine de sensibilisation à la motocyclette.

The Acting Speaker (Mr Michael A. Brown): The member for Peterborough has 10 minutes for his presentation.

Mr R. Gary Stewart (Peterborough): I am pleased to have the opportunity to introduce An Act to proclaim Motorcycle Awareness Week. If this bill passes, it will declare the first Monday in May of each year as Motorcycle Awareness Week in Ontario. The bottom line of this bill is about safety, education and awareness. It relates to the motorcyclist but, equally as important, it addresses the motorist as well.

There are 102,000 officially licensed motorcycles registered in Ontario for road use. As well, there are untold numbers of motorcycles for off-road use, totalling 570,000 motorcycles. And 9,121 more riders were licensed in 2000 than in 1999—a 7% increase, and it's continuing to increase daily. They are 7% of the driving force in Ontario.

Motorcycles have been used for transportation and recreation in Canada and indeed around the world for years. In fact, they have been an important transportation vehicle in both war time as well as in peace time.

In May, there is an annual renewal of motorcycle enthusiasm. Over the last 20 years, organizations across Ontario have promoted and participated in motorcycle awareness campaigns. Some cities and towns in this province have proclaimed May as Motorcycle Awareness Month or Motorcycle Awareness Week, depending what the municipality chose.

Motorcycles are not a toy. They are a high-speed, powerful mode of transportation and must be ridden safely and responsibly. These days, with the high cost of fuel, motorcycles are seen as an economical form of transportation and are becoming more and more popular every day. Moms and dads, grandfathers and grandmothers, sons and daughters are turning motorcycling into a family sport. We want it to be a safe family form of fun. Less than 2% of all riders are involved in motorcycle gangs. They are becoming a nonentity in motorcycling.

If we are to promote safety both for motorcyclists and motorists, we have to develop and promote skills and awareness of proper habits on how to handle motorcycles and also good road habits, which should be apparent but sometimes are not, especially with we motorists.

In my riding of Peterborough, Sir Sanford Fleming College offers a motorcycle awareness and skills course. It focuses on safety, basic motorcycle tips, riding habits, how a motorcycle works, basic skills and how to practise them, what hazards they must be looking for while they're riding, emergency braking and collision avoidance. The course is more comprehensive than most automobile driving courses. This course is endorsed by all levels of government and the insurance advisory organization. This course has gained recognition as the finest rider training program anywhere in the world.

The motorcyclist indeed is very vulnerable when on the highway. All of the motoring public must recognize the importance of sharing the roadway. Safe driving habits and an overall awareness for all those who travel Ontario highways are essential. We all have a right to use our roadways. As we drive our cars and trucks down Ontario highways, we always seem to be aware of those trucks, transports and other vehicles that can be seen very easily in our rear-view mirrors, but motorcycles can be missed. They could be in the blind spot of our vehicle, or we could just fail to realize or remember that they also have a right to be on our highways. Motorcycles are a relatively small component of the total traffic mix, therefore their visual recognition is reduced. Many drivers do not anticipate routine encounters with motorcycles in traffic. Again, motorcycles are smaller visual targets and are more likely to be obscured.

Let me comment on a couple of safety tips that are very important to motorcyclists. I believe they are also very important to motorists.

Be very cautious during the first rain after a dry spell. All the oil that has accumulated on a road comes up in the first half-hour and is very slippery. Sound familiar? Yes, indeed it does.

Motorcyclists, when passing parked cars, stay to the left side of your lane. It's somewhat similar to what we should be doing when we're driving our cars or trucks.

Look ahead. Plan ahead. Look as far down the road as you can. Pay close attention to colours and shapes on the road surface, for example trash, puddles, new asphalt, bumps, cracks, holes and fluid spills. Again, I believe looking ahead and planning has as much to do with when you're driving a car or truck as it does when you're riding or driving a motorcycle.

These suggestions should be practised every time we hit the road if we are to be responsible drivers. All of us know we should slow down before entering blind turns and be watchful at intersections and when passing driveways and alleys.

Members of this Legislature, these are all awareness and safety issues that we all should practise on a day-to-day basis.

This bill is about respect: respect for each other, the motorcyclists and all the motoring public who practise responsible driving. Long gone is the stigma associated with motorcyclists, and so it should be. Today lawyers, doctors, teachers, businessmen and businesswomen, people from all walks of life ride bikes. They pay big prices for their equipment and contribute to the economy of this great province.

This summer I had the opportunity of opening the official HOG rally at Trent University in Peterborough. There were over 2,500 bike riders there. A tremendous amount of dollars was represented in the vehicles I observed in front of us when we opened it, and the people who were there were so enthusiastic. The Golden Helmets from the OPP were there showing their form but also passing on safety tips to many of the riders. By the way, "HOG" stands for Harley Owners Group, a wonderful group to be associated with and be part of.

In my riding last year, we had too many deaths, too many accidents, too many riders left with physical and mental disabilities due to motorcycle accidents. In 2000, there were over 437 motor vehicle fatalities; 37 of those were motorcycles drivers.

By declaring Motorcycle Awareness Week, maybe, just maybe, we can save some lives and some limbs. I encourage all members to support this bill. It is imperative for citizens of Ontario to be aware of motorcycles on our highways. This is a very non-political issue. I would hope the members of this House will support this bill. Just maybe we can save a few lives.

Mr Steve Peters (Elgin-Middlesex-London): I'm pleased to stand up and offer my unequivocal support for this bill in front of us. The honourable member had put it forward earlier, but because of his position within the government caucus it couldn't be dealt with. Now he's had the opportunity to bring this bill forward, and I think it is important. As he pointed out, safety education and awareness is definitely a two-way street. We need to do everything we can to help support this bill.

The history of the motorcycle is very interesting. The motorcycle is a direct descendant of the bicycle. The first bicycle, as we know it, appeared around 1800, and the motorcycle is an evolution of the bicycle. Gottlieb Daimler is credited with building the first motorcycle in 1885, with one wheel in the front and one wheel in the back, although it had smaller wheels, almost like training wheels, on each side. This motorcycle was constructed mostly of wood, with the wheels being iron-banded, wooden-spoked, wagon-type wheels. It was known as having the bone-crusher chassis. It was powered by a single-cylinder auto cycle engine. There were also some earlier experiments in the United States in trying to develop a motorcycle, but it was steam-powered. In 1867 a gentlemen by the name of Sylvester Roper developed a charcoal-fired, two-cylinder engine attached to a bicycle. The earliest designs started out with three- or four-wheel vehicles, but eventually settled on the two-wheel variety.

The first successful production of a two-wheeled motorcycle began in Munich, Germany, in 1894. By 1895 there was a French company building an engine that led to the mass production of motorcycles. The first North American production of a gas-fired engine was by the Metz Co in Massachusetts in 1898. Later on we saw the Indian Motorcycle Co formed, and then the company that the honourable member made reference to earlier on, Harley-Davidson.

In 1903, 21-year-old William Harley and 20-year-old Arthur Davidson made available to the public their first production of a Harley-Davidson motorcycle. The factory was a 10-foot by 15-foot wooden shed, with the words "Harley-Davidson" inscribed on the door. The first dealer opened in 1903 as well. He sold one of the first three mass-produced Harley-Davidson vehicles that year. The Harley-Davidson vehicle is quite common on the roads; we see it in particular with police services across this province. In 1908 the first police motorcycle was sold to the Detroit police department.

Harley-Davidson has certainly been actively involved in trying to improve the motorcycle over the years, along with other companies. Just following through on a bit of chronology of the motorcycle, the first front-wheel brakes appeared on a motorcycle in 1928. In 1939 we saw the first flashing turn signals appear on a motorcycle. In 1940 the first sealed-beam headlights appeared on motorcycles. We started to see some evolution in the industry, and in 1949 Honda manufactured its first motorcycle. In 1952 the first hydraulic brakes appeared on motorcycles. In 1953—and this is in recognition of some of the safety issues, and many of the points I've made dealt with safety on motorcycles—the first patent for a protective helmet with an energy-absorbing liner was issued. Staying with the helmets, in 1957 the Snell Memorial Foundation was established to help create and improve the standards of motorcycle helmets.

Rear suspension was introduced on motorcycles in 1958. In 1959 the Japanese invasion into motorcycles began, with Yamaha first entering the market in that year. In 1967 Bell Helmets introduced the full facial cover. In 1980 there was the first motorcycle international safety conference. That's what we're dealing with with this bill here: safety.

We know that the motorbike or motorcycle has been on the road for well over 100 years, but we need to do more to understand and recognize, as was pointed out earlier, the two-way street that exists: not only do we need to ensure that the operators of motorcycles are fully trained but we need to ensure that drivers of other vehicles on the road, be they cars, trucks, or large transport trucks, understand the motorcycle as well. We need to understand and we need to ensure that when safety manuals are being developed for individuals, for young people going for their driver's licence, there is an inclusion of awareness of motorcycles.

I want to commend the Bikers Rights Organization of Ontario, otherwise known as BRO. The Bikers Rights Organization has worked hard over the years to try and raise the issues of safety education and awareness. Every year, in May, they hold a Motorcycle Awareness Week. I've been privileged, at least since 1992, to have been in St Thomas welcoming motorcycle riders from all over southwestern Ontario as they held their annual awareness rally. They use that rally as an opportunity to not only educate themselves but educate the general public, giving them a better understanding of the motorcycles on the road. I want to commend them as well.

There's an individual in my riding, whose name is Steve Northey. Steve has worked very hard at trying to ensure that issues dealing with motorcycle safety and awareness have been brought to the forefront. But they've been involved in other areas as well. Every fall, they have their annual toy run, and this is always the prelude or the kick-off to the Christmas season. Every year, hundreds and hundreds of motorcyclists will converge on St Thomas. They begin their ride in London, and they each come packing a toy that becomes part of the local Christmas Care campaign that is operated through the Salvation Army. I commend them for that and their toy run.

The honourable member talked about motorcycles and of the sheer beauty and value of the motorcycles. One only needs to go look at the care and time that individuals have taken to customize some of their bikes and to create truly showcase vehicles. They are, in many cases, works of art, and they are also extremely valuable. They take pride in their vehicles.

It was interesting as well when the member talked about attending the Harley Owners Group, the HOG, group rally in Ottawa. There's something so distinctive about the Harley-Davidson motorcycle, the sound of that bike. My neighbour Murray has a Harley-Davidson and when he pulls home on the weekend and he fires that bike up, you know it's him. The sound travels around the community, and you can hear a Harley travelling down the street, and some of the sounds are distinctive. I can pick Murray's bike out as he's coming home.

I look at another friend of mine, Joe Olsen. Joe lives outside of Detroit, and Joe has been riding motorcycles since the 1940s and he takes great pride in his motorcycles. He has at least three in his own collection and he has done everything he possibly can to ensure that the heritage of early motorcycles has not been lost. Much like an individual takes pride in his car, Joe has taken pride in his motorcycle. Joe—I give him credit—this past summer, drove all the way from Detroit to Winnipeg on his motorcycle. That's quite a ride, and I commend him for that.

I really say thank you to the honourable member for bringing this bill forward, because we need, as legislators, to do everything that we can to increase awareness of motorbikes on the roads and do everything that we can to educate the public, because any death, one death, is one death too many. If this bill can work toward improving awareness and we can save one more life, then this bill has proved its worth. So I commend the member and I assure the member that he will have the full support of our caucus with this legislation.

Mr Tony Martin (Sault Ste Marie): I want to confess right off the top that I don't ride a motorcycle, nor do I own one. So I don't have a conflict of interest here as I speak to this bill, whether to promote it or not.

I know there are folks out there who just love to ride motorcycles. We hope they do it safely and understand the correctness of making sure that they have their helmets on, that they're dressed appropriately and that they take all the precautions necessary, without our having to focus on a Motorcycle Awareness Week. Although this particular proposal may have some merit, I'm here this morning to listen to the comments of others, such as the members who have spoken already and, I'm sure, the many others who will speak later this morning.

Motorcycling is one of those two-edged swords. As the member who introduced this motion this morning indicates in some of the material he has put out, motorcycles are not toys. They're very powerful machines. If they're not used properly, they can be very dangerous, and because of the lack of consideration, understanding and attention by other large vehicles on the highway, they can often be in jeopardy even though they themselves take all the safety precautions that are necessary.

I want to put a few thoughts on the record this morning by way of challenge to the member. He can respond to them in his closing remarks or perhaps others who are supportive of recognizing the first week in May as Motorcycle Awareness Week can respond, so that I might understand more fully how these issues are going to be considered in this. Then I can make up my mind whether I want to support it or not this morning.

One side is the fear that we may take this very powerful machine, this activity that can be very dangerous if one doesn't pay attention, and take all the safety precautions, understanding as well that other vehicles out there aren't always as conscious and aware of motorcycles on the road as they should be, and that by focusing on motorcycling and setting a week aside for awareness, although I recognize the member is talking primarily of awareness from a safety perspective, we may also go a distance to romanticizing in some way this activity of riding motorcycles.

For example, I'm thinking of my own kids here, so I may actually have a conflict of interest, in that one of my boys I know has talked about having a motorcycle and riding a motorcycle. I'll tell you, it scares me big time to think of him out there on the road on a motorcycle. I'd prefer he buy a car. I think a car is safer and that his chances, if he gets into an accident, are much greater of coming out with less damage to himself or others if he drives a car.

In setting aside a week, because there will be all kinds of celebration and focus, public relations and communication, particularly by the motorcycle industry itself promoting motorcycling, ultimately that will appeal to a younger set out there who may not yet have developed a full understanding of the challenges and difficulties and the fact, as I've said already, that this is a very dangerous machine they ride, not a toy.

I put that on the record, that I have a fear we may romanticize a way of transportation that isn't as safe as some of the alternatives that are out there that people could choose to participate in. I put that out for people's consideration. Will it do that? Will the obvious benefit of an awareness week that will focus on safety compensate for the image that may be developed about motorcycling that may encourage young people in particular to participate in this activity without thinking about the consequences, no matter how attentive they might be to the safety side of their actual riding the machine, not understanding that even with that it can be very dangerous behaviour and activity to be involved in.

The other side of this that I think needs to be put on the record is the growing concern out there in communities about the unsavoury side of motorcycling, about people such as the Hells Angels and some of these other groups that ride motorcycles that have become a very real threat to communities and a very real concern to the police. How do you draw the line between the two? How do you separate those very well meaning and good citizens in all our communities who ride motorcycles for pleasure, for transportation or for recreation and who do it in as safe a fashion as possible, who use the motorcycle and the group they belong to to raise money for charity and do all those kinds of things that we know can be and are done by people who ride motorcycles, from the unsavoury side of motorcycling that so often is depicted in the movies that we and young people watch, and about which we become more and more anxious and concerned in this province as we see the incursion of these motorcycle gangs into the framework, the network and the fabric of Ontario?

I'm concerned about our ability, in setting aside a week to focus on motorcycling, to actually keep the two separate and deal with them in a way that helps people understand there is this very difficult, dangerous and unsavoury side of motorcycle activity that exists out there that is a real threat to society, to some of the things we count on to support the bringing up of our children and the behaviour of people in communities.

Those are two issues I want to present here this morning as needing, in my mind, to be thought about as we consider this piece of legislation before us. Are we setting ourselves up for something that is bigger and more unmanageable in the end by doing this, or as the member who has presented it suggests, will we simply be focusing on the positive side of motorcycling and emphasizing the issue of safety where that activity is concerned? I think they're very real. I think they're things we need to think about very carefully and I think they're things all of us need to consider as we choose which way to vote on this piece of private members' public business here this morning.

Mr Marcel Beaubien (Lambton-Kent-Middlesex): It's a pleasure for me to rise today in support of my colleague from Peterborough's introduction of the bill that deals with motorcycle safety and awareness. I, too, like the member from Sault Ste Marie, do not have a conflict, I guess, because I do not own and I am not licensed to drive a motorcycle, although I must admit, as the member from Elgin-Middlesex-London pointed out, there are some very fancy and interesting pieces of equipment on the market.

Motorcycles certainly play an important role in many people's lives, not only from a recreational point of view but from a transportation point of view, and the safety aspect of it should be first and foremost whenever we're debating this bill.

As my colleague from Peterborough pointed out, we have 95,000 licensed units and probably five times more that are off-road units. I would like to say, being a member from a rural community, that we have to stress the safety aspect for these off-road units also. They may not be licensed but it's important and imperative that we stress that the people who use them be well trained in using them, and stress the safety aspect of them, because today off-road vehicles, whether they're four-wheelers—there are not too many three-wheelers left—are used for hunting. They're used in the bush. Farmers are using four-wheelers today, for planting, for fertilizing and for spraying, so there is a multitude of uses with regard to motorcycles and certainly off-road units.

The member from Sault Ste Marie talked about the danger involved with motorcycles and he's absolutely right. There's no doubt that there's a higher risk if you're driving a motorcycle rather than driving a car. That's very well exemplified under the auto policy, under the accident benefits, whereby if you're driving a motorcycle, they're substantially higher than if you're driving an automobile. But I found something interesting yesterday. It was in the standing committee on public accounts, and they're looking at the road user safety program. It's part of the 2001 annual report of the Provincial Auditor. The Minister of Transportation is over here talking about some of the issues I would like to put on the record: one is setting safety standards, policies and regulations for road users, vehicles and commercial carriers; two is inspecting, monitoring and enforcing compliance with safety standards; three is testing and licensing drivers and vehicles; and four, educating drivers in safe driving behaviour, and government policies and legislation for road user safety.

That's all well to say this, and I know it's a little more difficult to enforce it. However, I think as a government, as individuals, that under the present guidelines, when the motorcyclists go for testing, they're made well aware of the dangers of automobiles. But on the converse of that, I don't think that, when young people are taking their drivers' tests in driving an automobile, there is as much emphasis placed on the respect that they should have for motorcyclists.

We see that when people are in a hurry at a red light. The motorcyclist is the lane. A car will crowd that motorcyclist. As soon as the light turns green, away they go. They will not share, in some instances, the lane with a motorcycle. Consequently, I think we have to continue stressing the importance of safety and we do this through an education program, through driver education. I see these young students from school today, and they may be too young for testing and learning to drive, but I think we also do it through our educational program, that we start with road safety at an early age. It's never too early to start.

I know my time is very short. I will be voting in favour of this bill because, as the member from Peterborough and the member from Elgin-Middlesex mentioned, if we save one life, if we prevent one injury, this bill is well worth it.

Mr Rick Bartolucci (Sudbury): I stand and support the member for introducing the bill, Bill 201, An Act to proclaim Motorcycle Awareness Week. There are some problems with this. The member from London-Fanshawe, Mr Mazzilli, who does nothing but constantly heckle in this House, should be reminded that the Motorcycle Awareness Week Act that the member from Peterborough wants to proclaim has an upside to it. There are certainly lots of recreational bikers out there who congregate at a particular doughnut shop in the west end, probably every Saturday night. Every once in a while when I'm around, going in for a coffee, I stop and talk to them. They're wonderful people. They're upstanding citizens. They deserve to be recognized for the valuable contributions they make to society and also for their passion when it comes to motorcycles and when it comes to safety with motorcycles. For that reason alone I'm going to support Bill 201.

There is a bill I have before the House. It's a private member's bill, Bill 136, an amendment of the Highway Traffic Act with regard to motorcycle helmets. The information for this bill came from the police officers of the province of Ontario, who are very concerned that the other element of motorcyclists, those gangs we have to deal with, in many instances the illegal gangs we have to deal with, are not using prescribed, approved safety helmets. They cause the police forces in the province of Ontario a great deal of anxiety, lots of time—

Interjection.

Mr Bartolucci: Again, the member from London-Fanshawe continues to babble in his usual way. We must remember and the people of Ontario should know that while he heckles Bill 136, he is a former police officer. I would suggest that he listen as opposed to babbling.

Mr Frank Mazzilli (London-Fanshawe): On a point of order: The components are right in the regulation. Certainly the member should know—

The Acting Speaker: I'm not hearing a point of order. Sit down.

Member for Sudbury.

Mr Bartolucci: Thank you very much, Speaker. I appreciate your ruling on his being out of order.

The reality with Bill 136 is that motorcyclists would be forced to surrender their helmet for inspection. In fact, the subsection says, "Every rider on or operator of a motorcycle, motor assisted bicycle ... shall, upon the demand of a police officer, surrender his or her helmet for reasonable inspection."

I don't think that's very intrusive. In fact, I think it would provide safety on the roads for people who drive motorcycles. So I would encourage the member from Peterborough to encourage his government to call Bill 136 for second reading and for quick passage, because it will enhance Bill 201.

The reality is that the member from Peterborough has every good intention in introducing this bill. It should be supported, because the people he's talking about in this bill are responsible people. They are people who appreciate the value of motorcycles, the excitement one has with motorcycles and the importance of being safe with regard to driving and handling a motorcycle. So there's no question that this bill is well-intentioned.

There is the other component of cycling we have to be concerned about, and that's ensuring that the laws are followed, that police officers aren't placed in undue hard situations where they have to give up their valuable time to appear in court to deal with bikers who choose to wear illegal helmets.

Bill 201 is a bill worth supporting. Bill 136, my private member's bill, which is the Highway Traffic Amendment Act—helping police officers do their job—is also a bill worth supporting.

Speaker, I thank you for your attention and the member for London-Fanshawe for his usual babbling.

Mr Michael Prue (Beaches-East York): I must say that I have not been, as you all know, in this House a long time, some 14 months now.

Mr George Smitherman (Toronto Centre-Rosedale): It seems longer.

Mr Prue: Yes, it seems longer some days. I've seen a great many bills come through, but I have to tell you that I am quite surprised at this; I'm quite surprised at what we're debating here this morning. There are many, many weighty issues in this province—everything from hydro deregulation to education to the lack of affordable housing. There are just enormous amounts of problems, enormous amounts of potential things that could be spoken of. I was quite puzzled, I have to admit, when I saw a bill proposing Motorcycle Awareness Week. I stopped for a minute to wonder what value this bill will have if it passes and what will be the significance if it does not.

I listened to the member earlier when he introduced his bill and when he spoke about it, and there were three key words that he talked about: safety, education and awareness. I'm wondering what in the bill will deal with these aspects in such a way that would promote me to support it and would promote the general public to think that having another awareness week, another in the hundreds of awareness weeks, awareness days, awareness months in this province is going to be worth the actual length of time that we've spent here debating.

Motorcycles are not a safe form of transportation. I do not believe that they are safe, nor have I ever felt as safe on a motorcycle as I do inside of a car. I don't know of any person who feels as safe on a motorcycle. In fact it's a little bit of a thrill-ride. So if we're talking about the person riding the motorcycle: is this bill going to make them want to drive it in a more responsible manner? Is it going to make them want to not zip in and out of traffic as I see every day on the streets of Toronto? Is it going to make them travel at the speed limit? When I travel on the 401 I will tell you that the motorcycles all pass me; every single motorcycle passes me and passes me flying and weaving in and out of traffic. Is it going to make these individuals more safe when they're driving?

I would doubt that having an awareness week is going to succeed in that. Is it going to educate these people who drive motorcycles? Is it going to educate them to be safer? I don't know. Is it going to educate? I doubt it because, again, this is a vehicle for those who like adventure. This is a vehicle for those who push the limits.

Is it going to educate the ordinary driver to look in the blind spots a little bit more carefully? Perhaps. It's very difficult to see people, to see smaller objects in mirrors.

Is it going to make us more aware? I don't know. I have to tell you, I don't know what the statistics are in this city, in this province and even the summer time. I would hazard a guess that there's probably 100 cars to every motorcyclist. Certainly in this city there are far more bicyclists than there are motorcyclists and we have to be constantly on the lookout for them.

I ask why the member would use his private member's bill for this, because this is not the first time. I am given to understand he attempted to do the same private member's bill a little over a year ago just prior to my arrival here, and it was not successful at that time.

So I tried to think, what would the member for Peterborough want to do? I looked at it again. His own riding is the wonderful riding of Peterborough. I often have a chance to go to that city. My parents live just north of Peterborough. I often go to Peterborough. It's a wonderful place, but it too has its problems. It has its problems with the lack of affordable housing. It has its problems with the declining industrial base. It has its good points too. I was wondering how this sort of fit into that and I really couldn't figure it out.

I thought that maybe in the crassness of politics people are making big donations from the motorcycle industry. We did a little research on that. It was actually kind of small. BMW gave $708 to the Conservative Party in Vaughan, and Honda Canada gave $404 in Whitby. That seems like such a small amount. I cannot possibly imagine that that would have influenced this bill.

Then I thought, what about the support groups? What support groups are out there looking for this? We looked down to the support groups and there's a whole bunch of them: the Blue Knights, the BMW Club, the Canadian Motorcycle Association, the Ontario Road Riders Association, the Red Knights, and a group, the Bikers Rights Organization of Ontario—this one did trouble me a little. The Bikers Rights Organization of Ontario exists, and their primary goal is the freedom of choice on helmets. I'm wondering what that purpose is going to be.

We have a whole problem in Ontario and in Canada and in the municipalities of problems with biker gangs. We have a whole problem where bikes are not safe on the roads. We have a whole problem that will not be addressed by this bill.

I am still puzzled. I think people who are watching are still puzzled as to why the member from Peterborough has used valuable legislative time to debate a bill that will virtually do nothing. I think that this, with all respect to him, has been a waste of this legislative time here today. The bill is not going to resolve the key issues. It's not going to do anything for motorcyclists. It's not going to do anything for other drivers and we still will have the ongoing problems that other speakers have talked about: bike gangs and irresponsible driving. Quite frankly, I cannot support this bill.

Mr John O'Toole (Durham): I feel bad about this, but I have to do it. I want to put on the record that the member from Sudbury earlier—and I should be clear that I'm embarrassed. His constituents should be embarrassed as well because he should know that he was aggrandizing his own vision of the world while not paying much respect for the hard work the member from Peterborough has done on Bill 201. It's just part of a long list of the work the member has done to represent his constituents in the riding of Peterborough. I think back to how this fits into his overall legislative direction or the voyage he's on. First, his bill on the spirituality in schools speaks to the traditions and values he has. I think there was also truck driver training. So he's very fascinated by the motor vehicle industry.

So Bill 201, An Act to proclaim Motorcycle Awareness Week—it should be clear right from the beginning of the comments I will make that this really does talk all about driver safety, driver education and driver awareness. It's a very high-level discussion. The motorcycle awareness event is just to crystallize all the energies and activities around motorcycling in May—that's the week he's proclaiming—just as bikes are going on the road, so that driver education and driver awareness should be paramount and safety is at the centre of the whole debate.

If I want to make a little bit of lightheartedness on this, unlike the NDP comments just recently, I want to put on that this bill, as I said, is about safety, but it really is about the baby boomers to some extent, the emerging group of the well-off middle class, much like the member from Peterborough really, a middle-aged—I can just see it now, sort of like Peter Fonda in Easy Rider with Judy on the back, that sense of freedom, sense of power, the throttle between the legs, zooming down the highway. It does overglorify the point he's really trying to make, but I'm just trying to relate it to the personality with the white hair blowing in the wind. I don't know. It's an evocative kind of image I have here.

In my riding I have to pay respect to the importance that this isn't purely economic terms. The dealers I'm familiar with would be: Steve Hicks from Terminal Velocity, a Ducati motorcycle dealership in Port Perry; Floyd Asselstine from Asselstine Country, where they actually market the Yamaha and Suzuki in the Blackstock area; and Ab's Motorcycle Shop in Oshawa, a very widely known motorcycle shop. There are other motorcycle things that are widely known which I don't support, but they're more in Durham as well.

The member mentioned HOG ownership. These are the Harley Owners Group. The HOG group, chapter 9237 members include Linda Doucet, who's the editor; Colin Baxter, public relations; David Joseph, public relations; and Rob Harvey, the second road captain.

On June 2, the Durham HOG group—that's the Harley owners—hosted the annual Battens Run; 164 registered bikes participated in the fundraiser, raising $20,000 for Batten disease research, which is an inherited neurological degenerative disorder.

There was also the Cappy Ride. This is another group—probably a lot of Honda and other owners' groups. Motorcyclists get sponsorships and ride for child abuse awareness and prevention. The 10th annual Cappy Ride was held July 27. All the proceeds were donated to the Durham Children's Aid Society. Bob Brozina was the local organizer. Corporate sponsors this year included the Building Box, Caldwell Securities, Nature's Scene, Toronto Raptors, Bell Mobility, Concept Marketing & Promotions, and James Family Foods.

At the end of this, if we can talk about this issue and endorse this bill and keep it to a higher level—and the member from Sudbury really did work the conversation down right to the bottom, much like cars that feed on the bottom. But we need to make sure we put in front of the people of Ontario that this bill is about driver safety, education and awareness. I contend that it's the right thing to do. If those on the other side don't support it, it's clear they're against driver safety, education and awareness.

Unlike the bill that was discussed, Bill 136—it's my understanding the member from London-Fanshawe has checked—is redundant. In the Highway Traffic Act today, it already exists that the validation of helmets is regulated under the Highway Traffic Act.

Interjection.

Mr O'Toole: Once again, the member from Sudbury goes on interrupting, being rude and intrusive, and spoiling the camaraderie that happens in private members'—

The Acting Speaker: The member for Sudbury will come to order. I apologize to the member for Durham.

Mr O'Toole: The member for Sudbury is out of order again. I'm not trying to pick the quarrel here because there are students here. I'm sure as a former teacher, he's probably embarrassed now, as he should be.

I'm supporting this bill, and I'm not trying to engage anyone, other than in the debate itself, to do the right thing and support Mr Stewart. I really kind of connect with the vision of him and Judy riding their motorcycle—probably a Honda Gold Wing—enjoying life and the freedom while, at the same time, being a safe driver of a motorcycle.

Mr Norm Miller (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I'm very pleased to join the debate today on Bill 201, the private member's bill put forward by the member for Peterborough, the Motorcycle Awareness Week Act, 2002. This would bring about an awareness week in the first week in May of each year. Certainly that is prime time for motorcycling, as people who are keen motorcyclists have seen their motorcycle in the garage the whole winter and they're pretty keen once May rolls around to get out and get driving that motorcycle.

The member for Sault Ste Marie was talking about the fact that he thought it was dangerous. It is dangerous to ride a motorcycle. I agree with him; it is dangerous. That's why this legislation is important. The motorcycle drivers need to be aware of the skills they need to drive a motorcycle, and also automobile, truck and bus drivers need to be aware of motorcycles on the road. That's probably just as important as the motorcyclists having the skills themselves.

I speak a bit from experience as, when I was 16, my first vehicle was a Honda 100. I certainly learned the hard way and survived my three or so years of driving that, with a few close calls, I might add. I learned that you don't hit the front brake on loose gravel because the bike goes down pretty quickly when you do that. I had the experience on a small two-lane highway of being run off the road by a car that didn't see me going down the road on my little Honda 100. In recent years, I guess I'm part of the trend, having not motorcycled for 20 years. This past year I purchased a new motorcycle and quite enjoyed the recreation, as many people do now, of getting out, when I had a bit of time, with some constituents and cruise the beautiful roads of Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Motorcycling is dangerous, so we need people to be aware of that. The member for Sault Ste Marie said he'd be nervous about his son driving a motorcycle. I must admit I share the same fears, partly from the experience of doing it at a young age myself. I want them to have all the tools necessary to be able to motorcycle, if either of my two sons choose to, in the safest way possible. This is why I'm very pleased to see that more and more people are taking motorcycle safety courses, like the one that's offered in the riding of Peterborough at Sir Sandford Fleming College, Gearing Up: Canada's Motorcycle Skills Course, which is known to be an excellent course. Last year, I believe, some 20,000 people took that course, which is very significant.

I think it's important to know that a lot of the accidents that happen on motorcycles happen at low speeds, often in a city. I know my friend Michael Billingham in the town of Gravenhurst, at a very slow speed—at something like under 50 kilometres an hour—was involved in a serious accident where a car pulled out from an intersection and he was hit. That's often where the accidents happen.

Motorcycling is gaining more and more popularity, and you just have to, in the spring and summer on a nice day—particularly a Saturday or Sunday—see all the people who are out enjoying the sport and the recreation part of it. We have to make it as safe as we can. Also, of course, in Parry Sound, every year in the first week of July there's a big sport bike rally, which is gaining popularity each year.

I'd like to support this bill. If it helps save one life, it's worthwhile.

The Acting Speaker: Response?

Mr Stewart: I would like to thank the members who spoke on this bill: Elgin-Middlesex-London, Sault Ste Marie, Sudbury, Durham, Parry Sound and Beaches-East

York. I didn't want this to become political, and I would suggest to the member from Beaches-East York—some of the comments that he made; make those comments to some widow whose husband has been killed on a bike, maybe forced off the road, whatever. If you're not sure about what safety education awareness is at this stage in your life, I'm not about to tell you what it is.

In the interest of safety, I want to emphasize that it is necessary to develop skills and awareness of proper driving habits to handle motorcycles on Ontario's highways. It is vital for the citizens of Ontario to be aware of motorcycles on the highways and the vulnerability of the motorcyclist, and to recognize the importance of sharing the highway.

I was actually passed a note that prior to 1995 an NDP member passed a motion in this House, that the House is in favour of motorcycles because they are "less of everything." I think if you look back, you will see that. Anyway, members of the Legislature, again I say this issue should not be political. I think this is a very important bill. I think it's important to the people of Ontario, I think it's important to the motorcyclist and to the motorist. As has been said, if we can save one life, the bill has done what we want. It was interesting that a comment made about the romantic part of it. The average age of riders of motorcycles these days is the late 30s. I would ask that you support this bill.

The Acting Speaker: This completes the time allotted for debate on this ballot item.

GRAFFITI AND ADVERTISING SIGNS CONTROL ACT, 2002

LOI DE 2002 SUR LE CONTRÔLE DES GRAFFITIS ET DES PANNEAUX PUBLICITAIRES

The Acting Speaker (Mr Michael A. Brown): I will now move to dealing with ballot item number 69. Mr Kells has moved second reading of Bill 205, An Act to control graffiti on public and private property and advertising signs on public property.

Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion carry? Carried.

Mr Morley Kells (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Mr Speaker, I would ask that the bill be sent to the standing committee on general government.

The Acting Speaker: Agreed? Agreed.

MOTORCYCLE AWARENESS WEEK ACT, 2002

LOI DE 2002 SUR LA SEMAINE DE SENSIBILISATION À LA MOTOCYCLETTE

The Acting Speaker (Mr Michael A. Brown): Now I'll deal with ballot item number 70. Mr Stewart has moved second reading of Bill 201, An Act to proclaim Motorcycle Awareness Week.

Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion carry? Carried.

Pursuant to standing orders of the House, this bill will be referred to the committee of the whole House—

Mr R. Gary Stewart (Peterborough): I would ask that it be ordered for third reading.

The Acting Speaker: Are you asking for unanimous consent?

Mr Stewart: Yes.

The Acting Speaker: Agreed? I heard a no.

The bill will be referred to committee of the whole House.

Mr Stewart: I'd like to have it referred to the standing committee on general government.

The Acting Speaker: Agreed? Agreed.

Mr Frank Mazzilli (London-Fanshawe): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: Earlier in the debate, there was some issue as to the regulations for helmets on motorcycles, and I am pleased to table those regulations—

The Acting Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order. You know that.

All matters relating to private members' public business now being complete, this House stands adjourned until 1:30 of the clock.

The House recessed from 1200 to 1330.

MEMBERS' STATEMENTS

GEOFFREY AND GERALD LOUGHEED

Mr Rick Bartolucci (Sudbury): Last Friday in Ottawa, through the authority of Queen Elizabeth and Her Excellency the Right Honourable Adrienne Clarkson, Governor General of Canada, one of our very active, proactive and involved citizens by the name of Geoffrey Lougheed was knighted to the Most Venerable Order of the Hospital of St John of Jerusalem. Indeed, this is a significant honour. There had only been one other Sudburian ever given knighthood, and that was his father, Gerry Lougheed Sr. At that same investiture, Sir Gerry Lougheed Sr was elevated to Knight of Justice.

I think it's pretty significant that these two individuals in our community would receive such a wonderful honour. Indeed it is well deserved, for this honour goes to those people who for a long period of time have performed outstanding service in educating Canadians to improve their health, safety and quality of life through training and community service. Certainly Sir Gerry Lougheed Sr and Sir Geoffrey Lougheed exemplify what this knighting is all about.

As a community, tonight we will be honouring Sir Geoffrey Lougheed at a night for a knight. We want to wish both of them a great deal of gratitude from our community and wish them much success in their new roles.

OSTEOPOROSIS

Mrs Julia Munro (York North): November is Osteoporosis Month, and this is the 20th anniversary of the Osteoporosis Society of Canada. We are working with the society to ensure better bone health for all Ontarians.

Of the 1.6 million women in Ontario, at least 620,000 are at risk of developing osteoporosis and over 330,000 already have the disease. As well, one in eight men over the age of 50 is at risk of developing osteoporosis. Often underdiagnosed and undertreated, osteoporosis can be a debilitating disease resulting in pain, disfigurement, lowered self-esteem, reduction or loss of mobility and decreased independence.

This month the Osteoporosis Society of Canada released the first evidence-based clinical practice guidelines on osteoporosis. These guidelines will improve patient care by giving physicians scientifically based recommendations on how best to diagnose and treat osteoporosis. For example, one of the key recommendations is that all Ontarians over the age of 65 should have a bone density test.

Our work with the Osteoporosis Society of Canada is especially important at this time; 2000 to 2010 is the Bone and Joint Decade, which was endorsed last month by the federal Minister of Health. Canada now proudly joins 45 other countries, the World Health Organization and more than 750 organizations and associations around the world in the global effort to raise awareness and take action on bone and joint disease and injury.

We applaud the Osteoporosis Society of Canada. This government will continue to work with the society to ensure that Ontarians have access to early diagnosis and optimal care and treatment for osteoporosis. Ontarians deserve the opportunity to make informed decisions about their bone health and lead active, independent and productive lives.

BOB WELCH

Mr James J. Bradley (St Catharines): The city of St Catharines will witness a very important and meaningful ceremony on Friday, November 22, 2002, as on this occasion, one of its most beloved and respected citizens will have the provincial courthouse in downtown St Catharines dedicated in his honour.

At the urging of a family friend, Dave McDonnell, a challenge was issued to find an appropriate way to honour Bob Welch for his many years of service and contribution to the province of Ontario.

It was a genuine privilege for me to be part of a committee which was formed to determine the best way to honour the former Deputy Premier, cabinet minister, MPP for Lincoln and Brock, and distinguished citizen—a committee which included individuals of all political persuasions and which had no other role.

As an admired member of the legal profession and a respected parliamentarian and provincial representative, Bob Welch made a major and positive difference in the lives of Ontarians and in the community in which he resided.

The support for naming this public building the Robert S.K. Welch Courthouse will be unanimous, and will reflect the popularity of a man who was a good friend to all who knew him and who was admired by people of every political affiliation.

The Chair of Management Board and the Attorney General of Ontario are to be commended for agreeing to the request of the committee and the citizens of St Catharines and for participating in this important ceremony tomorrow in our community.

KIMBERLY ROGERS

Mr Tony Martin (Sault Ste Marie): I've just returned from Sudbury, where I attended the Kimberly Rogers inquest. Once again I noticed that the Ministry of Community, Family and Children's Services wasn't there.

Testimony at the inquest continues to show that the Conservative government's sweeping welfare reforms make it impossible for people to survive on social assistance, let alone better themselves and break out of the cycle of poverty.

Yesterday's testimony showed that after the cost of housing and food, there is no money left over for transportation, phone and clothing. A person needs a phone, transportation and decent clothes to look for a job.

The Conservative government has set up a system that forces people who need social assistance to become creative just to survive. But when these very desperate people do, this government turns them into criminals and cuts off all their support.

Do the Conservatives think that people should be left on the streets with nothing? If the ministry had been at the inquest, they would know that the community does not have the resources to help the victims of their welfare policies.

It is time the Conservative government understands the damage its policies are doing to people. It is time for them to stand up and take responsibility. Stop the lifetime ban. Stop the clawback of the national child benefit. Increase the shelter allowance. Stop the ban on student loans for people on social assistance.

ONTARIO MEDAL FOR GOOD CITIZENSHIP

Mrs Margaret Marland (Mississauga South): It is an honour to congratulate the two Mississauga residents who received the 2002 Ontario Medal for Good Citizenship in recognition of outstanding public contributions through exceptional long-term efforts.

Cathy Harvey is a distinguished advocate for people living in long-term and chronic care facilities. At age 25, with two young children and a nursing career, Cathy was diagnosed with multiple sclerosis, which left her a quadriplegic. Yet Cathy remained an active, devoted mother; indeed, her son Cam became a world-class rower, winning two bronze medals in the 1986 world championships. I was fortunate enough to attend that particular event.

Cathy, who uses a chin-powered wheelchair, has mastered the art of mouth painting. Her beautiful Christmas cards have raised money for the Multiple Sclerosis Society and the Trillium Health Centre Foundation. Cathy's courage, creativity and compassion are an inspiration to us all.

Victor Deschenes is a strong supporter of children's causes. Working quietly, he started by buying hundreds of baseball jackets for disadvantaged children. Victor pays for as many as 5,000 children to attend Blue Jays games, and has purchased up to 500 bicycles at a time for youngsters who have none.

Victor has also provided financial aid to the Mississauga News Christmas Fund, Mississauga Waterfront Festival, Peel Partnership for a Drug-Free Community and other causes. His kindness and generosity have made a huge difference to many families.

Cathy and Victor, on behalf of everyone in our community, thank you for your exceptional contributions to life in our great city of Mississauga.

HERB GRAY

Mrs Sandra Papatello (Windsor West): My colleague the member from St Clair and I had the opportunity to introduce Herb Gray at the Herb Gray tribute in Windsor last night. Windsor is going through three days that have been properly titled Herb Gray Days, where our community is celebrating the tremendous career that Herb Gray has had in political life spanning practically four decades, serving under three Prime Ministers. He began his career in 1962, when many of us were still just thinking about politics.

What they did last night: funds that were raised at the banquet are going to the multicultural council, where they had a huge, colourful ribbon called the Harmony Ribbon, and they launched the Harmony Ribbon Award. That first recipient is very properly our own, the Right Honourable Herb Gray. That ribbon award is meant to be given to that one individual or family or business that promotes the notion of harmonious living in our community especially, which is so multicultural. We are so proud of Herb Gray receiving that distinguished honour last night.

I can tell you that with the memorial book that was passed out as part of the program, we find it of great interest to watch the tremendous career of Herb Gray. But having watched him close up for many, many years, all we can say on behalf of all Windsor residents to our own Herb, Right Honourable Herb Gray, is thank you.

DRUG AWARENESS WEEK

Mr John O'Toole (Durham): I rise in the House to mention Drug Awareness Week in Ontario. I'd like to thank public health nurses Lynn Ryan and Heather

Tucker, who have kindly provided information on Drug Awareness Week in Durham region.

The Durham Region Health Department is marking Drug Awareness Week from November 17 to 23 with the introduction of the Parent Guide to Teen Parties. This is an informative booklet that helps parents understand the full legal liabilities they have for any alcohol that teens or their friends drink in their homes.

Also in support of Drug Awareness Week is the "ultimate mix" competition. It challenges students from local high schools to develop a recipe for the best non-alcoholic drink. Last year, Port Perry High School in my riding of Durham won the contest. This year, I understand 12 high schools are in competition, including St Stephen's Secondary School, Courtice Secondary School, Port Perry High School and Cartwright High School, each from my riding.

Janet McPherson is chair of the Durham Youth Drug Awareness Committee. I hasten to add that drug awareness is a year-round objective in Durham region. Public health programs on alcohol and drugs touch not only young people, but adults as well. Among the adult initiatives are the Health at Work program and the Safer Bars campaign.

In 2001, Ontario students surveyed by the Addiction Research Foundation revealed that 32% of the teens in grades 7 to 12 were passengers in a car with a driver who had been drinking. In view of alarming statistics like these, I am sure we are especially grateful for the Ontario Drug Awareness Partnership, which has organized Drug Awareness Week in 200 communities across Ontario. They are indeed making a difference for our young people and adults.

ROAD SAFETY

Mr Michael Gravelle (Thunder Bay-Superior North): It is certainly frustrating that as winter arrives in northwestern Ontario each year, our concerns about the quality of road maintenance in the region reappear with the same regularity. What is most difficult to understand, let alone justify, is why the standards vary so drastically throughout the region. I will always argue that we should be increasing the minimum standards that are presently in place, but regardless, is it too much for my constituents to expect that driving conditions will at least be the same for people driving all the way from Marathon to Thunder Bay, for example?

The most graphic example of varying standards is the section of Highway 11/17 east of the Steel River bridge near Terrace Bay. During a storm earlier this month, the pattern repeated itself. West of the Steel River, conditions were good. East of that point, maintenance crews were nowhere to be seen. Minister, your staff are responsible for that poorly maintained section of the highway. Clearly some action must be taken by you to see that this and other sections of the highway are properly maintained at all times.

Even more decisive action must be taken to improve safety on the Thunder Bay Expressway. Earlier this week, two people lost their lives in an accident that was eerily reminiscent of another tragic fatality two years ago. Minister, you must move quickly to install concrete barriers on those sections of the expressway that are not protected by a median. In southern Ontario, such a barrier is automatically installed on high-volume sections of the highway, such as the expressway. We should be treated no differently in our part of the province. People's lives are at risk every day when they drive down the expressway, particularly when winter driving conditions exist.

Regardless of whatever long-term plans you may have, Minister, we cannot afford to wait. We cannot bring back the people who have lost their lives, but surely we can take the action necessary to prevent any further tragic accidents.

COMMUNITY LEADERS IN NIPISSING

Mr AL McDonald (Nipissing): Today I'd like to talk about a special lady from my riding of Nipissing, Harriet Madigan. I have a tremendous amount of respect for her, as I believe she is a person who gives so much to her community. She is the ultimate volunteer.

Harriet Madigan has done so much for our community. She developed the concept of Community Waterfront Friends and is the driving force behind Heritage Gardeners and Communities in Bloom.

I am not the only one who has kind words to say about Harriet Madigan. Just listen to what Rod Johnston has to say: "Harriet, through her determination and vision, has very likely changed the quality of life for the people of North Bay forever, and for the better. She has always carried herself in a professional manner, never losing sight of the ultimate goal to bring something to North Bay that will benefit the whole community."

I'd also like to talk about a gentleman by the name of Donald Jacobs from North Bay. He's been an active community leader for many years now, and I'd like to commend him for all his hard work. Mr Jacobs was an elementary school teacher for 32 years. His involvement in extracurricular activity goes far beyond the school and into the community as a whole. Don has involvement in the Tolerance, Understanding, Compassion and Action organization, the Children's Assist Program, the Show Kids You Care project, the Child and Youth Support Network, the international project called Sleeping Children Around the World, and the Concordia Centre's Rap Around project. Mr Jacobs is a kind and gentle person and has always done good things for those in need without ever seeking personal recognition.

We are very lucky to have these individuals in my riding of Nipissing.

VISITORS

Mr Joseph Spina (Brampton Centre): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I am pleased to welcome a group of OAC students from Cardinal Leger high school who are visiting us here this afternoon in the gallery to learn about the government of Ontario, from the heart of Brampton Centre.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): I thank the member.

REPORTS BY COMMITTEES

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Mr Joseph Spina (Brampton Centre): I beg leave to present a report from the standing committee on finance and economic affairs and move its adoption.

Clerk at the Table (Mr Todd Decker): Your committee begs to report the following bill, as amended:

Bill 186, An Act to further highway safety and establish consumer protection through the regulation of the collision repair industry, and to make a complementary amendment to the Insurance Act / Projet de loi 186, Loi visant à améliorer la sécurité sur les voies publiques et à protéger les consommateurs en réglementant le secteur de la réparation en cas de collision et à apporter une modification complémentaire à la Loi sur les assurances.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Shall the report be received and adopted? Agreed.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON ESTIMATES

Mr Alvin Curling (Scarborough-Rouge River): I beg leave to present a report from the standing committee on estimates.

Clerk at the Table (Mr Todd Decker): Mr Curling from the standing committee on estimates reports the following resolutions:

Resolved that supply in the following amounts and to defray the expenses—

Interjections: Dispense.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Dispense. No further action required.

ORAL QUESTIONS

HYDRO RATES

Mr Michael Bryant (St Paul's): My question is for the Minister of Energy. Minister, should large commercial and industrial consumers be able to get a fixed price for power of 4.3 cents per kilowatt hour?

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, minister responsible for francophone affairs): The Premier has asked me to consult with the sector and to report back to him on that important issue.

Mr Bryant: Well, that's not what the government of Ontario said on November 11, when Premier Eves announced and stated in his press release, "Large commercial and industrial consumers could choose between their current arrangements and a fixed 4.3 cents per kilowatt hour price of power."

The government is now saying they are talking to the big commercial and industrial users because they found out that what they announced, they cannot do. They found out that this part of their price relief plan would make matters worse. They found out that if they did that, not a single new generator would come into the province of Ontario. I know you are doing your homework now, Minister, but why didn't you consult with the industry before you made your announcement on November 11?

Hon Mr Baird: I think if the member opposite checks the record, he would discover that the Premier announced on November 11 that I would do just that. We have the courage to listen, and we'll certainly listen to what we hear from large commercial and industrial customers.

Some would like to take advantage of the fact that they have put their peak hours perhaps in a different relationship to the rest of the economy. Some would like some information with respect to whether they could get two-cent power if they ran a plant in the evening and in the very off-peak hours. I think it's important that we listen and we take the opportunity to reflect on what we hear. The Premier did announce that on November 11. I agreed with it then and I certainly agree with it now.

I am disappointed that we now have day three with no Dalton McGuinty in the Legislature because he's afraid to show his face.

Mr Bryant: I would say to the Minister of Energy, who excruciatingly parodied his own Premier as a serial waffler at Ernie's House of Waffles, we don't need to take any lectures from you, waffle boy.

Listen, on May 1, the government of Ontario opened up the electricity marketplace with reckless abandon, shipwrecking Ontario's electricity system. Then when you went to raise the Titanic, you bungled it again. You know that you can't do what you announced you would do with respect to the industrials on November 11. You didn't do your homework on May 1. The Premier didn't even pick up the phone and ask the one guy who would have told him, "Ernie, don't open up the electricity competition marketplace." You didn't do your homework before May 1, and you didn't do your homework before opening up the market, before bringing in the price relief plan on November 11. How on earth can the people of Ontario trust you with their electricity?

Hon Mr Baird: I refer you to the press release of November 11, which explicitly says what I just said. I say to the Liberal House leader to leggo my Eggo.

I find it interesting. Dalton McGuinty on Monday morning put out a fundraising letter saying, "I have the courage to stick to my plan." By Monday afternoon, he had changed it. He was now in favour of closing the market. He was in favour of abandoning regulation. On Tuesday the Web site said, "Update coming soon." Well, I've got news for all my friends: the update has arrived. The man who said on Monday that private power was dead—they've made another mistake on the Web site. It says they want to produce an environment that produces a mix of electricity providers, public and private. The good news for deregulation is that Dalton McGuinty is back on board.

PENSION PLANS

Mr George Smitherman (Toronto Centre-Rosedale):

My question is to the Minister of Finance. It concerns the pension provisions of Bill 198. All around Ontario, citizens are awakening to the realization that the provisions of Bill 198 retroactively rob pensioners of their rights, while encouraging Conrad Black-style surplus raiding. In an astonishing move yesterday, your government moved to clamp down on the debate by tabling a closure motion so that you can ram your bank-bonusing bill through this House. In acknowledgement of the building public concern around this issue, Madam Minister, will you agree to public hearings so Ontarians can let the government know just how offside it is on this matter?

Hon Janet Ecker (Minister of Finance): I would really encourage the honourable member across the way, before he goes around causing people with pensions to be concerned and afraid, to check his facts. There is nothing in this legislation that takes away or interferes in the rights of pensioners—absolutely nothing. There is everything in this legislation that ensures the viability of pension plans for workers is protected. You would expect any government to do the same, and we are indeed doing that. Thirdly, there has been public consultation on this bill. There has been a public discussion paper, meetings and submissions. There continue to be meetings with stakeholders as we look forward, if the bill should be passed, to developing the regulations. There is nothing in this legislation that interferes with the pension rights of workers in this province.

Mr Smitherman: Oh, if only it were true. I've sent to the minister, who apparently hasn't had the time to read her own piece of legislation, just one paragraph that I'll read into the record. Under the heading "Application for payment of surplus to an employer": "An employer or such other person as may be prescribed may apply under this section to the superintendent for the superintendent's consent to the payment of surplus to the employer or prescribed person out of a continuing pension plan or a pension plan being wound up in whole or in part."

With that section, Madam Minister, as you very well know, Ontario stands alone as the only jurisdiction in North America which gives legislative sanction to the robbing of surpluses for ongoing pension plans.

I ask you just one more time, Madam Minister, because apparently you need a little more time to deal with this: will you agree to public hearings so that Ontarians can put their record on the table?

Hon Mrs Ecker: Perhaps the honourable member should try reading the legislation himself. It says here that on an application to the superintendent, "the superintendent shall not consent to the payment of surplus unless the superintendent is satisfied that"—and it has a whole bunch of stuff here about the pension plan being correct and viable, but they cannot consent unless "the employer ... is entitled to the surplus." There are pension plans that are written today—it has nothing to do with the legislation—where employers are entitled to surplus under certain circumstances. In the majority of cases, it is because of an agreement with the workers that talks about how surplus will be dealt with in certain circumstances.

The legislation is very clear. We are continuing to do work with all of the stakeholders on the developing of the regulations because the bottom line here is, this does not put Ontario outside of the legislation—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): The minister's time is up. Final supplementary.

Mr Smitherman: Madam Minister, I would like to just point out that if you took a little more time to read your entire piece of legislation, you would see that contained within it is the great trump card that eviscerates, destroys and eliminates all of those past agreed-upon rights in this plan. With respect to the consultation paper that you spoke of, on the most retrograde, negative impacts in this legislation, none of those were contemplated or discussed in the discussion paper that you like to hide behind.

I say to you just one more time: will you stand in your place and agree to public hearings so that Ontarians can let you know just how out of whack you are?

Hon Mrs Ecker: Since we're sitting here playing the game of paper and quoting, the consultation paper clearly had proposals that talked about how employers would be able to withdraw surplus based on clear entitlement in plan documents—so in other words, rights that already exist—or based on a surplus-sharing agreement with who? With the majority of the workers.

Maybe the honourable member doesn't think the workers should have a say in how their pension plans are treated, but this side of the House thinks there are two things that are very important: the rights of workers—in this case they are given additional rights to apply for surplus—and to protect the viability of pension plans. Maybe the Liberal Party doesn't care if a pension plan is viable, that it's not there for the workers, but on this side of the House, we think pension plans should be there so workers are protected. This legislation ensures that is the case.

The Speaker: New question?

Mr Gilles Bisson (Timmins-James Bay): My question is to the finance minister. Minister, it's clear that you're the only one who has that particular view when it comes to what you're doing to pension surpluses in this province and what you're allowing employers to do.

We have gone out and consulted with the Ontario Federation of Labour and legal experts in the field of pension, and all of them agree with us: what you're doing is opening the door to allow employers not only to raid pension surpluses, but to take pension contribution holidays.

I want to just quote from one particular one: I'm going to send over a legal opinion from Koskie Minsky, one of the firms that happens to do a lot of work on the pension side. What they're saying is, under subsection 79.1, it does allow an employer to apply for a pension surplus, whether or not the employees want them to do it. They say under section 55 of the act, it does allow employers to have the virtually unfettered right to pension contribution holidays.

Minister, will you do the right thing and withdraw this offensive section out of Bill 198?

Hon Mrs Ecker: Again, Mr Speaker, employers currently have significant obligations to keep pension plans funded, and I'm sure the honourable member would not wish that to change. That is not changing. Secondly, what is important here is that there are clear entitlements. Pension plans that already have entitlements for employers are respected. But where there are surplus-sharing agreements, those are also respected. As a matter of fact, they are required to talk to employees about having surplus-sharing agreements.

Nothing in this legislation entitles any employer to raid a pension plan. Nothing in this legislation entitles any employer to take money out of a pension plan so that the pension plan is not viable. Nothing in this legislation takes away any of the earned pension rights of any worker. The OFL had staff at the consultations. The OFL provided submissions on this. They've met with—

The Speaker: Order. The minister's time is up. Supplementary?

Mr Bisson: Minister, you're dead wrong. What you're doing by way of this legislation is changing the entitlement of who can get the pension surpluses. That's clear. Read section 79.1 of the bill: it couldn't be clearer. Not only that, but in regard to the regulations, you're the one who's going to come out with the regulations after, and quite frankly, nobody trusts you.

Minister, the question is simple: will you do the right thing and withdraw this from the bill, take it out of Bill 198, and leave the current rules in place that protect workers in the province of Ontario?

Hon Mrs Ecker: Mr Speaker, the right thing is to make very clear that employers cannot raid pension plans. This legislation does not allow that. The right thing is to ensure that pension plans in this province, pension plans that workers depend on, are protected, and this indeed can do that and will do that. There is nothing that we wish to do to interfere with the rights that pensioners have earned, that workers have earned in their pension plans, and this legislation does not do that.

I regret very sincerely that the honourable member continues to put forward a position that is causing pensioners to think that somehow or other there is a problem with their pension rights. There is not. They are protected and they will continue to be protected, because we believe it is very, very important to protect the viability of pension plans that are there for workers.

Mr Bisson: Minister, let's be clear about something. Under the current rules, employers can't take surpluses out of the pension plan. If that's the case, why are you changing the legislation? It comes down to your trying to say to us, "Trust me. Trust the Conservative government. We have the best interests of workers at heart." Well, when we look at your record, you're the government that has kicked employees in the teeth every time you've had the opportunity. If it's changes to the Ontario Labour Relations Act, you allowed scabs to cross a picket line; you've restricted the ability of people to organize under a union; you've given it in the teeth to farm workers in this province just a couple of weeks ago with the Liberal Party when you voted to take that right away from workers. So the question is very simple: why should workers in this province trust you after the abysmal record of what you've done to workers up to now?

Hon Mrs Ecker: Maybe the honourable member thinks that employees should be spending all their time fighting employers in court to make sure their pension rights are clear. We don't think that is fair to employees; we don't think that is fair to employers. What this legislation does is clearly set out the rules to protect the benefits that workers and pensioners have. It will clearly set out the rights that employers have: they have to apply, the plan has to be viable, there has to be clear entitlement, there has to be respect where there are surplus-sharing agreements with employees. It actually gives employees an additional right that they don't have in other provinces in terms of being allowed to have surplus from a plan. So we've been very clear about the purpose of this legislation. It is there to ensure that those rights, those plans, are protected.

HYDRO REBATES

Ms Marilyn Churley (Toronto-Danforth): I have a question for the Minister of Energy. There are shocking suggestions that you are about to shower taxpayers' money on the very door-to-door power parasites who ripped people off in the first place. Agent energy advisers say you are about to give rebates not just to consumers but to electricity scam artists like Direct Energy. We're hearing the same thing from electricity insiders.

I'm sure that Ontarians will be very angry to hear that expensive rebates will go to bail out retailers who have misled, in some cases, Ontarians at the door, in some cases signing them to deals without their consent. Minister, will you confirm that you will absolutely not give rebates to rip-off artists like Direct Energy?

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, minister responsible for francophone affairs): The member opposite raises some very specific allegations against a corporation in the province of Ontario. We believe in a number of things: we believe in honouring contracts and contract law. I can guarantee the honourable member that we won't provide rebates to anyone where forgery or fraud was involved. There's no room for that in the province of Ontario. I challenge the member opposite to stand in her place and provide me with any specific evidence to back up the charges that she has made.

Ms Churley: You have not ruled out that you are going to be giving taxpayers' money to the private companies that went out there and in some cases ripped off consumers. That is absolutely shocking. Talk about deregulation disaster. Agent energy advisers say that giving rebates to energy retailers will cost us over $100 million. So you are now going to be offering a direct subsidy to scam artists. You will be rewarding some people who've signed consumers to contracts with the consumers having no idea what they were signing. Minister, I am going to ask you again: why are you giving $100 million of taxpayers' money to rip-off artists? That's shocking.

Hon Mr Baird: In the province of Ontario we have contract law. Some retailers allowed their customers to have the rebate flow directly to them, and in those cases, they generally paid a higher amount for a fixed-price contract. Other contracts assigned it to the particular retailer.

The honourable member has made some very serious allegations, saying individuals were signed up to retail contracts without their consent. If you have any specific evidence of criminal activity, I'd welcome it. You give it to me, and we'll be on it, pronto.

It's incredibly important that we respect contract law in the province of Ontario, but what also is important is that if responsible members like the honourable member stand in their place and make scurrilous accusations—if she has specific allegations of fraud that has been committed in this area that have not been investigated, she has a responsibility to bring them to the Ontario Energy Board immediately, and I challenge her to do that.

PENSION PLANS

Mr George Smitherman (Toronto Centre-Rosedale): My question is to the Minister of Finance. It's again on Bill 198 and the pension implications.

I want to introduce you and all members of the House to a gentleman named Bob Smallhorn. He represents more than 3,600 former employees of National Trust, which is well known to have been purchased by Scotiabank. The pension fund, which National Trust has not contributed to since the mid-1980s, has a surplus of $160 million. The 3,600 former employees have been involved in negotiations around this and were awaiting the Monsanto ruling, until a certain minister stood up and introduced a piece of legislation in this House which retroactively wiped out the rights of about 200 different groups trying to get money back from companies where pension funds had been wound up.

So will you stand in this House, Madam Minister, and say to that gentleman, whom you've refused to meet with, why it is appropriate to jam a piece of legislation through this House with next to no debate, with no Tory member speaking about the pension issues? Will you stand up, look that man in the eye and tell him why you're afraid to send this legislation out to public hearings?

Hon Janet Ecker (Minister of Finance): My office has received a request for a meeting from these individuals. It came in several weeks ago. It is being responded to, as requests for meetings are and should be.

This legislation was based on consultation that was done. There has been a public consultation paper. There have been meetings with stakeholders. There have been submissions. It has been announced publicly that we were looking at these issues. The proposals were clearly out there, and the goal here is to make sure that pensioners' rights are protected, that the viability of pension plans is protected. Again, perhaps the Liberal Party thinks employees should be spending time in court to define what the rights are. We think there needs to be clarity. This bill does not interfere with court cases that are going on. We specifically are not retroactively changing court decisions. This legislation is clearly there to protect the rights of pensioners—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): I'm afraid the member's time is up. Final supplementary.

Mr Smitherman: To the same minister, it looks like I'm going to have to send her another piece of paper.

There's another clause in your bill. We like to call it the Ecker hammer and it reads like this, under the heading "Conflict": "Subsection (5) prevails over the pension plan, over the terms of any document governing the pension fund and over any statute or other rule of law."

Madam Minister, you suggested in your answer that this legislation had nothing to do with cases before the court, but you know well, or at least you should, that there is only one case and that some 200 groups of pensioners were awaiting the Monsanto hearing. They have made applications to the superintendent and in one fell swoop of legislation you eliminated their rights and said that the court of law was no longer going to be a place where they could seek satisfaction. So since you don't understand your own legislation, and since you haven't had time to meet with that man, why don't you agree to public hearings, because you've got a little learning to do?

Interjections.

Hon Mrs Ecker: Maybe they don't want to listen, but what this legislation is clearly doing is protecting the rights of pension—

Interjections.

The Speaker: Minister, take your seat, please. We'll allow you to start over. I just wanted to make sure they could hear you.

Hon Mrs Ecker: Thank you very much, Mr Speaker. Obviously the Liberals aren't interested in listening to the answer.

What is very clear here: they can go out and try to say to pensioners that somehow or other rights are being taken away. They are not. Employers have to apply where they have clear entitlement as they currently do in some pension plans. There is allowance for employers to have surplus in certain circumstances, as has been the case. Employers continue to have the obligation to keep those plans solvent. It allows employees in circumstances to have additional rights to be able to apply for surplus. They didn't have that before. If this legislation passes they will have that. It makes sure the bottom-line decision is the viability of the pension plan and nothing—I know the honourable member is not listening—is taking away the rights of pensioners in this province.

FOREIGN-TRAINED DOCTORS

Mr Raminder Gill (Bramalea-Gore-Malton-Springdale): My question is to the Minister of Health and Long-Term Care. This morning a very important announcement was made at Toronto General Hospital by Premier Eves and yourself, Minister Clement. This announcement concerns a topic that is of great importance, not only to my constituents in Bramalea-Gore-Malton-Springdale but also to me personally.

I'm proud, like so many other Ontarians, to be an immigrant to this country. Canada was built by immigrants and will continue to grow because of their hard work. For some time now, one issue that has always been raised, not only by immigrants but also by Canadian-born citizens, is the topic of foreign-trained medical graduates and the problems they encounter in earning a living by plying their trade. Today's announcement on international medical graduates will open the door and allow these skilled and motivated professionals to do what they love doing best by helping others.

Would the Minister of Health please explain to this House the Eves government's plan to help international medical graduates work in their chosen profession?

Hon Tony Clement (Minister of Health and Long-Term Care): I'd be happy to explain, not only to my good friend the honourable member for Bramalea-Gore-Malton-Springdale but to this chamber, the latest health care initiative from the Ernie Eves government.

Today the Premier and I had the pleasure to unveil a new $36.4-million, eight-point plan that will add more than 650 new physicians, mainly international medical graduates, to the health care system over the next five years.

Next year alone, we will see up to 150 IMGs provide medical service across Ontario, including underserved areas. This plan will make a real difference to the lives of the medical graduates themselves, long frustrated by a system that is keeping them from achieving their dream of stability and happiness for themselves and their families.

In the face of the worldwide shortage, we have found a way to create a plan that finds new and innovative ways to attract and retain the best and the brightest. This is a good day for Ontario health care.

Mr Gill: Thank you, Minister. I'm very happy about that response. As many members in this House might be aware, my riding of Bramalea-Gore-Malton-Springdale is made up of many hard-working constituents who will now be able to qualify for this program. On behalf of all of them, I wish to personally thank both Premier Eves and Minister Clement for all their hard work and dedication in introducing this great initiative.

Mr Speaker, as you know, my wife is among the many doctors currently practising in Ontario who are international medical graduates. Like all of those involved in the health care profession, she cares deeply about the health of her patients, and I'm sure she's very delighted by this announcement.

I'm also sure that all members of this House will be supportive of this latest announcement. Regardless of political affiliation, we all want to ensure that Ontario continues to possess the best publicly funded health care system in Canada. Could the Minister of Health please explain how this announcement was arrived at?

Hon Mr Clement: I would say to the honourable member and, through him, to his lovely wife, Dr Pamela Gill, that we have listened to a series of recommendations and, in fact, we created the format and the forum for these recommendations to have some fruition.

It's a rare moment in politics, perhaps too rare, where we can transcend the partisanship of the moment and support something that, in human terms, will make such a big difference to the people we serve and represent.

Today is one of those days, and I encourage members of the Liberal Party and the NDP to support this endeavour. It was indeed former Premier Bob Rae who admitted he had made a terrible mistake when he cut medical school enrolment. We are rectifying that mistake. In fact, we are going beyond that, to ensure that properly trained foreign physicians have an appropriate role in our health care system to increase accessibility, to increase service to ensure that health care works for Ontarians, and we are proud of that.

PENSION PLANS

Mr Monte Kwinter (York Centre): I have a question to the Minister of Finance. Madam Minister, I'm sure you know that I was Minister of Financial Institutions when I had to deal with the Conrad Black-Dominion situation. At that point, we were able to work out an accommodation that has stood in place for 18 years, has served both parties, the plan sponsors and the employees, well with a provision for some sort of negotiation.

Now we find—and this is really déjà vu all over again—you have suddenly turned all of that back. You have wiped out 18 years of a system that has been working. Not only that, you've made it retroactive to 1988. You have ignored the rule of law, and I really resent the fact that you are suggesting that we are fomenting this concern among those pensioners. It is just the opposite. I'm sure that all of your members have been getting inundated with e-mails, faxes and letters from those people who are concerned about what is going to happen to their pensions.

Would you tell me why you would do it, why you would do it retroactively and why would you put these pensioners at risk?

Hon Janet Ecker (Minister of Finance): I take issue with the member's comment. We are not putting pensioners at risk.

Interjections.

Mr Kwinter: Madam Minister, there are over 200 cases where an adjudication has to take place. You have decided in this legislation that, other than the Monsanto case, all others will be wiped out. How that works in a democracy I don't know. But how can you tell people, "You no longer have any rights. You no longer have any recourse to the courts, you no longer have recourse to your pension plans, because we have determined that the sole arbiter is the superintendent of pensions and he has the right to do what he sees fit"? As a result of that, you are putting a great many people in this province at risk. You have to know that and you have to know why this is such a concern. Can you tell me the motivation for what you're doing?

Hon Mrs Ecker: If it was so clear, if what the Liberals did was working so well, then why are there 200 applications waiting for adjudication?

Interjections.

Hon Mrs Ecker: Not before the courts—stop confusing the matter, to the honourable member. They are there looking for adjudication. What this proposes to do is make sure that the law, as it was understood, is very clear, so that pensioners' rights are protected, so that employers are not allowed to raid plans, so that employers continue to put into plans what they're supposed to put in, so that any decisions around surpluses—the bottom line is the viability of the pension plan. And nothing, despite what the honourable member is trying to portray, is taking away the rights of pensioners or interfering in any way with the earned rights of pensioners or workers in this province.

TOURISM

Mr Bart Maves (Niagara Falls): My question is for the Minister of Tourism and Recreation. As the member for Niagara Falls, I know first-hand the benefits of a strong tourism industry. Tourism is part of the Niagara region's diverse economy, creating countless jobs for the community and stimulating the local economy.

The tourism industry continues to recover after the terrorist attacks in the United States, due in part to this government's increased marketing efforts that totalled $14 million. The partnerships we developed helped the industry during this difficult period, but the industry has not yet reached its full potential. Minister, as the new guy on the block, what are you doing to engage the industry to increase tourism in Ontario?

Hon Frank Klees (Minister of Tourism and Recreation): As the new guy on the block, I want to thank the member from Niagara Falls for his question. He is indeed a strong advocate for tourism, particularly in the Niagara region, and he's absolutely correct about the economic impact of tourism in the province of Ontario at large.

Tourism generates some $20 billion in economic activity in this province and employs more than half a million people. It's also the world's fastest-growing industry and, by 2010, is expected to triple.

The member is right, we have to ensure that Ontario gets its fair share of that growth. Over the next number of weeks, we'll be conducting province-wide consultations, beginning tomorrow in Ottawa and Niagara Falls on Saturday. During the ensuing weeks, we will be visiting Toronto, Windsor, Peterborough, North Bay and Thunder Bay. The purpose of these consultations is to meet with stakeholders to get their input on how we can put Ontario in the forefront and develop a long-term tourism strategy for the province of Ontario.

Mr Maves: Thank you, Minister, for that response. I'm sure that the tourism stakeholders and businesses in my riding will be characteristically hospitable when you consult with them on Saturday. In fact, Niagara Falls is always a welcoming community.

The region's spectacular beauty will be showcased again this weekend at the 20th annual Niagara Festival of Lights. I am proud that the Ernie Eves government, through the Ministry of Tourism and Recreation, is investing again this year $50,000 to enhance marketing for the event, which has welcomed over two million visitors and injects millions of dollars into the local economy. Anyone looking for something to do on Saturday should come on down to Niagara Falls and watch Mickey and Minnie and their gang as they help us kick off the Festival of Lights.

Minister, when you are consulting in the Niagara community this Saturday and in other communities across the province, what is it you are hoping to achieve?

Hon Mr Klees: I do look forward to joining the member at the Festival of Lights on Saturday evening.

As I indicated, the purpose of these consultations is to give an opportunity to the industry to provide input to our government on developing a long-term strategy for tourism in the province. We'll ask participants to explore issues such as, what do we need to do in the next five years to make Ontario the four-season, must-see destination for people considering travel? Some of the topics we'll discuss are: who is responsible for developing the new products, and what role can government play in assisting the industry in developing some of these new products. We'll look at ways to meet and surpass customer expectations of quality in the province and how we can remain competitive with other world-class destinations. We'll discuss ways to sustain the growth and development of Ontario's tourism industry, and to make sure we have the right priorities in place to build a stable future for the industry—some 500 thousand people in the province depend on this industry for their jobs.

TORONTO TRANSIT COMMISSION

Mr Michael Prue (Beaches-East York): My question is to the Associate Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing. Municipal transit systems in this province are hemorrhaging every day, and nowhere is this more apparent than in Toronto. The Toronto Transit Commission, Canada's largest, best and most efficient system, with 400 million riders a year, is starting to hemorrhage. Cuts have been costing about $400 per rider over the last number of years.

The New Democratic Party is offering dedicated funding for transit and GO to keep rates down and cars off the road. To date, you have offered nothing. Is this your only solution: to do nothing and see fares go up as much as 40 cents a ride in this city?

Hon Tina R. Molinari (Associate Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing): Certainly the member's concern with cities and the city of Toronto and all the issues around transportation are issues that we are very, very concerned about as well. In my consultation across the province of Ontario, there are various issues that come up, and they're different in every city I travel to.

We've invested numerous dollars in the transportation system, and our Minister of Transportation has made that very clear. We have asked the federal government to participate in a partnership with us and the municipalities to address some of these issues that come up on an ongoing basis, and we look forward to continuing that.

Mr Prue: There wasn't much substance in that answer. Riders pay $240 million more in fares today than they did in 1995. Our once world-class city is spiralling down for a number of reasons: higher taxes, user fees, higher rents and transit fares that are out of control.

We in this party came up with a plan some 10 months ago to rejuvenate our cities, including transit. Yesterday the federal Liberals came up with their own plan to rejuvenate transit and stop gridlock. When are you going to fund transit and transportation to ensure that this city, the economic engine of our province, is maintained and gridlock is actually reduced?

Hon Mrs Molinari: I'd like to refer that question to the Minister of Transportation.

Hon Norman W. Sterling (Minister of Transportation): This government has provided the TTC with $1.8 billion since 1995. Tomorrow, on the eve of the opening of the Sheppard subway line—we have put $571 million into that project alone, over 60% of the cost of that particular line. We have given the city of Toronto $126 million in this fiscal year alone. We have forgone asking the city of Toronto to pay $50.8 million toward GO transit this year, which they can put into TTC.

If any government has put money into transit and has tried to improve public transit, it's this government right here.

PENSION PLANS

Mr James J. Bradley (St Catharines): I have a question for the Minister of Labour, who I hope can help us out with this problem. I have a letter from many constituents in my community, which reads as follows:

"I am a former employee of National Trust and I am writing to you about the pension law provisions proposed in Bill 198. I am one of over a thousand persons who have either lost their jobs or retired from National Trust, and I have an interest in the sizable surplus in the pension plan, which belongs to the plan members. Our case is currently before the superintendent of pensions in Ontario and we are expecting a positive outcome consistent with other cases that have required a distribution of pension plan surpluses.

"Bill 198 would wipe out our claim retroactively, wipe out any decisions or proceedings currently before the superintendent of financial institutions and would not allow us to take our case to the courts or elsewhere. We do not agree with the change in the law as it is contrary to the principles of any democracy" and wipes out "our rights after we have proceeded successfully to assert them under the law."

They ask the following, and I ask your help in persuading the minister with this: would you withdraw the pension provisions of Bill 198? Would you have a proper review conducted? Would you commit that your government will not support retroactive legislation which takes away people's rights? I appeal to the Minister of Labour for this.

Hon Brad Clark (Minister of Labour): I was excited I had a question, but really it's for the Minister of Finance.

Hon Janet Ecker (Minister of Finance): Again, we took considerable time to consult before this legislation was drafted. We are taking, should it be passed, considerable time to work with stakeholders to make sure that the regulations are very clear about the criteria that govern in this case. As we have said, we are not taking away the rights of pensioners and we are not affecting their earned benefits. We are making it very clear that the viability of pension plans, to make sure those pension plans are safe and secure, is one of the very, very important tests that always has to be applied.

Mr Bradley: I've observed over the years all parties in government, and one of the mistakes they make, I think, is rushing important and complex legislation through the House without public hearings. This is a bill that actually lends itself to having some expertise. You can try to prove that you're right; the opposition will try to prove they're right. The public wants clarification.

Why wouldn't you simply have this, at the very least, go to a committee of the Ontario Legislature? Bring in those people who perhaps agree with you, those people who agree with what the opposition is saying, have this matter clarified and you can decide then whether you're going to withdraw the legislation, amend it or whether you're going to proceed with it. That's a very reasonable request. Why wouldn't you do that instead of doing what you're doing today, and that is ramming the bill through the Legislature with no committee hearings and no further debate when it has some very important implications for people who are genuinely concerned about it? Why wouldn't you do that, and will you try to persuade your House leader of the wisdom of that particular suggestion?

Hon Mrs Ecker: I know the honourable member has a great respect for process, but this began in December of 2000. In December of 2000, the government announced publicly that we had a problem and we were going to consult to figure out how best to fix it. We put out a public discussion paper that was freely available. We said in the budget this spring that we were going to move forward with putting in place the results of the consultations we had done. We had another series of meetings. There have been many submissions from experts from the labour side, the employer side, pensioners; they've all been duly considered, as they should be. All of that input has gone into the drafting of this legislation. It is something that has taken considerable time and considerable reflection. The important priority here is protecting the viability of plans and protecting the benefits of pensioners. This legislation does not take that away.

TEACHERS' STRIKE

Mr Norm Miller (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a question for the Minister of Education. As you well know, secondary teachers in the Simcoe Muskoka district school board went on strike a few weeks ago, followed by the elementary teachers last week, affecting more than 7,000 students and their families. The future of these students should be this government's first priority, and they should not be held hostage by unions and the boards. The priority should be ensuring the education of students, and we should act before it is too late. Minister, can you tell us what the government is doing to protect the rights of students?

Hon Elizabeth Witmer (Deputy Premier, Minister of Education): It's always regrettable when there are disputes between boards and their employee associations. I would hope that both sides would keep in mind the students and, obviously, the need for the students to return to school as quickly as possible. However, it would be inappropriate for me as Minister of Education to interfere in the collective bargaining process. So I would urge both parties to get back to the bargaining table and I would urge them to continue to put the students first.

Mr Miller: Minister, my office has been inundated with phone calls from concerned parents and students affected by the strike. Many feel their school year will be in jeopardy, especially those students who are in the double cohort year. Can you tell me and my constituents what actions can be taken to protect the school year and not jeopardize the students' chances for success?

Hon Mrs Witmer: This is a legal strike, but I think we also need to recognize that there is a point where students' right to receive a quality education starts to supersede everything else. So there is a process in place to ensure that the school year will continue to be a success. There is an independent body called the Education Relations Commission that does have the mandate to advise the Lieutenant Governor when the school year would be in jeopardy. I just want the member to know that if that committee, the ERC, were to make a decision, the government in the past—and I would stress "in the past"—has received that advice and they have received all-party consent for speedy back-to-work legislation.

PENSION PLANS

Mr George Smitherman (Toronto Centre-Rosedale): To the Minister of Finance: Madam Minister, I have here your consultation paper that you spent an awful lot of time hiding behind today. I read this paper. It has no mention of retroactivity, which is a central element of your legislation. It has no mention that regs will overrule documents, statutes and the rule of law—none whatsoever. It has no mention of removing the right of appeal to the courts.

You made reference to the 200 bodies waiting to have a ruling as a sign of how bad things were. That's because your superintendent, pending the outcome of the Monsanto case, has refused to deal with them. The much larger line is the one that will quickly form after your superintendent approves the first corporate raid. We can be sure that the corporate raiders will be tripping over themselves to rob these surplus funds. Madam Minister, instead of approaching this issue on a partisan basis, will you recognize that in Ontario, and even in Scarborough Centre, there are people with genuine concerns about the impact of this legislation? It's complex, it's detailed and it deserves public hearings. Will you agree to them now?

Hon Janet Ecker (Minister of Finance): This is an issue that has been under consideration since we first announced that we would be moving forward with a way to avoid lengthy court battles, to avoid having employees having to feel they had to go to court to establish rights in pension surplus. This has been ongoing. There has been consultation. There has been a public paper. We've had submissions. We are going to continue, as we have said, to work with stakeholders on the development of the regulations to make sure that the viability of pension plans is the uppermost priority here, that the rights of pensioners are protected, the earned rights of workers in their pension plan are protected, and we will do that.

Mr Smitherman: Minister, I find it interesting that you keep referring to the courts. I just wanted to let you in on a little secret. Some people go to the courts in search of justice, but in this bill you trample their rights and you say that that's no longer available to them.

The Canadian Association for the Fifty-Plus, in an open letter to the Ontario government released on November 12, called Bill 198 "a licence to steal." This is not a group, I think, that spends all their time trying to find some new hyperbole to inflame a debate. It's a group that represents hundreds of thousands of Ontarians who have legitimate concerns. You made reference earlier to your inability, due to time constraints, to meet with a man who represents almost 4,000 people who are influenced. You said that you'd get to it at some point.

Madam Minister, there's plenty of evidence here today that you haven't read your own legislation, that you don't understand the implications of it, that you have not had a complete consultation with all the parties. Will you agree to slow it down just a little bit so that we can have public hearings and allow Ontarians to voice their opinion?

Hon Mrs Ecker: There has been considerable consultation on this. There have been meetings with all of the stakeholders. There will continue to be meetings with the affected stakeholders, as there should be, in terms of the regulations that will apply should this legislation pass. We will continue to do that because protecting the pension rights of workers is very important. That is a pre-eminent goal here: making sure there are clear rules so people know what their entitlements are, making sure that employers are continuing to support those pension plans as we want them to do, making sure that surplus sharing agreements negotiated with workers are there.

Interjection: They're gone. They're gone.

Hon Mrs Ecker: The honourable member says they're gone, and again, the honourable member is wrong.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL POLICIES

Mr Wayne Wettlaufer (Kitchener Centre): I also have a question for the Minister of Finance. Every Ontarian knows that the federal government is not only able to accumulate but does accumulate massive budget surpluses. The federal finance minister continues to forecast that the trend of big federal fiscal surpluses is expected to continue for some years to come. As the federal government books these fiscal surpluses by collecting tax revenue from the provinces, we would all like to know if Ontario gets back anywhere near what it provides to the federal government in tax revenue. Furthermore, my constituents are in my office regularly, demanding to know what our government is doing to represent the interests of Ontario citizens and taxpayers. They want to know what Ontario's contribution to the fiscal balance sheet of Confederation is.

Hon Janet Ecker (Minister of Finance): I know the Liberal Party here, the cousins of the Liberals in Ottawa, don't think this is an important issue, but taxpayers in this province think it's extremely important that in this fiscal year, Ontario citizens will contribute $22.8 billion more in taxes and non-tax revenues to the federal government than they receive in federal program spending and in paying their share of the federal government's debt interest costs. This means that each Ontarian contributes almost $2,000 more to the federal government than he or she receives back. We have 38% of the population; we only receive 30% of federal spending.

We in Ontario recognize that Ontario is a very well off, wealthy, prosperous province because of the economic policies of this government. We're prepared to help with equalization payments with other provinces. But we do believe that the federal government needs to take a serious look at its revenues, at the province's revenues, at its responsibilities and the province's responsibilities to ensure taxpayers—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): I'm afraid the minister's time is up. Supplementary?

Mr Wettlaufer: Minister, thank you for explaining the gross fiscal imbalance between Ontario and the federal government, but there are some constituents in my riding who do have concerns about the amount of the equalization payments. They are constantly comparing Ontario to Quebec—the difference in imbalance. They compare, for instance, the amount that is taken out by the federal government in gas taxes, to the tune of $1.3 billion every year, and they're only putting back $25 million in highway improvements in Ontario. They're complaining about the federal government collecting GST on hydro debt paydown.

But I have a concern that directly relates to my constituents, and that is health care. I need a few clarifications for the many constituents who are complaining to me about health care—the increases in health care spending that we, as a government, in Ontario have made every year since 1995. But the provincial governments can no longer afford to pick up the slack of the federal government. The federal government taxes Ontarians, but it continues to hold back its share. Even Roy Romanow has criticized the federal government.

Minister, I need you to be very specific. How—

The Speaker: Order. I'm afraid the member's time is up. Minister?

Hon Mrs Ecker: It is indeed, as my colleagues say, an excellent question. I'm glad he mentioned electricity bills, because we here in Ontario do not charge PST on electricity bills. The federal government charges GST on those bills. We don't think that's appropriate. We think they should change that.

But on to another equally important issue: health care. I know the Minister of Health would love us to make this message very, very clear so Ontario residents understand this. Since 1994-95, the payments to Ontario from Ottawa for important things like health care have only gone up $172 million, where this province, because of the importance of health care to our citizens, has increased health funding by over $8 billion in that same time frame. So clearly, the federal government must do its part. We're prepared to do our part. Citizens demand no less of either government.

HEALTH PROFESSIONALS' COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Mr Peter Kormos (Niagara Centre): I have a question to the Minister of Labour. Ontario's OPSEU health professionals have not had a contract for eight months. Negotiations, central bargaining broke down in June of this year. You will know that yesterday those same health professionals voted 91% in favour of whatever it takes to obtain a fair contract. This is a very volatile situation. Will you help restore confidence in the arbitration process that they will be subjected to by calling upon the parties to submit a joint list of arbitrators from which you will choose the arbitrator?

Hon Brad Clark (Minister of Labour): The member knows full well the process in terms of hospital labour dispute arbitration. From my perspective, if the two sides want to decide that they want to go into a mediation-arbitration process, they have that opportunity. They can do that. If they would like to jointly decide upon an arbitrator, they can do that also.

At this particular point in time, they really should be back at the table negotiating in a collective agreement. I am eager to see that they solve the problem, and we are awaiting final disposition. If they can't come to a decision, then we can appoint an arbitrator and our arbitrators are, I'd argue, sir, always impartial and unbiased.

Mr Kormos: I say to the Minister of Labour, please, this is a very volatile situation. You can demonstrate leadership. You can help influence the restoration of negotiations and, barring that, assure the parties that there will be thorough fairness in the arbitration process by standing and declaring today that you'll use a protocol of procedure that quite frankly isprecedented. It was used to great success as part of the resolution of the Toronto inside and outside workers represented by CUPE. Both parties similarly agreed on a list of arbitrators from which this government chose the arbitrator.

Show leadership. Help defuse this situation, and please tell us that you will call upon those parties and prepare a joint list from which you will choose the arbitrator.

Hon Mr Clark: We have shown leadership. Our mediator has been working with the two parties. We've encouraged them to proceed with collective bargaining. That's how the process will resolve itself. It's important to note that 98% of all labour disputes in Ontario are settled through collective bargaining.

If the two parties, as you're suggesting, are keen on going through a mediation-arbitration process, then they should be making it known to me personally.

VISITORS

Ms Marilyn Mushinski (Scarborough Centre): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I'd like to recognize Kelvin Chai Yung Ko, who is with us here today. Mr Ko has served as the director of the Cultural Centre of the Taipei Economic and Cultural Office since 1998, and he's leaving Ontario and Canada on Monday, November 25, for a new appointment. He is here with a number of supporters this afternoon. I'd like him to be recognized.

PETITIONS

LONG-TERM CARE

Mr James J. Bradley (St Catharines): My petition is addressed to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario. It reads as follows:

"Whereas the Eves government has increased the fees paid for by seniors and the most vulnerable living in long-term-care facilities by 15% over three years, or $3.02 per diem in the first year and $2 in the second year and $2 in the third year, effective September 1, 2002; and

"Whereas this increase will cost seniors and our most vulnerable more than $200 a month after three years; and

"Whereas this increase is above the rent increase guidelines for tenants in the province of Ontario for 2002; and

"Whereas the long-term-care funding partnership has been based upon government accepting the responsibility to fund the care and services that residents need;

"Whereas the government needs to increase long-term-care operating funding by $750 million over the next three years to raise the level of service for Ontario's long-term-care residents to those in Saskatchewan back in 1999; and

"Whereas this province has been built by seniors who should be able to live out their lives with dignity, respect and in comfort in this province;

"We the undersigned petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario as follows:

"We demand that Premier Eves reduce the 15% increase over three years in accommodation costs to no more than the cost-of-living increase annually and that the provincial government provide adequate funding for nursing and personal care to a level that is at least at the average standard for nursing and personal care in those 10 jurisdictions included in the government's own study."

I affix my signature as I am in complete agreement with the sentiments expressed in this petition.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): The Government House leader for the order for next week—

Hon Chris Stockwell (Minister of the Environment, Government House Leader): I'm sorry, it isn't, Mr Speaker. And, if I mislead you, it's a consent motion.

The Speaker: A consent motion? Yes.

Hon Mr Stockwell: Mr Speaker, I seek unanimous consent—and I'm searching for the people; there's one. Good. I seek unanimous consent to move a motion respecting consideration of Bill 177 without notice.

The Speaker: Is there consent? Agreed.

REFERRAL OF BILL 177

Hon Chris Stockwell (Minister of the Environment, Government House Leader): I move that the order for third reading of Bill 177, An Act to amend the Municipal Act, 2001, the Municipal Elections Act, 1996 and other Acts consequential to or related to the enactment of the Municipal Act, 2001 and to revise the Territorial Division Act, be discharged and the bill be referred to the committee of the whole House.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Do we need clarification? Is everybody clear? Everybody is clear on that? Agreed.

Back to petitions.

HYDRO RATES

Mrs Marie Bountrogianni (Hamilton Mountain): "To the Legislative Assembly of Ontario:

"Whereas Ernie Eves prematurely opened hydro distribution to the market without a mandate from the people of Ontario; and

"Whereas there are inadequate or no protection mechanisms for consumers;

"Whereas the price per kilowatt hour for electricity in the province of Ontario has nearly quadrupled since May 1;

"Whereas the Ernie Eves government has left Ontario citizens to be mercilessly gouged by the unregulated electricity market;

"We, the undersigned, petition the Legislative Assembly of Ontario to move immediately to protect citizens and our province's electricity, to strictly regulate hydro rates and to issue hydro rebates immediately."

There are over 7,000 signatures here, and I've signed this petition.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon Chris Stockwell (Minister of the Environment, Government House Leader): Pursuant to standing order 55, I have a statement of business of the House for next week. Orders of the day will be next.

On Monday afternoon, Bill 191, emergency vehicles, and on Monday evening, Bill 209, bereavement.

Business for Tuesday is still to be determined.

Wednesday afternoon will be a Liberal opposition day. In the evening we will continue with Bill 209.

Thursday morning, private members' business: we'll be debating ballot item 71, standing in the name of Mr Kennedy, and ballot item 72, standing in the name of Mr Sorbara. The rest of Thursday's business is still to be determined.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

TIME ALLOCATION

Hon Chris Stockwell (Minister of the Environment, Government House Leader): I move that, pursuant to standing order 46 and notwithstanding any other standing order or special order of the House relating to Bill 198, An Act to implement Budget measures and other initiatives of the Government, when Bill 198 is next called as a government order, the Speaker shall put every question necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of the bill, without further debate or amendment, at such time the bill shall be ordered for third reading, which order may be called on that same day; and

That, when the order for third reading is called, the Speaker shall put every question necessary to dispose of this stage of the bill without further debate or amendment; and

That the vote on second and third reading may, pursuant to standing order 28(h), be deferred; and

That, in the case of any division relating to any proceedings on the bill, the division bell shall be limited to five minutes.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Mr Stockwell has moved government notice of motion 64. Time for debate.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): I want to begin by saying that what we're dealing with here, and the public should recognize it, is a closure bill: a bill to shut off the debate on what the government calls a budget bill. In reality it's not a budget bill; it is truly what's called an omnibus bill. For those who have been watching the question period session, we've seen the problem here today. The government has put into this "budget bill" amendments to 27 different acts. The public has a right to be outraged. It is an insult to democracy; it truly is.

The government has its majority. It can do whatever the heck it wants, and it will. But this budget bill, introduced a few days ago, as I say, amends 27 different acts in major ways. The securities changes are in here. Major changes to auto insurance are in here. The decision to abandon something called the Taxpayer Protection Act is in here. The government, by the way, got elected on the basis of saying, "We're going to enact something called the Taxpayer Protection Act that will guarantee you that we can't raise taxes." Well, this bill raises $1.5 billion worth of taxes. It's all in this one bill and it's all designed to be rushed through this Legislature.

The public may say that it may or may not be concerned about that, but let me use an example today: there are enormous changes to the Pension Benefits Act in this bill. It has nothing to do with the budget. It was never mentioned in the budget. It is a clear attempt to ram through significant changes for pensioners hidden under a "budget bill." We're not here to do our business; we are truly here to do the public's business. The public have a right to know when major legislative changes are being made that will have a profound impact on them, and they have a right to have an input into that, to discuss it. But no, this bill was introduced a mere few days ago, and as of six o'clock today, it will essentially be law. The debate will be over. There is no more opportunity for any debate on this bill. The motion we've heard will essentially say, "At six o'clock today, we'll vote and we will no longer ever debate this bill."

I would say to the public, and I will use the example of the changes in the Pension Benefits Act, that what this bill does—I'll focus on just one aspect of the bill that it hugely impacts. There are at least 200 major pension plans affected by this bill. It affects all those pensioners who may have been either laid off as a result of a company downsizing or as a result of a company winding up its pension.

There is a case in court called the Monsanto case that is being used by the pensioners of those 200 companies to make sure their pension rights will be looked after, to make sure they would have access to surplus funds, as has been the case since at least 1988. This bill will essentially say to all those pensioners, "You no longer have any rights. None of you will be able to go to court to be able to argue your case." Furthermore, this law is retroactive to 1988. What really, frankly, offends me is that the government, and this was true in the briefings we had with the government, essentially said, "It's just a minor little move. Don't you be worried about it." It has taken the pensioners who got into the detail of it, along with their advisers, to really alert us to the fact that this is a huge change.

Today we hear the Minister of Finance essentially saying to us, by the way, "Well, you in the opposition are just fearmongering." Let me tell you, when you affect someone's basic pension, the thing that people are going to rely on for the rest of their lives for their very well-being, they have a right to be concerned and angry, and they are. I say to the government, believe me, you are making a huge mistake here in ramming this through. The public should recognize that the bill was introduced just a few days ago. We began debate on it—I remember it well—four sessional days ago. We have had this in the Legislature now for four sessional days, as they are called. Essentially, we've had probably in total about six hours of debate on this bill involving changes to 27 acts.

I just use this one example of the Pension Benefits Act, where you are taking away rights of employees represented by at least 200 companies. The minister today, in what I thought was quite an astonishing statement, said, "Well, we don't want to put pensioners through all this trouble of having to go to court to get their rights, so we'll take away their rights to that and we will allow the employer to go to the superintendent and apply unilaterally on how the employer wants to deal with the surplus." So if the public ever wanted to see a reason why we in the opposition get so angry when the government decides it is going to introduce a huge bill—as I say, it amends 27 different acts and, by the way, it establishes two new acts. It's called a budget bill, but the majority of the material in here has nothing to do with the budget.

The classic case is the amendments to the Pension Benefits Act. My colleague from St Catharines, among others, today said, "Listen, surely the public are owed an opportunity to come before the Legislature, their elected officials, and to make their case." I will warn the government: when you are so arrogant that you think you can simply do whatever you want and not even give the public an opportunity for input, you are starting toward your own demise. There's no question of that.

The total bill I find offensive because I think it deserves substantially more debate and the public have a right to input, but I am particularly offended by the decision to rush through the changes to the Pension Benefits Act. The minister today said, "We have consulted." Well, they consulted with the industry, and then they made dramatic changes from even the basis on which they consulted the industry, and they are retroactively going back to 1988 and taking away rights of pensioners. They are giving the employers an opportunity to unilaterally apply to have access to those surpluses. Make no mistake about it: this is a huge win for Bay Street, but it's a huge loss for Main Street.

Those who watch the proceedings here will find that in less than three hours the debate will be over on this bill. There will be no further opportunity for pensioners to comment on it. Essentially it will be law, because we will have no more debate on it; it will simply be passed through this Legislature. I think that's tragic. The pension benefit changes are wrong, they take away fundamental rights, they will affect literally thousands of pensioners, and it's a huge bonus to the companies but a huge detriment to the pensioners.

Secondly, I think that the people of Ontario have a right to be outraged when they say, "Listen, we elect you, not to do your business, we elect you to do our business. You are there to represent us," and the pensioners can't even have an opportunity to be heard. As I say, this debate will be all over in a matter of three hours and this will be law, and I think it's a huge mistake.

The Speaker: Further debate?

Mr Tony Martin (Sault Ste Marie): I was just saying to my colleague from Niagara Centre a few minutes ago that I can't believe we're here only a day or so into debate on a huge budget bill, a budget bill that is going to have some significant impact on the people of this province but a budget bill that has missed an opportunity to do a complete review of the impact of the government's agenda and initiatives where the economy is concerned over the last six or seven years, that has hurt significantly major chunks of this province, geographic areas as well as sectors, and not allow people out there affected by these decisions and these programs or lack of programs to come forward and talk to us about that so that we might all together decide, then, what is in the best interests of the province and the people who live here.

I find it absolutely shocking that, day after day here now, since we came back in September, we're confronted with major pieces of legislation—huge pieces of legislation—omnibus bills, budget bills that include everything from nuts to doughnuts, with very limited opportunity for debate and, in particular, very limited opportunity to go out to the public for committee hearings so we might hear from people about these important matters and include their input and comment in the final version of what we approve here as the program of the government so that we are all confident that, at the end of the day, we can move forward.

But that's not happening. That is absolutely not happening. This government is in control of this whole process, it needs to be understood. The government sets the agenda, decides how much time is going to be allocated to what, decides when it is time to bring in time allocation, decides when it's time to cut off debate, decides when it's not helpful to them or politically expedient to them to take important pieces of public policy out to the communities across this province and then turns around in their comments in here—you'll hear it again and again—and attempts to blame that somehow on the opposition, that somehow we're dictating or driving the agenda, that we have some ability to decide or control or affect decisions where going out to the public or further debate is concerned. That's just got to be the furthest thing from the truth.

Time after time we see, as we come here day after day these days, time allocation motions that virtually tie the hands of members duly elected from constituencies that expect them to come here and speak out on their behalf and tell the government how policies are affecting them directly in their lives so they can feel confident that somebody is hearing what they have to say, somebody is perhaps understanding the impact and somebody is perhaps interested in the suggestion they might have to make some positive and constructive change.

But that, alas, doesn't happen and that, in my mind, is unfortunate. It's an insult to the democratic process, to the democratic tradition that has grown up in this province over a long period of time now. Different ilk of government—Tory, Liberal, New Democrats—who have recognized and respected the importance of due process, and the need for full and comprehensive public consultation and debate on issues of matter and significant impact on the lives of their community and their day-to-day lives. It just isn't happening and that's too bad.

I know, for example, that when I go back to my constituency on Fridays, I sit down with groups. I do that all the time. I'm going back tonight and I'll be meeting with different groups over the course of tomorrow and the weekend, trying to do my little bit the best I can to hear from people and bring it back here and put it on the record. What they're saying to me is that they've never seen anything like this. Every day they wake up there's another edict coming down that affects the way they do business.

Whether it's ordinary citizens or somebody trying to deliver education or health care, they're struggling with a lack of resources, with new regulations they can't possibly live up to or pay for, with new guidelines that tie their hands in terms of trying to be flexible and creative in front of new challenges that present at their doors almost every day—no opportunity to talk to anybody; no opportunity to challenge or to confront; no opportunity to give advice or to give guidance as to how this is going to work out, or whether it's smart or not smart.

They also make the comment, and I take the criticism with some degree of pride here this afternoon, that when we were in government between 1990 and 1995, we consulted too much. I would prefer to be criticized for consulting too much, for trying to hear from people as much as is absolutely possible about those things that affect the common life and common good of this province, than to be accused of being a dictator, of simply unilaterally driving things through, of not being willing to listen, of not being willing to own up to the fact that perhaps it might be good to have consultation because we make mistakes from time to time, and it's better to catch them before than it is to catch them after and then have to do clean up and respond to the damage that has been done.

That probably presents no more obviously and tragically then in some of the circumstances we all, every day now, read in the newspapers and see in the media. Dudley George, for example: the drive to resolve that issue of not respecting the long-standing tradition of negotiation and debate and discussion about those issues that are so important to our First Nations people. The tragedy at Walkerton: this government decided that it needed less government, that it didn't need the inspectors and the oversight that had been put in place over years to make sure we're protected. There is the environment, the air, the eco-system, and in this particular instance in Walkerton, the water. We didn't think we needed the oversight that was put in place over years to protect the water. Alas, at the end of the day, because of that sort of knee-jerk, backroom, unilateral decision to cut inspectors and cut resources to communities to protect their water and to make sure it was tested properly, we ended up with some very serious tragedies. A significant number of people are dead and others were very sick.

I've been watching, just recently, the inquest that is being held in Sudbury around the case of Kimberly Rogers, where this government systematically, from almost the day they got elected, decided to attack the poor in this province. That goes to the heart of this budget, because there's absolutely nothing in here that indicates they've learned anything from the last seven or eight years, never mind from the very tragic circumstance surrounding the death of Kimberly Rogers.

The ministry that is central to this whole issue is not even at the inquest. The Ministry of Community, Family and Children's Services has chosen not to seek standing. So they're not there participating, asking questions, bringing forward witnesses and trying to get a handle on how this could happen in Ontario, how a pregnant woman on Ontario Works in this province could die, and not to diminish in any way the circumstances that surround that and need to be looked at.

The government has chosen very clearly not to hold themselves out there as responsible, in any way, shape or form for the very tragic conditions that poor people find themselves having to live in in this province as we move into the 21st century now. The Kimberly Rogers example is one very obvious, public and tragic example where the government made changes that turned poor people into criminals. On one day you could collect family benefits and collect a student loan and go to school, and the next day, because of a change in regulation by this government, if you did that you're considered a criminal. You're hauled before the criminal court and, if you're found to be in contravention or to have done fraud—

Hon Jim Flaherty (Minister of Enterprise, Opportunity and Innovation): How much consultation did you do on the social contract?

Mr Martin: We did consultation on the social contract, Mr Flaherty, until after the long weekend in August that summer, if you want to talk about consultation. What consultation did you do on welfare? What consultation did you do on Kimberly Rogers? What consultation did you do around the tragic death of Dudley George? What consultation did you do around the tragic deaths that happened in Walkerton and the changes that you made in the Ministry of the Environment? What consultation did you do on those and what was the result of that, Minister? Talk about being responsible and accountable: what consultation have you done on this budget that we're time-allocating through here today? What consultation did you do with the workers of this province around the provisions in this act which will see employees lose any surplus that would arrive in their pension packages?

Those are the questions you need to ask the minister here today yapping across the way, Mr Right-Wing himself, Mr Alliance Ontario himself, as he tries to ram that kind of an agenda down the throats of the people of this province. Tell that to the family of Kimberly Rogers. Tell that to the family of Dudley George.

Hon Frank Klees (Minister of Tourism and Recreation): On a point of order, Speaker: As you so often stand up here and remind, whoever the Speaker is in the Chair, that the member opposite is far off topic, is saying nothing about the bill before him, I would ask you to bring him to order to get him back on track.

The Acting Speaker (Mr Raminder Gill): That is not a point of order. The member for Sault Ste Marie, please continue.

Mr Martin: The minister obviously has forgotten that this is a time allocation motion and we can say whatever we want here this afternoon. But I will focus on this bill and I have been focusing on this bill. I've been talking about the lack of consultation that is going to happen on this bill as we move forward in this place in this so-called democracy, as the Alliance Party across the way drives its agenda down the throats of the people of this province, as economies across the province, in the north and rural Ontario, go down the toilet, as people lose their lives and their livelihood, and as none of us knows any more what we can count on from government by way of public service, whether it's education or health care or social services.

This government has missed opportunity after opportunity over the last seven years to make the kind of investments in this province that would serve us into the future. They have systematically and irresponsibly chosen, time after time, to ignore the fact that there was a good economy out there. When you have a good economy out there, you need to be taking some of that money and shoring up and investing in those things that you know you will need when the economy goes into a dip, as it has at the moment. It will be there then to serve you when you need to put money into and look after the services that we've all come to agree collectively are necessary if we're going to continue to lead in the way that we do the economic growth in this country and, I dare say, across North America.

Alas, that's not the intention of this government; that's not their approach; that's not what they choose to do. So here we are this afternoon, yet one more time, debating an allocation motion on a budget bill, a bill that will have serious and significant impact on the people of this province, and yet there is nothing in it, absolutely nothing in it, to respond to or give answer to any of the major dilemmas that we see out there.

Before I was so rudely interrupted by the Minister of Innovation, if you can imagine, Mr Alliance himself, Mr Flaherty, I was going to talk about the very real impact of this government on the lives of the Kimberly Rogers family now, the lives of Dudley George's family now and the lives of all those people in Walkerton who are no longer with us, and what it is that they are going to do to make sure that that never happens again, and that in fact the communities out there that need the money to make sure that those tragedies don't happen are able to, in some way, generate it.

As we speak there are literally hundreds of people on the streets of this, the richest city in the country, sleeping on the sidewalks at night. As the winter comes at us and as the weather continues to get cold there will be significant numbers of them who will not be with us in the spring of next year because they will die, because they don't have the services and the support of this government.

The first thing this government did, the first missed opportunity this government participated in when they got to be government in 1995, was to cut by 21.6% the income of the very poorest of our citizens and to tell them that they should be satisfied with that, not recognizing that when you give money to poor people, that money is spent almost immediately in the cash registers of every small business in the communities in which they live—a tremendously direct and important and positive economic stimulus to a local economy, particularly in a community where perhaps there are some difficulties and some adjustments that need to be made. This government didn't consider that. They wanted a victim.

When they came to power in 1995, they walked in like the bully does into the schoolyard. They looked around for the weakest and the smallest and the most vulnerable and then beat the crap out of them, just to set the tone. Believe me, it was a tone that took hold in this province—intimidation and bullying and direct action by this government that has affected the lives of literally millions of citizens and their families across the province. Did they take advantage—

Mr John Hastings (Etobicoke North): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I refer to certain phraseology made by the member opposite in his discussion. The specific word, if you didn't hear it, was "crap." I'm just wondering if that word is OK in parliamentary language here. If it is, then let's start using it and a lot of other words associated with it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr David Christopherson): I didn't hear the phrase—

Interjections.

The Acting Speaker: Are we done? I do apologize for not hearing every word that was said, but if there was something unparliamentary said, I would offer the member an opportunity to withdraw it. Then we'll see where we are at this point.

Mr Martin: In my view there was nothing unparliamentary said and I have nothing to apologize for, Mr Speaker. Every word that I said of criticism of this government is well earned, and will be said over and over again in the little time that we have left here in this place before we go to election, probably in the spring of next year.

Now that I've covered that gamut and talked about the missed opportunity that this government has bestowed on us for the last seven years, seven years of missed opportunity—and that is nowhere more obvious than in northern Ontario, where this government has ridden the crest of a very exciting and positive economic upswing, as we said here, mostly driven by the good economy in the US and across the world. In doing that, in simply riding that wave and not understanding the underpinnings and the weakness in it which is now beginning to show as we see the Enrons and the WorldComs of the world begin to collapse and crumble in front of us, they turned their backs on that part of the economy that has served this province so well over so many years and is so central to anything positive and exciting happening in the part of the province that I live in and represent in this place, and that's northern Ontario.

Northern Ontario has not in any significant way benefited from any of the economic stimulus or good times that have happened in southern Ontario for two reasons: leaders of industry have chosen to focus on some of the more exciting and new sort of e-commerce and virtual economic opportunities that are out there in the technological world of computers, and have not been interested in developing the resource-based economy, not been interested in adding value to and working with us who live in northern Ontario to restructure that economy so that it continues to serve us in the way we know it has to if we're going to have a solid and firmly based economy, a confident and stable economy moving forward into the next 10 and 20 years.

We've suffered. We've experienced a recession in the north—and, I would suggest, probably in good parts of rural Ontario as well—which has not kept up with some of the growth that has happened in some of the larger urban areas in the province. Not only that, we've had a government here that not only didn't pay attention to some of the things that were going on but contributed in a significant way to the negative turn of events in northern Ontario by decisions it made to reduce the size of government, downsize departments in different ministries and get rid of vehicles that were put in place over many years by governments of different stripes to make sure the very cyclical economy that happens out there in big parts of the province becomes less cyclical and more stable, so that more confidence could be generated in those who choose to invest in those parts of the province.

I did a little analysis of that reality over the last few months, so that I might understand it and then share that with the good folks out there. Just by way of example, so that people understand what I'm talking about in terms of negative growth, there isn't a community in northern Ontario that hasn't lost significant population since the census done in 1996, a year after these folks took office, until the year 2001. That's probably the clearest and most obvious evidence that there's something wrong in that part of the province and with the economy of that part of the province.

The other thing that indicates there's a problem up there is job stats. This government is more than happy to get up from time to time and take the latest stats that come out that indicate there have been more jobs created. They never factor in the fact that with those jobs created there were probably twice as many that went out of existence. Let me just tell you, here's a piece that came out in May 2002 that indicates that since March 2001 more than 14,700 jobs have been lost from the north-eastern Ontario labour force, a decrease of almost 6% according to Human Resources Development Canada. It says that March was the eighth consecutive month of job losses in the area. A total of about 3,400 of those jobs were full-time positions. So, contrary to the public relations spin you'll get from across the way in terms of the creation of new jobs and the increase in job opportunities, that is not the case. At least it's very clearly not the case in northern Ontario.

Let me talk a little bit about the northern Ontario economy and what I say has in fact happened and what's contributed to that decrease. It's assumed that the northern Ontario economy is reliant on resource and public sector activities. This can be confirmed by anybody who wants to do an analysis of the census—where people work and what they do for a living in the north. Using Statistics Canada definitions, the resource sector is defined as fishing and trapping industries, logging and forestry industries, mining—which includes milling—quarrying and oil wells. Resource-related manufacturing is not included in this definition. Using Statistics Canada definitions, the public sector, which is the other sector that's so important—there are two engines that drive the economy of northern Ontario: the resource-based Industrial sector and the public sector. The public sector is defined as government service industries, educational service industries, and health and social service Industries—and it's noted that in this analysis, "public sector" is not broken down by level of government; we're not doing federal, provincial and municipal. There has been an overall decline or cutback in government services at whatever level you look at over the last six or seven years. It seems that governments at the different levels have caught a similar malady.

The GDP associated with these sectors is measured in inflation-adjusted 1992 dollars. When I give you the figures I'm going to give you here, you also have to know that the tax breaks which have been given have been factored in as well, so they're not included. GDP associated with these sectors began at $47,249,100,000 in 1984, peaking in 1995 at $55,771,100,000. Since then, it has fallen to $53,929,400,000. This represents a cumulative drop of 3.3% in the GDP in these sectors in northern Ontario. The average annual rate of growth between 1984 and 1991 was 2.1%. It fell to an average annual growth rate of 0.5% between 1992 and 1995.

Now, this is what's interesting, because this is when this government was in charge: between 1996 and 1999, the GDP fell by an average annual rate of 0.8%. So under the watch and management and economic guidance of this government, the GDP of northern Ontario and those two sectors fell by an average annual rate of 0.8%. The average annual rate of growth for the rest of the economy was 2.9% between 1984 and 1991, 3.1% between 1992 and 1995, and 5% between 1996 and 1999.

This government wasn't able to translate that growth in the economy of the urban centres of this province to an overall positive effect for the rest of the province, something that other governments were always able to accomplish by taking leadership, by developing vehicles to work with the people of those areas of northern Ontario to readjust, restructure or rebuild their economy and by providing resources to communities, individuals, businesses and groups to either keep themselves alive, develop new product lines or invest in new companies altogether.

So the message in all this is that the northern Ontario economy has been hit by a one-two economic punch since 1995. First, the resource sector of the economy has been in recession. Second, the public sector has undergone a major retraction. The result? While the rest of the economy has boomed with the US economy, increasing by an average of 5% per year, the sectors most important to the northern Ontario economy have undergone a recession largely created by this government because of its lack of attention to the resource-based economic sector and its cutback in public or government resources to actually give leadership and affect the economic viability of those communities.

Let me just tell you briefly in the few minutes I have left, because I want to leave some time for my colleague from Niagara Centre to speak on this, that some of the vehicles this government actually removed or changed the mandate of, which were so central and important to stabilizing the northern economy, to creating some confidence in the northern economy that would attract investment, vehicles like the Ministry of Northern Development and Mines, which has become a shell of its former self—if you talk to anybody either working in it or working with it, they'll tell you that it has been gutted. Hundreds of people have gone out of that ministry, offices have been closed across the breadth of northern Ontario, and there with it has gone any ability or potential that ministry might have to give the kind of leadership that we came to expect and enjoy in the 1970s, 1980s and into the mid-1990s.

They have reduced the involvement of the Ministry of Natural Resources in northern Ontario so that it's not there any more to work with not only the natural resources industries, but the added-value companies that set up shop in the north over a period of time, so that a whole lot of them now are either struggling, in trouble or looking at moving on. I think we only have to look right now at this very point in time at what's happening in Sturgeon Falls and what's happening up in Kirkland Lake to understand what I'm talking about here.

They did away with the Northern Ontario Development Corp, a lending institution in the north that was close to the ground, knew the players in the communities of northern Ontario and could sit down with people and say, "OK, what makes sense here?" I have to tell you, the banks have choked off the north for quite some time now. They don't see it as a good place to put their money. They will invest some limited amounts but not the kind of money that we need to really fire up the economy and keep it going.

So the government, in its wisdom, put in place the Northern Ontario Development Corp, that was sort of the banking institution of last resort. You could sit down with those folks because you shopped with them on the weekend at the corner store or you met them in the mall or you went to church with them on Sunday and said, "Listen, I've got a really good idea here of how we might expand or change my business to take advantage of some new things that are coming," or "I know of a new opportunity over there that, if we only had a bit of money to invest in, would create some economic activity and develop some jobs for some people." And they would sit down with you and say, "OK, well, let's work on that," and they would help you through the good times and the bad times, cut you some slack on some of your loan commitment when you needed it and then go back to you when you were doing well to make up for that in the good times. So there was a good relationship, there was good communication, there was good leadership and there was good resource there. But that's gone now. They've done away with that. It's a vehicle that no longer exists in northern Ontario to help the northern Ontario economy, and I suggest to you that's why we've experienced over the last seven or eight years in the north, contrary to what's been happening in some of the bigger urban centres, this very significant and important recession that has gone on.

The northern Ontario heritage fund is another fund that was set up to work with communities, non-profit and profit organizations in the north to help in times of difficulty, to take advantage of new opportunities that might present, to bring partnerships together, to work in a million different ways creatively to try to stabilize and create some confidence in the northern economy, to work with big tourist attraction destination opportunities, like Searchmont and Mount Antoine. Alas, Mount Antoine no longer exists in the north. You can advertise and market as much as you want to people to come to an area for tourism, but if you're not supporting and keeping healthy those things that people will do and come to see, then you ask yourself, "Why bother?" because they'll come and they'll be disappointed and they'll go home again.

We almost lost Searchmont, but through the efforts of myself and municipal council and some other volunteer interests in Sault Ste Marie, we were able to keep that enterprise alive long enough such that now a very exciting and new entrepreneur has come in from Chicago and bought it and has hired very, very good staff and a new manager to run the place and we're looking forward to a very exciting winter this year. But no thanks to this government; no thanks to any leadership or resource from this government. If it was up to this government, it wouldn't be running; it would be out of business. There would be no ski hill. That's the kind of thing I think we have to take a serious look at. I think this government has reneged on its responsibility, has not been accountable or done the right thing on behalf of the people it was elected to serve.

I suggest to you that if the recession that is happening in the north isn't nipped in the bud, if there isn't some leadership given or some turn of events—maybe a new government that all of a sudden finds they have interest in the north to go up there and invest some resources, bring back some of those vehicles and work with the north again—the sickness that has taken hold out there will work its way into the heart and core of the province.

We know this province has, for a long time, grown its economy and enjoyed a good economy because we had those resources; because we had people who were willing to work in northern Ontario and harvest, manage and be good stewards of those resources. If we turn our backs on that, I believe we do everybody a disservice in this province and we diminish our capacity to be a world player in the economy that now has become global out there.

Any of the trade agreements you've seen happen, however supportive or not of them any of us have been in this place, indicate very clearly what other people see and want out of this part of the continent. They're our resources. We have to find ways to manage them that are sustainable, understand the interaction between the various sectors of our ecosystem, add value and provide opportunity for all of us, whether it's in northern or southern Ontario, to have jobs that speak of an ability to look after ourselves and our families, that speak of quality of life, dignity and all of those things.

It's when we do that, when we see the community of Ontario in its fullness and we recognize the contribution government can make to be sure all parts of the province are clicking on all cylinders, that we will then have the money required to make sure institutions that will be so important in all of that as well—the underpinning to all of that, such as education, health care, social services, hydroelectricity, as we've seen debated here in the House over the last few weeks—and most importantly, because I believe it's the heart and soul of any good and civil community, we will have an ability to look after those amongst us who are vulnerable and at risk. Government has no more fundamental responsibility than that. There is absolutely nothing here in this bill that we debate tonight by way of time allocation that speaks to any of that whatsoever.

Mr Ted Chudleigh (Halton): I rise to speak today on the merits of this bill, and to express some concern and sadness at the need to time-allocate it. This is a significant bill. It affects a number of different acts, I think 27, by someone's comment across the floor. It would be very nice if we had seven, eight or nine days to debate this bill. That could have been done. It could have easily been done.

You know, we had bills like Bill 148, an emergency preparedness act, something that we all agreed to and easily could have made comment on, spoken on and passed in one day. We could have sent it to a committee, taken it around the province and talked to it in committee. We could have done lots of things, but it only required one day of House time. That would have left three days on that bill that could have been applied to Bill 198 very easily.

Again, there was Bill 149, the extended red light camera pilot project bill, a bill to extend the testing process for red lights. Again, that act is going to take four days: three days of debate and one day of time allocation. It's something that everybody in this House is going to vote in favour of; in fact, when it comes up for a vote, probably there will not be a division on it. It will just be a voice vote. It will be passed. So on 149 there are four days, three extra days that we could have used for debating significant pieces of legislation like Bill 198 that we're time-allocating today.

It could have been used to debate Bill 180, which is the consumers' act, another fairly significant piece of legislation.

There is Bill 131, the Interjurisdictional Support Orders Act, a very simple piece of legislation. Again, it could have been discussed for a day. It could have had a number of days of committee time. But no; it was chewed up in the House and it was used for three days of debate, and again it will need a day of time allocation before it receives second reading.

Finally, there was Bill 191, An Act to amend the Highway Traffic Act; again, a bill that we all agree to and that we could have done in one day. We could have had a number of days in committee to discuss it, to see whether or not it could have been made a better bill. But no. Again, it requires four days of House because there is no co-operation whatsoever from the opposition on any of these bills.

That's too bad, because bills like 198 could have used that extra time.

Mr Dominic Agostino (Hamilton East): We'll try to be more co-operative from now on.

Mr Chudleigh: Of course, the member from Brampton or Hamilton Mountain or someplace out there is yapping away. He thinks they're doing exactly the right thing by obstructing the House in moving this thing through.

Mr Agostino: Hamilton East.

Mr Chudleigh: Hamilton East; I'm sorry. However, it's a sad day, I think, when the co-operation in this House doesn't allow for debate on significant pieces of legislation as opposed to wasting the time of this House on the four bills I have mentioned that could have easily been passed in one day as opposed to taking three days and an extra day for time allocation.

This proposed legislation on which we are considering time allocation today has a large part of it that will provide consumer protection, and it involves measures that will benefit every investor and every taxpayer in the province. Our government remains committed to putting sound policies in place that ensure the protection of consumers in Ontario.

Mr George Smitherman (Toronto Centre-Rosedale): Talk about the pensions.

Mr Chudleigh: I will talk about pensioners a little later in my speech.

This fall, we are continuing to move forward with important measures to protect consumers, particularly consumers who are investing in stocks and bonds in Ontario: measures to promote public confidence and to protect the province's auto insurance system as well as measures that will address the pension funds and pension fund surpluses in Ontario. I want to take a few minutes to talk to each of these measures in more detail, starting with those measures that will protect Ontario's investors.

While Ontario has sound fundamentals in place, there is apprehension out there. Events like September 11 last year and, more recently, accounting scandals in the US are taking a toll on investor confidence. People have real concerns about the future, about the state of the economy, about their retirement savings plans and money, and in many cases about their jobs in the future. We recognize those concerns and we are acting to waylay as many of those fears as it is possible to do.

In order to have a strong economy that can produce growth and prosperity, we need strong capital markets. Strong capital markets need investors who have sound information so that they can make informed investment decisions. The markets are just about to close, but a lot of those people are making sound investment decisions today, as the markets have some very, very solid gains. I understand that over 1.2 billion shares traded today on the New York Stock Exchange. That's getting very close to a record, and the exchange is up significantly. I think that's good news for North America. To put in perspective 1.2 billion shares traded in a day, on Black Monday in October 1929, I believe there were 29 million shares traded. So it's a far broader cross-section in today's economy that are trading in shares in our society, and it's incumbent on any government that has the responsibility to ensure that people who are trading in those markets have confidence that those markets are being run properly and openly and in ways that people can understand.

Investors put their trust in markets where ethical corporate governance is the rule, not the exception, and where there are meaningful penalties for those who violate security laws. We are moving forward with measures that address these issues. Our measures recognize that Ontario investors already have certain advantages because of our regulatory environment. Other stock markets don't have the same kind of regulatory environment that the Toronto Stock Exchange has, and that's a very powerful thing for a province to have—a stock market that we look out for, that we're responsible for and that has the confidence of consumers to invest in.

For example, our public companies are required to tell their investors right away about material changes in their affairs. But just because we have not had an Enron happen here doesn't mean we should pat ourselves on the back and relax. That's what this piece of legislation is all about. There is more to do. When the people of Ontario put their hard-earned money into a mutual fund or stock, they're going to build a better future for their families. They need to know that the government has set and will enforce high standards so that we can make informed choices and invest with that confidence we all need. They need to know that they can trust that corporations and government will ensure transparency and accountability. "Transparency" and "accountability" are two very important words.

Recently, we introduced measures to ensure the system is fair and more transparent. If this bill is passed, our measures will include new powers for the Ontario Securities Commission to impose fines for security violations and order that offenders give up the profits they attained from those violations. So not only are we going to increase the fines up into the millions of dollars, but we're also going to force those people to give up the ill-gotten profits that they made through those transactions.

Increased court fines and prison terms for security offences will make Ontario's system the toughest in Canada. Maximum court fines would increase to $5 million from $1 million currently. Maximum prison terms would go up to five years less a day from the current two years, where it is today. We will provide clearer definitions of offences such as securities fraud and market manipulation and making false and misleading statements. We will also be introducing broader rights for investors to sue if companies make misleading or false statements or fail to give full and timely information. The Ontario Securities Commission will also get new rule-making powers to hold CEOs and their chief financial officers accountable for the accuracy of their financial statements and to mandate the functions and responsibilities of audited committees of public companies.

We're also proposing reforms to Ontario's public accounting regulation to ensure tough standards that are internationally respected and reflect the high expectation of the business community, investors and our trading partners. This is an ongoing process. Our commitment is to implement a made-in-Ontario solution that works best for our province.

Another commitment announced by our government in the 2002 Ontario budget to protect consumers is the effort to improve the automobile insurance system. Throughout North America, and indeed throughout the world, for that matter, insurance premiums are rising due to factors such as rising health care costs. Since our election in 1995, we have moved forward with important reforms to improve the automobile insurance industry. Numerous consultations have been held with health care professionals, the auto insurance industry, lawyers, designated assessment centres etc. These consultations have gone well and were completed in October 2002, although we continue to meet with individuals in this area. In fact, I met yesterday with a few of those individuals.

We're now ready to implement reforms based on input from both consumers and the automobile insurance industry. With the measures included in Bill 198, we are now implementing an action plan that focuses on three key areas: first, more support for innocent victims in automobile accidents—we will improve the delivery of treatment and people's rights to sue for those benefits; second, consumer protection—we want to ensure that consumers get credible information and their interests are protected; third, keeping the industry competitive—we are taking steps to ensure the industry is competitive so that consumers have real choices available to them when they opt for automobile insurance.

I'm sure you all agree that these are important objectives. We have received sound advice and we must move forward with measures to keep insurance premiums competitive while providing support for consumers.

The measures we proposed and which must be approved by this Legislature will include measures to expand the rights of injured people to sue at-fault drivers for health care expenses in excess of no-fault insurance benefits. This might apply to people who have unfortunately lost a leg or an arm, particularly if they're of a young age. Quite often when they're of a young age and they grow rapidly, the prosthesis they get, the false leg they get, doesn't fit for a long period time. These are very expensive appendages and when they have to be replaced, quite often they run through their insurance money very quickly.

This legislation will allow them to sue so that they can obtain those kinds of things they need for the rest of their life, as opposed to just a few short years after the tragic accident.

It will also improve service to accident victims by ensuring speedier access to medical treatment through the introduction of treatment guidelines in the regulation for specific injuries without the need for prior approval. Quite often, when soft-tissue injuries occur, people need to have that treatment start very soon, as it cuts down on the time that treatments will have to continue to be applied.

There will be other steps as well, including measures to increase consumer awareness by requiring insurance agents to disclose which companies they represent. This matches the current requirement for insurance brokers.

We're also moving forward with measures to ensure the auto industry remains competitive by controlling costs through the elimination of double-dipping. Double-dipping happens when injured victims who win court awards for loss of income also receive money from other sources for that same disability. Situations like this add costs to the system for everyone who pays premiums or taxes.

Our aim is to further protect the consumer. We are presenting a balanced package of reforms that address many of the concerns we heard throughout our consultations.

Another issue we are addressing right now to further protect consumers is pension surplus reforms. The pension community of pension administrators, plan members, pensioners and employers has expressed concern about the lack of certainty in the rules governing the distribution of surpluses.

They were reacting to recent court cases that questioned the effectiveness of the current surplus distribution system and have made it difficult for many employers to negotiate surplus sharing agreements with their employee members and pensioners, and also the legal uncertainty regarding the rule governing partial pension plan windups pending resolution of the Monsanto case. We are moving to protect the pension benefits of all current and former employees by protecting the long-term viability of pension plans and their surpluses.

Nothing in this legislation affects the earned benefits of pension plan members or retirees. The purpose of this legislation is to provide more flexibility on how employees, employers and plan members negotiate surplus sharing agreements, which have been severely restricted by recent court cases.

On partial windups, the purpose of the legislation is to provide clarity. Until 1998, when the Monsanto case started, employers were not required to pay out surplus on a partial plan windup. The amendments will restore the law to what was understood prior to 1998 and clarify the continuing rights of members affected by partial plan windups.

1600

In most cases of surplus withdrawals, surplus will be shared by employers, plan members and pensioners. That sharing agreement will be voted on by the current retirees, of whom you need a two-thirds majority to accept the plan. It will be voted on by the current employees of the company, and you'll need a two-thirds majority of those people before you could agree to a plan. When two thirds of the employees and two thirds of the retired people agree to the process of a surplus windup, I've got to believe that the system isn't going to be hurting them very much. I think they're going to benefit from it, because no one would vote in favour of it if they weren't going to be benefiting from it.

In limited cases, employees will be allowed to make application for all the surplus when their employer is clearly entitled to the surplus based on existing plan agreements and other documents. The amendments add the right to employees to make similar applications for a full plan windup.

A consultation paper was released on June 18, 2001. Almost 80 submissions were received from unions, members, pensioners, employers, lawyers and actuaries. The submissions served as the basis for discussion in August 2002. Representative stakeholders such as pensioners, plan members and employers participated in the informal discussions we announced in the budget last spring. They expressed positive feedback on the modified proposals. Reforms to the Pension Benefits Act will remove uncertainty and clarify the rules that apply, enhancing security for remaining plan members. They will make Ontario law consistent with that of many of the other provinces.

I urge all members of this House to support Bill 198. It is our made-in-Ontario approach to protecting the people who live, work and raise their families in this great province. Bill 198 represents our commitment to those who have invested their future in our province to protect investors, to protect automobile owners and to protect pension plan contributors and retirees.

The Acting Speaker: The floor is now open for further debate.

Interjections.

Mr Smitherman: It's from Jim Flaherty.

I want to start by saying, especially to people who are watching from home, if only it were so. If only it were so that the laudatory things the previous member said about the pension stuff in particular were accurate, that would be great. But it isn't.

Today in the Legislature we did a fairly effective job of highlighting the extent to which an admittedly complex subject is just a little too complex for our Minister of Finance.

Mr Chudleigh: On a point of order, Mr Speaker: The member said I wasn't accurate in my remarks, and he accused me of reading my speech—I was very careful. It's interesting that when you're on this side of the House, you have the responsibility to be accurate; therefore, you have to refer to notes. When you're in opposition, you don't have that same responsibility. I take exception to the fact that he referred to me as being inaccurate.

Interjections.

The Acting Speaker: Order. Your own member made a point of order. I'd like to rule on it.

I gave him a little latitude to make his point, because actually I think it was a point of personal privilege as opposed to a point of order. I don't think it's one I can uphold to the point where I will order the member who has the floor to do anything, but I wanted to give you a chance to make that point, and I've done that. Now I'm going to ask the government benches to please come to order and allow the member to resume his debate.

You now have the floor, sir.

Mr Smitherman: I'll withdraw, because I could have chosen a better word. My point was that a debate on this matter is interpretive, and his interpretation doesn't jibe with mine. I hope that's clear.

In the scrums that occurred—

Interjection.

Mr Smitherman: Well, nothing could be clear to the member for London, because he doesn't get much around here.

After question period, the Minister of Finance snuck outside the door and admitted in the scum that she found the whole matter confusing. I think that was an honest statement. But I wonder, in the instance where a piece of legislation—this is not some modest little piece of legislation. This is 146 pages, dealing with I think 25 different statutes. This could be 10 pieces of significant legislation.

I found it a little bit astonishing that the previous speaker used most of his time to comment on the fact that it sure was sad, disappointing really, that we couldn't just all get along a little better and move forward in a way that would allow us to have more time to debate this bill.

I have seen some pretty lame excuses for the need to push a piece of legislation forward, but the real truth of the matter is that the members on that side of the House, and the government in particular, feel the need to seize the moment by using closure to ram through this bill because there is a storm brewing in Ontario, and the storm that's brewing in Ontario is from the hundreds of thousands of pensioners who are having their future pensions put at risk.

The minister did a job today to underscore that her bottom line was the viability of pensions; meaning that any money that was to be paid out would be paid out when the requirement was there. Of course we all agree; that's apple pie. But the issue she doesn't want to discuss, that none of them on that side of the House wants to discuss, is that employees, not just employers, make significant contributions to surpluses.

We had a case today with National Trust. We had a guy here today who is the chair of an organization called AFTER, which is something like between 3,600 and 4,000 former employees of National Trust who no longer work there, so they're part of a partial windup of a pension. That pension plan at the moment has a surplus of $160 million. But here's an interesting fact: the company, National Trust, now owned by Scotiabank, or the Bank of Nova Scotia, has not contributed to the pension plan in almost 20 years.

When I heard that, to me, that was a pretty startling thing. The piece of legislation that this government is jamming through the House—unprecedented, I think for a budget bill—builds on the premise that all surpluses are employer surpluses, that they're the creators of those things. And the bill does some other pretty sad stuff too.

I am joined here today by the member from York Centre, who in 1988 served as the Minister of Financial Institutions in this province. At that time, as some people would be aware, Conrad Black, a noted supporter of that party, tried to rob about 40 million bucks out of a pension plan at Dominion. There are people out there who look for opportunities to buy companies for the asset base, which is the pension plan, and Conrad Black is that kind of rapacious character who wouldn't let the circumstances of a few people get in his way. The government acted in such a way so as to ensure that in the future that wouldn't happen.

What we have before us is a piece of legislation that makes Ontario the only jurisdiction in North America that encourages or allows a company to stake a claim on a surplus in an ongoing pension fund. That's not for a company that's gone bankrupt or where employees have been laid off; that's an ongoing pension fund. If the pension funds of our hydro companies, the various successor corporations of the old Ontario Hydro, are in surplus, the government can now make application to the superintendent to scoop that money—the only jurisdiction in North America that allows that. How can the government rationalize this while in the next breath they say, "Our responsibilities are being fulfilled because we're working hard to restore investor confidence"? How can you be restoring investor confidence when you're sending out a legislative incentive or inducement to corporations, when they have in their hot little hand an actuarial study—and that's no fine science—that says, "This pension fund is in surplus." We now have corporate raiders who will be lined up at the gates of the superintendent of financial institutions seeking to take the surplus off the top.

This happens in the same paragraph where they talk about the volatility of the markets in the post-Enron environment, where we're seeing these massive ups and even more massive downs on certain stocks which have impacted the investment income of pension funds. So at the very same time that we're dealing with that, the government is sending an incentive to corporations to take this money away from those who contributed to it. I think that's reprehensible, the reason that we're forced to be here today instead of continuing to hear from more members about this issue, instead dealing with a time allocation motion, closure, a device by the way that in the Peterson and Rae governments was used sparingly and is second nature for these guys.

They talk about how hard they work and stuff, but you know, if the choice were ever put to the opposition parties, "Would you prefer to sit a little more and have an opportunity for meaningful public participation and debate?" on matters as significant as this one that deals with pensions, on the Ontario Securities Commission, auto insurance, all kinds—oh, and of course the government's backtracking on its tax cuts, which they don't want to mention—but instead we're forced to have reduced to just a few hours, something like six hours of debate in the Ontario Legislature on the government's budget bill, which amends 25 statutes in a very significant way. This is astonishing.

It shouldn't surprise us, though, because the pension portion of this bill demonstrates the extent to which these guys—the ultimate power, using their majority to hammer home because government bills are perfect bills—in their legislation have moved forward in a way so as to say to pensioners and to employee groups, "You can't go to the courts any more. We rescinded that right." Today they heckled in the Legislature and they said, "Well, this is all about the amount of money that lawyers spend, blah, blah, blah." Do you know what? I know a lot of people who spend money on lawyers in search of justice, but these guys have eliminated that path because it's not expedient enough for them.

I got a letter faxed to me the other day from CARP, Canada's association for the fifty-plus, an open letter to the Ontario government:

"Re: Bill 198—A Licence to Steal" Strong language.

"The Ontario government's Bill 198 gives corporations a licence to steal from pensioners.... Buried in this omnibus bill is the right for corporations to take over the full surplus of partially wound up pension plans," and, unfortunately, of ongoing pension plans as well, to make it even more problematic.

This is a clause under the heading "Conflict" that I want to read into the record. I call this the Ecker hammer; she brings that down with quite considerable force: "Subsection (5) prevails over the pension plan, over the terms of any document governing the pension fund and over any statute or other rule of law." It is that the government reserves for itself and the cabinet in the making of regulations to determine exactly what happens in these instances; no more transparency and no avenues in the courts to seek justice where you feel that you have not been given a just decision. If this bill passes, I hope that some of the groups that are affected by this will challenge the constitutionality of this in the courts. They won't like it over there because that's the courts, and lawyers cost money and all that, but in search of justice, it's an appropriate way to go forward.

The minister today spent an awful lot of time hiding behind this document, Surplus Distribution from Defined Benefit Pension Plans, a consultation paper. She talked about that consultation paper. She must have mentioned it 15 times. Then in the scrum she mentioned it about 15 more times. She didn't tell you one thing, though. She didn't tell you that the consultation paper didn't include any suggestion, reference, hint, glimpse whatsoever of the true intentions of the government's bill—not one mention of retroactivity that says, "We're going back to 1988—the ghost of Conrad Black." No mention that regulations passed in the secrecy of cabinet can overrule documents, statutes, or rule of law. That's not in this discussion paper, nor is there any mention of removing the right of appeal to the courts. That's not in this discussion paper.

Then she said, "We had more than 80 different people present to us," but when the man who represents 4,000 impacted former employees of National Trust sought to have a minute of her time, she high-tailed it. She got out of there. I didn't know she could move so fast. She wanted nothing to do with that gentleman; suggested that maybe she could arrange a meeting a little bit later. Well, this afternoon the House is given the last few minutes, the last few precious minutes of opportunity to highlight just how awful this bill is. She'll meet with him after she has passed the legislation that takes away his rights. She'll meet with him after. After what, I wonder?

We talk a lot about Conrad Black. I, for one, celebrate the fact that he has found a place where he's more content, but I never thought that after the public outcry in 1988 when this man sought to grab surplus pension funds, the government of today would decide that now is the right time to bring in the Conrad Black clause, an incentive to rob the surplus pension funds from ongoing pensions.

On that note, I will sit down and I will say only that when I vote against this time allocation measure, this closure measure, and when I vote against this bill, it will come to pass as one of the most memorable things that's happened to me in my three and a half years here. This is a bad bill. It hasn't had proper input. The government's manner in dealing with this is a real example to Ontarians of the way that they operate, fundamentally undemocratic and arrogant to such an extraordinary fault that I look forward to the day when we can restore in this chamber, and to democracy in Ontario, meaningful debate and public hearings which they are afraid to have.

Mr Gilles Bisson (Timmins-James Bay): I want to use the opportunity to put on the record a couple of issues that my colleague just before Mr Smitherman raised. I think what to me is one of the biggest issues in this bill is what this government is doing by way of trying to give employers a gift. That gift is that they are going to be able to take pension holidays and they are going to be able to take surpluses out of pension plans unilaterally, without the approval of people who have worked hard in order to earn the contributions of those plans.

Tonight I was supposed to be in Kapuskasing. I was going to attend a event that's in my riding, an event that happens all over Ontario, where workers get together in order to celebrate the successes of their endeavours in the plant when it comes to health and safety measures. Today we were going to be giving an award, as we did last night in Timmins. Tonight in Kapuskasing some lucky worker was going to get an award and I was going to be there to present.

Unfortunately, I am not there tonight, and the reason I'm not there is very simple: I think this debate is far too important to allow to go by—when a government has come in, by way of closure—the stripping of people's pension plans. So no, I won't be in Kapuskasing tonight, but I'm going to be here this afternoon. Why? Because what this government is attempting to do, by and large, I think, is tantamount to basically the bad old days of Conrad Black. We got into this situation why? Because Conrad Black, back in 1988, said, "I'm going to go in and I'm going to strip those pension surpluses out of the pension of the Dominion store employees." As a result, workers who had worked hard and long for that employer in order to build up some pension protection were stripped away of some of their pension protection because Conrad Black said, "I want to go in and take the surplus out of the pension plan."

Let's explain to people in this assembly, if they don't know exactly what we're talking about: employees in this province, for a number of years, have negotiated with their employers the ability to have a pension plan in their workplace. Now, it is the view of the New Democratic Party of Ontario that if it's the employer that pays 100% of the contributions in the pension plan, or they only pay 50% of the contributions in the pension plan, that is money that does not belong to employers. It's money that belongs to employees. Why? Because, quite simply put, those negotiated dollars in the pension plan are dollars that are basically in lieu of wages they would have gotten in negotiations.

I sat with the United Steelworkers of America at a number of bargaining tables, and we always got into this debate. We said, "OK, the employer, we figure, is probably good, for a period of two years, for an increase of maybe 3% one year and 2% the next." And we would go to our bargaining units and we would say, "Hey, rather than going 3 and 2, why don't we go 2 and 2 and use that 1% in order to build a better pension plan?"

So we would negotiate, yes, the contributions for the employer into the pension plan, and as a result we built better pensions for workers across the province of Ontario. And whenever we had surpluses in the pension plan, such as what happened with Inco in Sudbury, the union, in my case the United Steelworkers—of which I'm proud to say I'm a member—would go to the bargaining table and try to negotiate a better pension arrangement for workers by way of the surplus inside the pension plan.

Unfortunately, in the case of Sudbury, it took almost a 10-month strike, as you well remember, in the 1970s, for workers in the Inco plant in Sudbury to negotiate what to do with those pension surpluses and how to add more money from the employer into the pension plan, because they knew, as Steelworkers, that the mine was downsizing and that we had to protect older workers and new workers coming in so that the work cycle could be short and we could protect more displaced workers by way of putting them on a pension plan. Because we had surpluses in that pension plan, those workers in Inco, as in other plants around the province, were able to negotiate for themselves a better pension.

What happened since the 1970s is, employers would, from time to time—those unscrupulous employers—go in and they would scoop out of the pension plan any surpluses that existed, or they would take a pension contribution holiday. We thought that was wrong. I give credit to the Peterson Liberals; they moved an amendment that made some changes in the pension regime that stopped the Conrad Black filtering of pensions. When we were elected under Bob Rae's government, through the NDP, we strengthened those provisions that were put in place by the Peterson Liberals and we made a very simple rule. We said, "If there are any surpluses in a plan, what the provision will be is that an employer can only apply to make a withdrawal of that pension surplus with the approval of plan members." That's what we put in place, and as a result there hasn't been any major raiding, or any raiding for that matter, of pensions in the province of Ontario since the Peterson amendment and the amendment by the Rae government.

This government comes to the House and says, "We need to, by way of Bill 198, make amendments in order to 'strengthen' pension plans for the workers of Ontario." Well, I ask a very simple question: if we haven't had a problem since 1988 or 1991, since the amendments of both the Peterson and the Rae governments, and we haven't had pilfering of pension plans by employers by way of making applications because they needed the support of plan members, because of our amendments, why in heck is the government doing this? If there isn't a problem, why are we trying to fix it? We have to ask ourselves that very simple question, and the answer to that is a very simple one. Number one: we know, as far back as a year ago—because we were lobbied by people in the pension industry—rumours were that there were people in the employer sector who were saying—what they wanted, the employers who approached Flaherty, then Minister of Finance, and said, "We want to change the scheme so that we can get our hands on pension surpluses," and they wanted the government not to renew the amendment that we had put in place when we were government, because every 10 years it comes again and they had to renew it. They were lobbying the government to stop the renewal. We did some lobbying, along with people in the pension industry. There was a leadership race going on, so the government smartly decided to renew it for one more year because they didn't want to deal with this in the middle of their selecting a new leader.

So now here we are down the road—

Mr Chudleigh: On a point of order, Mr Speaker: Mr Smitherman, speaking earlier, was incorrect in his assertion that the Minister of Finance did not meet with representatives of National Trust. In fact, the minister did meet with them—

The Acting Speaker (Mr Spina): I'm sorry, that's not a point of order.

Mr Bisson: I want to thank you for that clarification, but it wasn't a point of order, as you well know.

We know that the government had been lobbied by employers in order to get rid of that. The government didn't do it at the time because they were in the middle of selecting a new leader and they didn't want to be embarrassed, so they put it off for one year. A very simple question that we ask ourselves is, "Why is the government doing this?" We think the answer is simple: they are doing this as a sop to employers in Ontario. What's clear is that at every opportunity this government had since 1995 to sock it to workers, they did. When it came to taking away the protection for workers from scabs, this government allowed scabs across picket lines. When the government made changes to the Employment Standards Act, they basically made changes that were negative to employees in the province of Ontario. When they, along with the Liberals, refused the ability for farm workers to organize under a union, they took away that right as well. This government, at every opportunity, when they've had a chance to sock it to employees, have done so.

Now we say, should we trust the government? I think the answer is, quite frankly, no; you should not trust the government.

If people are watching this debate tonight, I urge you to do one thing. We are now on time allocation today. It's Thursday. We've had a mere three days to debate this bill, and this government's going to give the employer the opportunity to strip surpluses from pension plans and to take pension contribution holidays by way of their own decision, by making application to the pension board. There's nothing the employees will be able to do about it. If there's a decision that affects employees negatively, we employees are going to lose the ability to even go to court.

So I'm saying to people watching today, pick up your phone today, on Friday and all of next week, contact all of your MPPs, especially if they're Conservatives, give them a call and tell them, "Gilles Bisson and the NDP and others in this Legislature are saying you are not to put your hands on the pension surpluses. We want you to pull out of Bill 198 the provisions that are inside."

If the government wants to get into the idea of building a better pension regime in the province of Ontario, we, the New Democratic Party, are prepared to do that, but not in the way that you're doing it here. We believe that pensions should be totally portable. We would propose that we vest employees on day one. In this new, modern economy that we have today, where nobody works in one place long enough to build up 30 or 35 years of seniority with one employer, we should have totally portable pensions. You bring your pension with you, no matter where you work. It's our proposal that the minute you walk into the plant, there shall be automatic vesting. There should be indexing to pension plans legislated into the legislation, as was recommended back in the 1960s when we put in place pension legislation.

We believe that you should give employees the ability to control what happens on pension boards by giving them an equal number of seats on the pension boards themselves. We believe that you should create multiple employer plans, otherwise known as MEPs, so that small employers in the province could be encouraged to ensure that their employees have pension plans they can contribute to. We believe that now is the time to deal with how you build better pension legislation in this province.

So I'm saying, if the government wants to get into a debate about the pensions, we're prepared to do so. We have some very constructive ideas on how to build pensions for workers in the province of Ontario. But what is clear is, you must stop this attack on pension plans.

I know my good colleague Mr Kormos would like to say a few words on this as well, and I'll leave the rest of the time for him.

1630

The Acting Speaker (Mr David Christopherson): Further debate?

Mr Joseph Spina (Brampton Centre): I'm pleased to have this opportunity to say a few final words in favour of the time allocation for Bill 198, the Keeping the Promise for a Strong Economy Act. These are budget measures for 2002.

In reviewing this legislation, it became clear to me that this act is quite simply, we think, the best way to ensure the continued growth and prosperity of this province; and I'd like to take a few moments to explain that. It is an act with the potential to improve the lives of Ontarians in all income brackets, in all business sectors, in all regions of this province. We've already heard about some of the key initiatives included in this act, such as reducing the pressures on auto insurance rates for Ontario drivers; providing better, faster treatment for auto accident victims, including children; introducing tough new rules and penalties for malfeasance in our capital markets; providing some new financing tools for municipalities; and supporting increased investment and job creation. On top of these important initiatives, this act would help to ensure continued economic growth. As we well know, a strong and growing provincial government and economy is the key to our prosperity.

I'd like to start by talking about the current state of Ontario's economy. This economy is in much better shape than many would have predicted at this time last year, particularly in the wake of the September 11 attacks on North America. There remain some grounds for cautious optimism, however, over the next 12 months, but I think it's important that we continue to exercise prudence and frugality, because we know all too well that challenges also lie ahead.

Our government's record of reducing taxes and red tape has contributed to an environment in which business has invested, spurring economic growth and creating jobs. Of course, we know that jobs are the big story. In July 2000, the government met the Common Sense Revolution's five-year goal of creating 725,000 new jobs. The government's Blueprint promised it would help fuel the creation of 825,000 more new jobs over five more years. Well, this government is keeping its promises: employment rose by 32,300 in September alone; October saw the creation of another 20,300 net new jobs in this province; and since reaching the first target in July 2000, Ontario has created another 283,000 net new jobs.

More significantly, earlier this month we were proud to announce that job creation in Ontario since 1995 has topped the one-million mark. Since our government's first throne speech in September 1995, our province has surpassed the one-million mark, with 1,008,000 net new jobs. Ontario employment has grown by 19.6% during that time period, compared with 13.9% for the rest of Canada and 7.8% in the United States. Approximately 80% of the one million net new jobs are full-time positions. You know the old saying, "This country, Canada, goes, as does Ontario." So not only has this job growth spurred our province, but in fact it has accounted for that significant amount of job growth in this country as a whole.

Job growth has been fastest for natural and applied science occupations. They've risen by 55% or 162,000 new jobs. Likewise, jobs in business, finance and administrative occupations have grown by more than 12%, and that translates into about 123,000 new jobs.

The best news is that new jobs have not been limited to one or two sectors. Over the past seven years, job creation has been spread across most industries in Ontario. Employment in the construction industry alone has increased by 32%. Employment in the manufacturing sector has increased by 30%. Jobs in the professional, scientific and management service industries have grown by over 40%.

The demographics of job growth are equally impressive. Since 1995, women have gained 508,000 new jobs, or 51.4% of all job gains, while men have gained 479,700 of those new jobs, or 48.6%. Ontario's spectacular record of job growth since the September 1995 throne speech includes 144,400 net new jobs for young people aged 15 to 24. That makes up 15% of all jobs created in this province alone. Youth employment gains in this province have accounted also for an impressive 45% of the youth job growth in Canada. This is very significant, considering Ontario accounts for a 38% share of Canada's youth population.

Ontario's one million net new jobs account for 46.5% of the national job gain since 1995. As I said, that has driven the Canadian economy, because that is almost half the new jobs in this entire country.

Those are absolutely impressive numbers. They represent more than jobs, however. They represent new hope and new opportunities for many people. They represent growth, both personal growth for individuals who are employed and growth for those individuals' families. They represent prosperity, so that people can take a better vacation—a vacation in some cases—or even have a much happier Christmas holiday.

It's clearer now than ever before that our government has put sound fundamentals in place in Ontario and positioned our province well for the future. At the same time, we are aware that economic prosperity cannot and must not be taken for granted. Our families and our communities understand the importance of having a job.

Our government understands the importance of a strong, resilient and dynamic economy, one that can remain competitive in a changing global economy. I think we've demonstrated a very important point over this past year. We were able to create a very strong and stable economy from 1995 through 1999-2000 and into this new millennium, but when September 11 hit in 2001, it presented this province, this country and North America with a significant challenge, in fact a global economic slowdown.

This province's economy is open and trade-oriented, and therefore we were affected by the international slowdown. For the 2001 calendar year, Ontario's real GDP—gross domestic product—rose 1.5%, down from 4.6% growth in 2000. But it's important that when we are faced with a challenging year, the government continues to focus on prudent fiscal management to promote new growth and new jobs. If we did not have the stable fundamental structure that had been implemented from 1995 on through the five or six years afterwards, we would not have been able to withstand the downturn and the slowdown that occurred in the past 12 months. We would have had what some economic jurisdictions experienced, and that was net negative growth. We did not experience negative growth. Granted, we dropped from 4.6% growth to 1.5%. That clearly was less than half of what we had wanted and projected, notwithstanding the fact we could not predict an event such as happened last year.

Despite being a challenging year, this government continues to focus on this prudent fiscal management. Our government continues to focus on measures to ensure that this province can weather other challenges ahead of us. While global economic forces will always have some effect on the provincial economy, our government will continue to ensure that sound fundamentals are in place to promote growth and prosperity.

I remind the public that if the government should change in the next election, we run the risk of jeopardizing this strong economic base. You run the risk of destroying the context for the measures that we have in this bill we are debating and that we have created over the past seven years.

We have sound reason to believe that the fundamentals there were put into place by this government. They are supported by the measures contained in this proposed Keeping the Promise for a Strong Economy Act.

One of the measures included in this act is the proposal to delay certain tax cuts for a year. As you know, this proposal was first announced in the 2002 Ontario budget. Since that time we've heard a lot said, particularly by the member from Windsor—

Mr Dwight Duncan (Windsor-St Clair): West.

Mr Spina: Windsor West. I wasn't sure because Windsor is one of those upside down municipalities. In every other place in this province the river is always south of the town, and Windsor is the only place in Ontario where the river is north of the town. I remember that when I went to the University of Windsor, it took me a few months to get reoriented from Sault Ste Marie to Windsor because the river was on the wrong side of town, just like perhaps some of the members from there. But that's not a criticism; they're honourable members who represent the residents of Windsor.

Since that time we've heard a lot said, particularly by some of the members, like the member from Windsor West, about our government's supposed lack of commitment to reducing taxes. It's all hot air. We believe, we have believed and continue to believe in cutting taxes. Tax cuts have always been and always will be an integral part of our comprehensive economic policy, and that policy includes the elimination of red tape, deficit reduction on a continued basis, and greater efficiency in this government.

We have shown that our economic policy, including tax cuts, helps create jobs. Numerous studies from around the world have found that tax rates are one of the most important factors that determine economic growth and productivity.

People used to think it was only when government ploughed money into the economy in various ways that we ended up with economic growth and productivity. If the truth be known, when governments ploughed money into the economy, they had to get that money from somewhere, and where did they get it from? Increased taxes. Why should government just be a conduit to funnel money out of the pockets of the consumer and back into the pockets of business?

That's not what we believe in. We believe that the government should be the promoter of economic growth, and economic growth comes from the consumers themselves having fewer taxes and therefore greater discretionary money to be able to put it where they choose: in the bank, into a new snow blower, into a new lawn mower.

Mr Smitherman: Like user fees, Highway 407?

Mr Spina: When the member from Toronto-Centre Rosedale says user fees, I don't have a problem with that. Do you know why? If someone is a user of a service, they should pay for it. I don't agree that all the taxpayers should be subsidizing something an individual uses.

Mr Smitherman: Health services?

Mr Spina: You cannot touch health services, because health services are mandated under the Canada Health Act. You won't get user fees in health services. It has been and will continue to be funded by the provincial government.

Numerous studies from around the world, as I said, show that tax rates are one of the most important factors determining economic growth. Since 1995 our net exports have accounted for only 23% of the real GDP. The main source of growth, the other 77%, has been the domestic economy stimulated, in part, by tax cuts.

Tax cuts have boosted retail sales, increased new investments in auto plants and improved the housing market by increasing consumer confidence. Corporations are unwilling to invest in places where their workers and executives will face an exorbitant tax burden. This is unacceptable because investment is vital to creating new jobs.

We remain committed to reducing the tax burden on the people and the businesses of Ontario. That is why we are not cancelling the tax cuts, as some members from across the way have suggested. The delay proposed is in response to a temporary fiscal challenge resulting from last year's downturn. It's common sense: if you are involved in prudent fiscal management of the economy, then you must be able to make decisions to respond to the challenges that the economy presents to the government.

The delay that would be implemented by this bill affects only scheduled cuts to personal and corporate income taxes for a maximum of one year. The planned reductions to personal and corporate income taxes and the phase-in of the equity in education tax credit would recommence January 1, 2004, a tax credit that, by the way, I fully endorse, 120%. I know that's a little exaggeration, but I'm trying to drive the point home that I think the education tax credit is an excellent initiative on the part of this government.

By 2004, the additional 20% personal income tax cut committed from before will be delivered. Once fully in place, that marginal tax rate in Ontario would be the lowest among provinces for individuals who earn less than $60,000 a year. What was considered at one time a high-income bracket at $60,000, we know is no longer the case. People earning $60,000 or less are considered barely middle class and in fact are probably at the lower end of the middle-class income earning schedule. When the majority of people are earning less than $60,000, we know they are the ones who would maximize the benefit of a tax reduction, because what becomes a 20% or 30% tax break for a higher-income earner multiplies to the lower-income earner to a 30% or 40% tax reduction.

By 2006, the corporate income tax rate cuts will be fully implemented. As a result of these cuts, Ontario will have the lowest general combined corporate income tax rate of any province or US state.

Clearly, tax cuts continue to be on the province's agenda. The delay we propose is a short delay because of the short-term fiscal situation. Long-term goals remain the same. The pressure on the system is paramount in health care and in education. That is why it is important to do the trade-off in the short term. Our long-term goal remains the same. The proposed one-year delay will not impair the Ontario tax cut plan. We continue to abide by the notion that cutting personal income and business taxes leads to significant long-term productivity and growth.

We pursue the development of a new multi-year tax reduction plan, which would include the next steps toward eliminating the capital tax and Ontario's income tax surtax. We're laying the groundwork for continued tax cuts for next year and beyond.

I would caution the public that a change of government will only result in an increase in your tax rate, because they have no other way of trying to figure out how to manage the economy but to raise taxes instead of utilizing good, prudent fiscal management of the existing dollars, ensuring that the taxpayers have the excess funds for their own personal use.

I will cede the rest of the time to my colleague when he gets his turn in rotation.

Mr Duncan: In the short time I have allocated to me I want to address first of all the motion before us and the legislation that that motion affects. This is a time allocation motion on a budget bill that effects some 20 or so statutes. Significantly, this represents—let me see how many times this government has used time allocation—for the Ernie Eves government 19 bills before the House; 13 of them have had time allocation. The remaining six are still on the order paper. In fact, my colleague and friend the NDP House leader may know that we just had another time allocation motion given to us today, on Bill 191. I believe—am I right?—your party supports that bill—

Mr Peter Kormos (Niagara Centre): And we want some modest amendments.

Mr Duncan:—and our party supports the bill, and the government supports the bill. We'd like some modest hearings. I think this is the fifth or sixth time this government has used time allocation on a bill that all three parties support. It's crazy.

Now, on this bill there are significant differences of opinion. This government disagrees with itself. It's undoing its Taxpayer Protection Act. The member opposite talks a good game, but that was the centrepiece of the Harris government. The first time they get into a minor problem, they throw it out, just like they threw out their plans on hydro. Flip-flop; that's what it's all about. We have here in this House a government that can't manage its own agenda. How can they be counted on or trusted to manage the affairs of the province? We say they can't be.

They like to talk about tax cuts and how important they are. I listened to my colleague opposite talk about that, but he failed to remind the electors of this province that they are undoing their own legislation with this bill. What was the term they used? It's a short-term problem, a $1.8-billion short-term problem. One of the things they are going to do to deal with this short-term problem is sell off Hydro One to raise the cash to pay for that short-term problem—at fire sale prices, prices that this government, through its incompetence, forced. Whether you sell 1%, 49% or 100%, it's wrong to sell any of it. What you sell and when you sell it will not result in any benefit to the taxpayers, let alone electricity consumers in this province. It will simply fund your own mismanagement.

So, 19 bills, 13 time-allocated; four or five of them all three parties agreed to. They wouldn't have hearings, even on minor stuff. Of those time allocation motions prohibiting any debate at third reading—84% of them. The government House leader laughs. He has again today, just now, tabled time allocation on a bill that all three parties in this Legislature support. Why? They don't want hearings. They don't want any minor amendments. They don't want an opportunity to discuss it. We in this party have a number of members who will not have a chance to speak on the bill being closed on debate tonight. We're stopping debate.

It's a government that can't manage. It can't even manage its own House schedule. Even previous Conservative House leaders have not had to time-allocate bills where there is support from all three parties. Truly unbelievable.

I want to take the remaining time I have, however brief it is, to talk about why the government is time-allocating and about the part of Bill 198 that is most offensive, certainly to the official opposition and I know to the third party: the pension theft clauses in this bill. That's a good term, "pension theft," or the Conrad Black clause, section 79.1. Let me read it: "An employer or such other person as may be prescribed may apply under this section to the superintendent for the superintendent's consent to the payment of surplus to the employer or prescribed person out of a continuing pension plan or a pension plan being wound up in whole or in part."

That clause allows an employer to apply for a surplus without the consent of the employees or the pensioners in receipt of the pension. That represents, in our view, an opportunity for theft. That represents, in our view, this government abandoning working people in favour of their friends. What it means, make no mistake, is that employers can unilaterally access those funds in surplus in pension plans.

Today, as she has done over the last few days, the Minister of Finance disagreed with that. Fair enough; we all have differing points of view. We all have issues that should be debated. I challenge that minister and this government, if you disagree with this, send it to committee, call in experts, let us disagree, let us call our witnesses and put our cases. Did the government do that? No. Instead we are here tonight and in one hour's time the debate on this legislation will be terminated, cut off, closed, finished; no more debate, no more discussion. That is most unfortunate.

As I said, moments ago I was handed another time allocation motion that will likely be debated on Monday of next week, again on a bill that all three parties in the Legislature support. It's just absolutely crazy. We offered and negotiated to try and get some hearings on this bill tonight, Bill 198. The government wanted some trade-offs. We were prepared to talk, but instead of bringing forward another motion that would have allowed even a day's hearings on Bill 198, the budget bill, to allow the government to call its expert witnesses on its legislation about pensions, we were given time allocation with no committee hearings and no third reading votes. In one hour's time, employers in this province will have the ability to unilaterally apply for the surplus funds in a pension that we believe at the very least belong equally to employees. That is just wrong.

1700

It's sad that we are again faced with a major piece of legislation that I think you could legitimately call an omnibus bill, because it affects major legislation across a number of ministries with significant public policy consequences that we have had virtually no opportunity to debate. We're managing an agenda with, I think, 19 pieces of legislation in total since September, many of them relatively easy pieces of legislation, and we're time-allocating everything. They're using time allocation not only to stifle debate in this House, but to prevent in-depth discussion in committee where witnesses from outside can be called, where individuals with an interest admittedly in some instances can have an opportunity to have their say.

Interjection.

Mr Duncan: Yes, as my colleague from Eglinton-Lawrence says, to shut out the public, to shut out those pensioners from London Life who have been e-mailing every one of us—I've had dozens from them—to shut out the folks who were here in the gallery earlier today that have not been heard in the government's alleged discussion process.

I'll remind you that the discussion process leading up to the introduction of a bill is far different from a committee hearing, where both the government and the opposition—and the public—can have an opportunity to look at specific wording around complicated legislation that has obvious consequence. Regardless of your opinion, whether you support what the government is doing or you oppose it, or you differ as to interpretation, we will not have the opportunity, we will not be afforded the right to seek counsel outside, which we regret and which I know that at the end of the day this government will regret.

Hon Mr Stockwell: You must regret this.

Mr Duncan: I don't regret the opportunity for you to run for mayor of Toronto or the Speaker to run for the mayor of Hamilton. I don't regret that at all. We'll see what happens with those amendments tonight. I have the utmost regard for those individuals personally and I wish them well in all their endeavours, but I do not wish this government well in its endeavour with the pension legislation—not of this magnitude, not of this import to working people throughout Ontario. So I say to my colleagues in the government, you are going to pay a heavy political price for this one.

You saw earlier today but an example of the anger that is percolating out there, and from a substantive perspective, if you had any respect for this Legislature, if you had any respect for this institution on a matter of such import, you would allow the opportunity to call witnesses; you would allow the opportunity to have your witnesses put your side and let ours put our side. And at the end of the day you vote. But no, you want to jam this through, you want to manage it; you don't want this to be discussed. Rest assured, this will be discussed. Rest assured that this issue will not die.

This issue has raised its head on a number of occasions over the years. In 1988, as my colleague from Wilson Heights, Mr Kwinter, pointed out, the existing provisions were passed by the Peterson government, provisions which in our view have served the province and both employers and employees reasonably well over that period of time. To tip the scales the way you have in this case is just wrong.

So we are faced again tonight with bill 14 out of 20 in terms of time allocation, many of which, like the one for which the new time allocation motion was put before me a few moments ago, have been supported by all three parties. It bespeaks volumes of this government's inability to manage something as simple as the House calendar. How it can possibly manage the affairs of the province? I say to the government, it is unfortunate that they've had so many bills because they've wreaked so much damage on so many aspects of this province. It is a shame, and perhaps had the government listened more carefully they wouldn't be undoing their own Taxpayer Protection Act tonight.

That's at the essence of this bill. My colleague the government House leader was eloquent in the leadership campaign when he spoke about not proceeding with tax cuts. He was eloquent.

Interjection.

Mr Duncan: Well, I guess that's a subjective comment, but I have to be nice to him. We pretend to negotiate things sometimes.

The fact is that this bill, in addition to the important and unfair thing it's doing to working people, is undoing the centrepiece of the government's own being, the Taxpayer Protection Act. My colleague from Durham, Mr Flaherty, must just be absolutely apoplectic about this bill. He's visibly upset about this bill. It's betrayed the very fundamentals which he admittedly has always steadfastly stood for. He's been consistent; he's been clear. Tony Clement, a member opposite with whom I differ dramatically on many issues, has been consistent over time. I remember in the leadership he was very concerned that any candidate for their party's leadership would advocate not proceeding with tax cuts. Well, here we have it, and it's in this bill. Yes, and he even promises cabinet posts to his friends throughout the province of Ontario, not that it'll do any of them any good at all.

On the serious matter before us, time allocation is used yet again by a government that has not been able to manage its meagre legislative agenda, on a substantive issue that ought to have the benefit of hearings so that experts on both sides can be called, so that members can have an informed debate on the specifics contained in the bill. That's sad. That's wrong.

We will oppose this time allocation motion, as we've opposed every other one. I say to the government once again, stop ripping off pensioners. Stop using time allocation the way you've used it to force closure of debate to stop the democratic process in its tracks. Let's try to work together to make this institution function the way it's intended to.

Mr John O'Toole (Durham): It's my pleasure to rise today and respond to this motion before us on Bill 198. In many respects, I'm going to try and put some information on the record on this bill. For those listening, it's 146 pages. It really is a budget bill, with some other amendments, and of that it's half French, half English, so we know it's some 70 pages long in one language or the other.

I feel some responsibility to put on the record that as the former parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, Mr Flaherty, I acted as the person who was charged with the consultation paper that has been referred to today. The paper is called Surplus Distribution from Defined Benefit Pension Plans, and it was issued on July 18, 2001. I think it's important to put some of this information on the record.

The information here is that it was introduced on December 21, 2000. The Minister of Finance announced that a consultation would take place with "stakeholders on possible amendments to the ... Pension Benefits Act (PBA) and regulation 909 under that act (the regulation). At the same time, cabinet extended section 8 of the regulation (the surplus regulation) under the PBA for a further year"—that's been mentioned as well—"to maintain the existing surplus withdrawal provisions until the consultation...."

"Recent court decisions have limited the ability of the pension regulator, the Financial Services Commission of Ontario (FSCO) (formerly the Pension Commission of Ontario or PCO) to approve surplus applications by members on windup where the surplus regulation has been satisfied by the agreement of two thirds" of the benefit plan holders. "The government does not believe that it is feasible or appropriate to continue to extend the existing regulation as has been done in the past."

It should be clear that the member from York Centre, who spoke earlier today, was part of that decision to fail to meet a decision and make a regulation that was clear in the eyes of the pension benefit entitlement people as well as the courts.

There's no doubt that this issue is controversial to the extent that—I think this clause may help people understand why it's an adversarial situation: "Entitlement to pension surplus has historically been a difficult and complex issue. Some suggest that, as employers generally bear the risk of defined benefit pension plans becoming underfunded and must make special payments in that event, they alone should be entitled to the benefit of any surplus." The point being made here is that the employer ultimately underwrites the risk and so the employers feel they own any surplus in the event there is a surplus, because they own the liability. "Thus, it has been argued that plan members are entitled to receive only the benefits provided under" the defined benefit "plan documents." So that's the essence of why this is very adversarial.

"Others see contributions to pension plans as deferred compensation,"—this is the perspective of the employee—"paid as a consequence of actual or implied employment contract negotiations that would otherwise have been paid in another form." In other words, they've got it in their paycheque. "Pension funds are often seen by the courts as 'trusts' held solely for the benefit of plan members and former members rather than pre-funding mechanisms for benefit security, required by statute. Still others suggest that pension issues are much more complex than suggested by these positions, and surplus entitlement depends very much on the particular circumstances in each individual case." It's an actuarial nightmare.

"Prior to the enactment of the surplus regulation, entitlement to pension surplus was determined mainly by the courts"—this is really what this legislation is trying to do: remove it from the courts, where everyone spends all the money on legal consultations and the recipients, the pension beneficiaries, are left holding their empty wallets—"in numerous high-profile, 'winner take all' legal actions." This has been the case. "Most of the affected parties found this process costly, lengthy and acrimonious. "In the 1990s"—as has been mentioned earlier—"subsequent to the enactment of the surplus regulation, negotiated surplus sharing agreements between employers, plan members and former members reduced disputes over surplus distribution. While some employers and employees disagreed with a number of specific details of the surplus distribution rules, there appears to have been general acceptance that negotiated surplus sharing agreements were an improvement over the previous regime." This government clearly tried to take steps to improve and clarify the existing infrastructure of this whole very complex area.

"Indeed, since the introduction of the surplus regulation, several other Canadian jurisdictions, including the federal government, have legislated surplus sharing" agreements "as an alternative to (or in place of) providing entitlements under pension plan documents. FSCO," the Financial Services Commission of Ontario, "has experienced a significant increase in the number of surplus applications compared to the period before the surplus regulation was enacted" by the Liberal government.

"However, the existing surplus distribution provisions lack clarity and are in some ways impractical. In addition, a lack of certainty with respect to surplus entitlement may encourage minimum funding by plan sponsors" so that they won't have a surplus. A number of plans today are in fact in arrears or deficit. "The government proposes to amend the" Pension Benefits Act "so that surplus distribution can be carried out in a fair, equitable and predictable manner. The proposals in this discussion paper are designed to balance the interests of the affected parties and to address a number of concerns about the current surplus regime. They would amend the" Pension Benefits Act "with respect to winding up and continuing plans, in particular to provide legal certainty.

"The discussion set out in this paper provides a possible direction for reform. The government is interested in the views of all stakeholders and will carefully consider all submissions before deciding on a course of action. Several questions have been included to facilitate the consultation and to solicit submissions from interested stakeholders in the pension community."

This clearly is the preamble to the document that has been before the public, and I can assure you, as the parliamentary assistant at that time, that I did meet with many, many stakeholders. I want to put on the record that it has been stated in the past that no one met with the National Trust stakeholder group. This is simply not true. I met with Stuart Galbraith. I met with other members of a group which was referred to as AFTER, which is the Association for the Equitable Recovery of the National Trust pension plan. I also met with others, including the former professors' association at the University of Toronto, as well as the Society of Engineering Professionals, which represents many of the people working for OPG today.

I want to put on the record that I have met with a number of people in my riding on this issue, including Al Davidson, who is the Ontario Power Generation civil engineer and is a member of the Society of Engineering Professionals. I met with Earl Cooper. I've had correspondence from other people, as well as Tim Calhoun from the firefighters' association, Brian Gooder of the Society of Professional Engineers, Doug Cooper from National Trust, Ken Lavine, Robert Moreau from National Trust, Nancy Dares from National Trust, Ian Jones from the power workers, Carol and Calvin Yake, Stella Leclair, Robert Richard, and the list goes on. All I'm trying to set out here is that there has been access and indeed I did report to the minister with respect to our observations.

I believe it's important to also put on the record other background on this very, very important issue. Before I go any further into providing some of the document in the debate that was held, it's my understanding that our Minister of Finance, in her statement of today and indeed last week—that no employee or former employee should be disadvantaged by this legislation nor, for that matter, any employer. We will respect existing contracts. Indeed, this is a mechanism to make sure that surplus considerations, either by employer, employer groups or former employees, will be given every fair consideration. The different plans and contracts between employers and employees represent a very unique contract relationship between employer and employee. In many cases, if they're represented by a union, they clearly are always trying to receive more entitlements; in fact, some would say earlier entitlements.

When introduced in 1991, the surplus regulation was intended as a temporary measure, as I said before. They also suggest that the surplus rules in the Pension Benefits Act were inconsistent. In my view, this is why we are still dealing with this today, ever since 1988.

The recent decision of the Ontario Divisional Court in Kent et al v Tecsyn, a decision released on May 26, 2000, concluded that employers may only withdraw surplus from pension plans in circumstances where both the withdrawal is expressly provided in the plan documents and the requisite consent of plan members and former members is obtained. This is a very important part of what's in this legislation. Since many plans do not contain text clearly entitling employers to withdraw surplus, the Tecsyn decision is likely to prevent both surplus withdrawals by employers and surplus-sharing arrangements, as we've seen in many sectors—in OMERS, the Ontario municipal employees retirement savings plan; HOOP, which is the hospital plan; as well as the other plans that have had what I consider contribution holidays. Contribution holidays really meant that the employer, whether it's public sector, and employee, which would be the employees of the public sector organization, were exempt from contribution. Meanwhile, they were drawing down on the attributed surplus, when it really could be argued that some part of it, at least, belonged to those who were retired or were referred to as the former employees of those organizations. They may not have been consulted in this arrangement where they've been exempt from a contribution plan.

Surplus distribution from continuing plans has always presented problems, given that surplus is notional until windup. That's when you get into the actuarial nightmare part of this, because you have to figure out the number of employees, their average age, where they were on the pay scale, what their percentage of contribution was, if there was a contribution—a very complex actuarial challenge.

I'm going to raise a couple of the questions that were in the discussion document which I believe are important. These proposals are available in this document. I'm clear that I'm still listening to the input on this. A couple of the questions that I think need to be before us on the record here: when a surplus is distributed to plan beneficiaries in the form of cash, should the Pension Benefits Act be amended to require employers to apportion surpluses amongst the beneficiaries in proportion to the liabilities associated with the beneficiaries? There are a number of questions that are raised in here, and these questions are substantively responded to in Bill 198, which we're discussing.

Bill 198, under part XXV—and it really starts on page 83 of the bill—deals with many sections and many variations on the theme. I was surprised earlier to hear one of the members from the other side whom I have some respect for, the member from Scarborough-Agincourt—add nothing to the debate, I think, clarifying this long-standing, complex arrangement of surpluses within pensions. For the record, it's anyone's guess from one day to the next what the market will do; ie, the surplus is predicated on how well the market will perform. No one, to my knowledge, knows with certainty what the market will do. So I come back to the initial premise that the person with the risk or the liability, in most cases the employer, has a responsibility to manage the fund and the liability of the fund. The employees should, in the defined benefit plan—and there is a difference between plans—be entitled to the benefit. Former employees, when they sign their retirement papers, recognize that there are entitlements which they worked there many years to provide.

In conclusion, I think that it's important to put on the record the important sections of this bill that I refer to as paramount to be understood. It's in section 79: "Application for payment of surplus to affected individuals, on a full windup." Subsection 79(1) reads, "This section applies if a pension plan is being wound up, but not if the pension plan is being wound up only in part." There are several conditions that must be met, one of which is, "On an application under this section, the superintendent shall not consent to the payment of the surplus unless the superintendent is satisfied that the following circumstances exist"; that is,

"1. The pension plan has a surplus, as determined in accordance with the prescribed criteria.

"2. The affected individuals are entitled to the surplus, as their entitlement is determined with reference to the prescribed documents"; that's the pension plan agreement.

That section I believe is absolutely paramount. We clarify for those listening today. I am on the record as saying there is no risk to those members, current or former, in a pension plan in the language in this bill. The other sides are clearly misguided and clearly misinstructing the people of Ontario. I can tell you that our Minister of Finance stands behind employers and employees and the future security of pensions in this province.

Mr Gerard Kennedy (Parkdale-High Park): It is my pleasure to be one of the few members of this Legislature, thanks to this fraidy-cat government, that gets to actually speak to this bill. Incredible—we have a group of people over there afraid to govern, afraid to talk about their initiatives. They want to bundle them in a big pile in an omnibus bill like this and they are afraid to have open debate and discussion. If they're not afraid, break the bill up; let's have the hearings people are asking for, if you're so confident of what you're crafting today. This is embarrassing for this government: slinking around, having no guts to put this stuff forward in a way that the public of Ontario can actually see what they're up to.

It is a pleasure, a limited pleasure, to be able to speak to this bill, one this government would deny to most members of this House because they're afraid. And they have good reason to be afraid, because this is another one of those sloppy exercises by this government, another tucking in of some of the messes that they are creating.

Interjection.

Mr Kennedy: We have a member across making noise, picked up probably by the microphone of the member from Durham. This is the member, in fact, who's getting his hand slapped today, slightly—very slightly. The member opposite brought in a tax credit, people will remember, for private schools. Today, in this bill, the government that thought they were confident about this—Mr Speaker, you may be aware that 32 US states put this on the ballot. They voted—

Interjections.

The Acting Speaker: Sorry to interrupt. Take your seat, please. Order. Members of the House, please allow the member the opportunity to speak. All afternoon speakers have been given their chance. I'm asking you to respect his opportunity and his right to speak. The member will continue.

Mr Kennedy: Thank you, Mr Speaker. I treasure it even more because it's the few minutes we get to discuss this bill and to look at what this government is doing. They have this initiative and it's about granting tax—it's paying people to take their kids out of public school and into private school. This was put on the ballot by more courageous governments, right-wing and left-wing, in the United States than this one. It's afraid to have public debate on it. In those states, every one of 32 states, it was defeated. That's what happens to many of the measures this government puts forward in this cowardly fashion, such as the bill we have in front of us. When the people know about it, when the light of day shines on it, it disappears. But that's not what this government is doing.

Interjections.

The Acting Speaker: Take your seat, please. I don't want to have to get up again. Every one of you on the government side has taken turns, after I have asked you to come to order, one after another. I realize you don't like what's being said, but he has a right to say it. I appreciate the apology, but if it continues, I will have people removed. The member may continue.

Mr Kennedy: Even as that rumble of discontent over there occurs, it makes the point: they don't want this to be heard. They don't want people to acknowledge and recognize—what is this government really doing with this bill? One of the things they are doing is they're readying themselves to pretend at the time of the election that they actually listen to or have any regard for the interests of the people of this province. One of those slick ways that is in this bill is that they're going to postpone one instalment of the private school tax credit. That's what they're going to do. So you had the member opposite propose this—and it's the only place in North America that actually pays people to leave public school, go into private school, and get public dollars to do it, tax dollars. Each of these members opposite is proud of that fact. For high-end private schools—they try to hide behind schools that aren't, but they know that 60% of the beneficiaries of that are actually secular people in schools. They like to hide behind it and say it's some of the religious groups that in fact already have something of a tax credit. But here they are, with their tail between their legs, actually putting this aside, trying to tidy up a little bit ahead of an election.

What's really happening out there is that next year people will fill in their income tax forms and claim $70 million or $100 million of this eventual $500-million diversion of public dollars into private schools. That's what this government really stands for.

It's an interesting thing to watch the members opposite when they don't have the guts, when they've lost their determination, when they've lost any conviction whatsoever for what they particularly think they stood for. That's what we're seeing instead, this weaseling kind of motion that this bill represents to us today—postpone that tax credit, don't have it in front of people who might want to debate it, might want to discuss it at the time of the election; pretend it's not happening. Well, it is happening and it's having a deleterious effect: a 54% increase in private school enrolment under this government. That's their legacy—200 private schools opened under this government; 440 public schools closed under this government. The member is still clapping because 440 public schools being shut down is something that they want.

This pause in the constitution of the Conservative party, as they lose their nerve, is nowhere near sufficient to protect the public interest. So just as we see the members today, in their splendid timidity, here to support the closure motion of this particular discussion, so too the bill lacks that backbone.

Also, there are these champions of private enterprise opposite saying they don't have to be accountable any more for their decision. They made choices. They decided that instead of adequately funding the schools of this province, they'd give some of that money away.

They decided also that they would lower corporate taxes, large corporate taxes in this province, from a position where we're competitive. In fact we are significantly below, five basis points, 12% below the 10 US states we compete with right now, today, in fact before this was implemented, before the first instalment of this happened. Does this mean they've rethought it, that the $2.2 billion they want to hand out to large corporations is something that they're giving pause to, that they're giving sober consideration to? No, it doesn't. It is pure, unadulterated political expediency that in the year of the election they'll postpone the second instalment. They will still take that money away from the things that are necessary, in the public interest in this province. That $2.2 billion is needed in education. It's needed in health care.

I'll tell you that this party, given the opportunity, will cancel that tax credit and cancel that tax reduction because we have made choices as well. We have made ones that are consistent with the public interest.

A number of speakers today have brought up what is on the concern list of a lot of people in this province, people in my constituency, people like Lori Bremner, for example, on Brookside Avenue, who is an employee and member of the pension plan of the Power Workers' Union. As our member for Toronto Centre-Rosedale, George Smitherman, has very effectively pointed out, this bill has some other less than stalwart initiatives by this government not having the guts to put it forward for what it really is. What have we heard from the government in response to the concerns of people like Ms Bremner? Have we heard: "We'll look at that. We'll carve out this bill. We'll put it into hearings," as my colleague has asked? If they would actually not be afraid of that, they would not be inflicting a bill that very good analysis shows will change the pension rights in this province and will give employers access to pensions that were earned properly by workers. In fact, you will have heard earlier that in the case of National Trust, we understand there's $160 million at stake, 3,600 former employees, and the company hasn't contributed to this plan since 1980. Yet this bill would enable them some access to that.

There is a simple way for this government to proceed if it has integrity. I mean "integrity" in the sense of a government that sees itself carrying out the public interest, short of ideological detours and beholden to private interests. This government could elect that route. Instead we're here today in this desultory remaining time that we have to discuss a bill of importance that touches on pensions, on private school tax credits, on corporate taxes; in fact, it probably touches, in one way or another, everyone who lives in this province.

When a government loses its nerve, loses its resolve, loses its contact with the public interest, it does these kinds of things, and we see that here today. They've bundled together in a fairly cowardly fashion a huge bunch of measures, none of which they have the courage to debate on their merits independently, and certainly none of which they have the courage to take out to the public and actually listen to the people who are affected.

I don't know what happens to these gentlemen on Friday. This Legislature, this House sits four days of the week. I know most members are in their constituency offices. I assume that they bar the doors, because that's the only way they can conduct themselves in the face of bills like this. When people reasonably ask them, as their elected officials, "What are you doing about my part of the public interest? What about my pension? Will you at least sit down and talk to me? Will you at least sit down and hold hearings?" the members opposite must be out for coffee an awfully long time because I can't imagine they have any good answers to the people who are there.

As our member for Toronto Centre-Rosedale has very strongly pointed out, they hide behind a consultation paper that talks about surplus distribution with defined pension benefit plans. There is no mention in that consultation about retroactivity. There is nothing about regulations overruling documents, statutes or rule of law and no mention about removing the right to appeal to the courts. None of that is in there.

With those substantive differences—

Interjections.

The Acting Speaker: Stop the clock. Please take your seat. The Minister of Enterprise and the member for Durham, there are two minutes and 48 seconds remaining in this speech. If either of you says one word, you're leaving.

The member will please continue.

Mr Kennedy: The member for Whitby-Ajax and the member for Durham are pleased with this bill. It makes them happy that they can trammel the rights of their constituents and of people around the province, because the majority in this House, despite outward appearances, rests on their enthusiastic co-operation.

As we mentioned before, the member for Whitby-Ajax engineered a number of the measures that are now being pushed back in this bill, and so did the Premier. The Premier, if I understand correctly, initiated the corporate tax cut. Again, the public of Ontario may hear about this bill in the flash that it goes through House and believe that maybe there was some second thought on the part of the government, but there isn't. There is just this obvious cleverness, this obvious slickness that the government is putting forward in this particular bill to try and set itself up for the election, to present itself for something that it patently is not. The various measures of this bill all speak to a certain lack of basic care for the public interest.

When we heard from this government before, even those who disagreed with it would at one time have said that when you heard something from this government, it may have had some conviction behind it. They wrapped that up in a bill called the Taxpayer Protection Act at one point and said, "No matter what happens, you can depend on the member from Brampton to deal with taxes. They won't be increased under his watch." The members here have said, these courageous ministers on the front bench, the member for Whitby-Ajax said, "I will take a pay cut before I go against this act to balance the budget," and so did a number of the other people here. We saw them beat their breasts around the province. But at the first sign of trouble, the first sign of something that would require real governance, real custody of the public interest, they ran for the hills. And that's what this bill is. This is the abandonment bill. This is a government meekly, tiredly, cowardly trying to run away from some of the things—at least far enough, it hopes, that they won't be held against them at the time of the election.

The Taxpayer Protection Act I think is something that a lot of people out there haven't looked into in a lot of detail, but they thought they knew one thing about this government: that they would deal with some of the financial and deficit issues. Instead, they do whatever is politically expedient for them.

There was an incarnation of this particular government that used to name bills. Certainly the name for this bill is Political Expediency Squared. This is not the salvation, it's the salvaging of the electoral chances of the Tory party. I hate to disabuse the members opposite of their hopes and wishes for this bill, but even if their majority gets to pass it, it's not in the interests of the public of Ontario and it's not going to stand when we're in government.

Mr Kormos: Thank you kindly. As it is, I'll be the last and final speaker on this bill, bar none. There won't be any third reading debate of the bill. There won't be any committee hearings around the bill. Part of me is surprised, but then part of me, of course, can't be surprised because this government has abolished third reading.

This government has abolished third reading as a process that bills historically—and I'm not talking about 10, 20, 30 years—over the course of centuries have gone through in terms of passage, and for good reason.

This government has abolished committee hearings. When we do have committee hearings they're 30 minutes long, they're shut down at 4 pm by virtue of the time allocation motion that's passed, and the committee hearings that are offered up by this government are designed solely by virtue of being merely 30 minutes long so that the government can present amendments to fix up mistakes that it made during the course of drafting its own legislation.

It's even during the debate around this time allocation motion that the government serves yet another notice of motion, this time relating to Bill 191—it's already been referenced by speakers in this chamber—a bill that all three parties support and all three parties have spoken on enthusiastically. New Democrats, when they spoke to it, supporting it in principle, expressed a strong interest in making Bill 191 a far more effective bill than what it is as written.

It's been the suggestion around the debate on Bill 191 that committee hearings—and they needn't be lengthy with respect to Bill 191—would be useful in terms of doing some amendments to make that bill—Bill 191 is the bill that's designed to protect police officers and, we would hope, other emergency and security personnel who have their lights flashing on the side of highways.

This government seems not to understand, and perhaps never did, and if it did it's long forgotten, that the government, especially majority government, has some responsibility to the Parliament and surely to the people of Ontario to ensure that a bill is proceeded with in a way that's proper, in a way that's fair, and in a way that's just.

Make no mistake about it: this government has complete control over whether or not a bill goes to committee. By virtue of its time allocation motion, the one we are addressing today, the one that's in the order book, time allocation motion 64, this government specifically chose not only to eliminate any further debate on second reading—and it did that at the first possible opportunity pursuant to the standing orders—but to deny this bill any consideration in public hearings. Again, let's make it quite clear that by virtue of the time allocation motion the government could have made those public hearings as long or as brief as they wanted. Never mind half an hour, not one minute.

This government knows full well that there is incredible concern out there by workers throughout this province about the impact of the amendments to the Pension Benefits Act. Those amendments have been addressed in this House, albeit briefly, during the course of question period and the modest amount of time allocated—because the minimum amount of time has been permitted for debate around this bill—the barest of minimums.

This bill has some dire and serious consequences for workers in every corner of this province, working women and men who work hard and, yes, who make significant contributions to their pension plans. As you know, we are of the strong, firm view that every penny in a workers' pension plan belongs to those workers—every penny. Yet this bill, so typical of this government, bowing to their corporate bosses, following the marching orders from the corporate capos, will open the door wide open to pension surplus raiding. Don't suggest for the briefest of moments that corporations wouldn't try it, because they've done it when they could, and now they can again. Workers are being ripped off, robbed, and this government, in Bill 198, has legalized that thievery.

Clearly, this government has many good reasons not to want this bill to go to committee. There are any number of readers and analysts of this legislation, lawyers—competent and capable ones included—who indicate that there is no doubt about the amendments to the Pension Benefits Act contained in Bill 198. Never mind the crimes this bill will enable to be committed by virtue of the theft of workers' pension funds, this bill is a crime in and of itself. I shouldn't be overly surprised, because I recall over the course of the last several weeks having conversations with insiders in the auto insurance industry, because the bill of course contains yet another package of reductions in injured persons' benefits in the context of automobile insurance. What I recall now and found uncanny when they told it to me is that those same insiders, the ones who claimed to have been a part of the process of consultation with the government, because Lord knows the government consulted the auto insurance industry—another industry giving its marching orders, reflected in this bill, the amendments to the Insurance Act.

They told me there would be no public hearings. As recently as three or three and a half weeks ago, those same insiders were telling me not to worry, the bill was going to become law before Christmas, and not to get myself geared up for public hearings, as I might have been inclined to in the past, because there won't be public hearings. They knew. This time allocation motion isn't an accident, it isn't a gesture of frustration on the part of the government; it has been part of the plan from day one.

Somebody from this government gave assurances to the auto insurance industry that they weren't going to have to worry about defending the new reduced no-fault, especially medical, rehab benefits for injured persons. They weren't going to have to worry about preparing for committee hearings, because this bill wasn't going to go to committee. They received that assurance.

That's beyond repugnant; it's shameful. This government will seek to blame the opposition every step of the way, but at the end of the day, let's make no mistake about it: it's the government that decides whether or not bills get debated properly, because they have access to time allocation motions after but three mere afternoons, usually no more than six hours of debate. That means that no more than a handful of opposition party members get to speak to the bill. Government members tend not to speak to it, most of them because they haven't read the legislation; the rest who have read it, because they can't justify it or defend it and they're embarrassed by it. They don't want to speak to it. But I tell you, opposition members in this chamber know what their responsibilities are and tend to fulfill those responsibilities. This government is doing its best to show its disdain and contempt for the opposition and for this Parliament.

The Acting Speaker: The time for debate has expired. I am now going to put the question.

Mr Stockwell has moved government notice of motion number 64. Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion carry?

All those in favour will please indicate by saying "aye."

All those opposed will please indicate by saying "nay."

In my opinion, the ayes have it.

Call in the members. This will be a 10-minute bell.

The division bells rang from 1745 to 1755.

The Acting Speaker: Will the members please take their seats. Order, please. How long is this going to take? We'll wait until you're done.

Those members in favour of the motion will please indicate by rising one at a time and be recognized by the Clerk.

ADJOURNMENT DEBATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr David Christopherson): Pursuant to standing order 37, the question that this House do now adjourn is deemed to have been made. The member for York-South Weston has given his dissatisfaction with the answer to a question given yesterday on adult education by the Premier. The member for York-South Weston now has up to five minutes to debate this matter.

EDUCATION FUNDING

Mr Joseph Cordiano (York South-Weston): I'm happy to speak to this, but I'm disappointed that the Premier isn't here to respond because I challenged him personally to respond to the question I put to him in the House. This is a very important issue we raised and I think it deserves serious attention.

The fact is, the supervisor appointed by the Premier, this government, to deal with the Toronto school board budget has decided to make cuts in the order of $90 million. As a result, adult day schools in the city of Toronto will be cut. They'll be consolidating seven schools to five schools. That means York Adult Day School in my riding is going to be shut down. It's slated to close in June 2003, and the Maplewood school in Scarborough as well. These closures will result in the loss of 2,800 adult day school spaces.

The fact of the matter is, there are currently waiting lists for the other adult education centres. These people have nowhere to go. It's inconceivable to me that this government would cut these programs at a time when we're dealing with a knowledge-based economy where people need to acquire additional skills to succeed in the workplace. They need to do that. They need basic high school diplomas. By the way, these adult learners usually get their diplomas within one year, so they do this rather quickly. This is the best investment we could make.

But you know what's interesting is that this government has cut the amount of funding to enrolment in adult day schools. In 1994-95, it used to be that 102,000 adult day spaces were operational. Guess what the number was in the year 1999-2000? It went down to 39,000 spaces right across the province. That's a reduction of 61%—enormous. We're not talking about small amounts here. We're talking about a huge cut in adult learning, and we cannot afford to have that in Ontario. Our economy depends on people having the highest level of skill and the greatest amount of education. If we're going to compete with other jurisdictions, we need these people to be better educated.

The Acting Speaker: All those members opposed to the motion will please rise one at a time and be recognized by the Clerk.

What has happened in Toronto? In 1994-96, total enrolment was 16,000 in the city of Toronto. Enrolment has decreased as of 1999 to 3,300 spaces—a huge drop again.

What's interesting as well is that the funding level has decreased. Pre-1996 per adult funding was $7,000; currently it is $2,200. Obviously school boards are having a hard time creating these spaces and so they've cut back. They're being forced to cut back as a result of the per-student funding. It's been reduced drastically.

This is directly as a result of this government's failure to fund grants properly. There's no other way to put it, because it's very clear that this government does not believe in adult education and ongoing education. It doesn't believe it's an integral part of a knowledge-based economy. It doesn't believe these students should have an opportunity to complete their education as adults. It has not properly funded, and what it's doing to the city of Toronto is cutting more than it ever has.

Frankly, the Premier denied that $2 billion has been cut from education. When you take per capita student funding in 1995 compared to the year 2002, per capita spending has gone down. The amount is $2 billion. It's per student spending we're talking about. In terms of taking the entire enrolment and the amount of funding that was there for education, it's gone down. There's no denying it. It's a $2-billion loss and we're seeing the effects of that in adult education, and this government ought to be ashamed of that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr David Christopherson): The Premier's parliamentary assistant now also has up to five minutes to respond.

Mr Garfield Dunlop (Simcoe North): It's my pleasure to respond to the late show request by the member for York South-Weston.

Our government recognizes the importance of lifelong learning, including the upgrading of work-related skills. That is why the student-focused funding provides support to a broad range of services for adult learners, including adult literacy and English-as-a-second-language programs.

Under student-focused funding, adult education is funded through the continuing education and other programs grant. Of course, if you're used to the pie chart or how we detail the student-focused funding formula, that's one of the key pieces of that pie. This grant supports the provision of adult day school programs and continuing education programs such as adult English as a second language, adult French as a second language, an adult native language, an adult credit for diploma, and a correspondence and self-study diploma as well.

For the 2002-03 school year, the continuing education and other programs grant is projected at $141 million. According to the student-focused funding models, the Toronto District School Board is projected to receive roughly $33 million of this amount. So when all of the provincial money is spent on that, of the $141 million, the Toronto board gets $33 million. That's consistent with almost all the programs operated by the government.

Funding for adult and continuing education students is at the rate of $2,294 per average daily enrolment. This figure reflects the board's cost to offer an education program to an adult learner. Again, that is consistent with the percentage across the province with other boards.

To help boards manage their budgets for the 2002-03 year, the government is allocating almost $490 million in flexible funding, which can be used to address local priorities such as adult education programs. Of course, that is at the discretion of the local board, and the Toronto board had the opportunity to do that as well. The Toronto District School Board's flexible funding amount is almost $55 million.

With regard to possible program closures, it is important to note that the school boards develop and implement policies that reflect local priorities and focus on student needs. It is the responsibility of the school boards to allocate resources to each program and in each school according to their local priorities. Once a board's budget is set, it becomes the duty of the principal to set the schools' budgets and to organize the schools according to the board's policies and the schools' priorities.

Our government is increasing funding for Ontario's public schools by almost $400 million for the 2002-03 school year. That's more than a $360-million increase that we announced last year. With this increased investment in Ontario's students, our government's total spending on public education climbs from $13.86 billion in the 2001-02 year to $14.26 billion for 2002-03. Funding will increase by 2.9% over last year, while enrolment is projected to increase by only 0.4%. In fact, while more than half of our school boards may see a drop in the number of students, almost all boards will receive an increase in funding.

The Toronto District School Board's funding for 2002-03 is projected at—get this—$1.98 billion, an increase of 2.68%, while enrolment at the board is increasing by only 0.56%.

Our education recognizes that simply increasing funding does not guarantee our students will receive a quality education. Increases in funding should be directed in a way that gives students the maximum benefit, and that's money in the classroom. That is why we created the Education Equality Task Force to help us identify how to allocate the funding where it will do the most good for our students, and of course we all know that is right in the classroom. Once the government has reviewed the recommendations of the task force, we will be in a better position to set future directions for student-focused funding. I think we all agree it has to be tweaked and massaged a little bit to make it perfect for different boards across the province.

I appreciate this opportunity and I appreciate speaking on behalf of the Premier tonight.

Mr Cordiano: On a point of order, Mr Speaker: Can I register my dissatisfaction with that answer?

The Acting Speaker: No, you can't. There is no point of order. Sit down.

As a matter of fact, there being no further matters to debate, I deem the motion to adjourn to have been carried. Therefore, this House stands adjourned until 6:45 this evening.

The House adjourned at 1811.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Monday 25 November 2002

ASSEMBLÉE LÉGISLATIVE DE L'ONTARIO

Lundi 25 novembre 2002

The House met at 1330.

Prayers.

MEMBERS' STATEMENTS

HIGHWAY 69

Mr Rick Bartolucci (Sudbury): Words cannot express the depth of my pride in the people of greater Sudbury and northeastern Ontario, whose concerted effort in recent months has prompted the provincial government to finally act on the multi-laning of Highway 69.

What got us to where we are today? Well, it was the 14,000 people who signed the postcard, the 28,000 people who signed the petition, the 7,645 people who signed the electronic petition and the well in excess of 11,000 people who signed the bumper sticker and put it on their cars. It was our media in Sudbury, it was the Northern Life, it was our radio stations and our television station who kept the issue alive, who believed in the issue and promoted it almost on a daily basis. Last but not least, it was the CRASH 69 committee, the committee made up of our community. "CRASH 69" stands for "community rallying against substandard Highway 69." We came together as a group from business, labour, service clubs, education, health care and, tragically, from those who lost loved ones. The result: well, the government made the announcement.

But you know what? The announcement is good, but rhetoric must be reality. The promise must translate itself into pavement. I say today that the community of Sudbury, the community of northeastern Ontario, will be very vigilant to ensure that that announcement becomes reality.

I say to the people of my community, my constituents, that a lot of people will want to take credit for it, but the reality is that there is only one group that should be taking credit: the constituents of the ridings of Sudbury and Nickel Belt and northeastern Ontario. I'm proud of you. We've proven that if you stay together, if you believe in a cause and if you're determined to ensure you reach your goal, you can do it.

Again, I am proud of the constituents I represent; I am proud of the people in Nickel Belt; I am proud of the people of northeastern Ontario. We came together, and certainly David slew Goliath.

ST CATHARINES COURTHOUSE

Mr Bart Maves (Niagara Falls): On Friday, November 22, I attended the dedication ceremony of the St Catharines courthouse, along with colleagues Minister David Young, Minister Tsoubouchi, Minister Hudak and St Catharines MPP Jim Bradley.

The St Catharines courthouse was officially dedicated to the late Robert S.K. Welch. Many admirers, colleagues, friends and family members, including Mr Welch's grandchildren, were in attendance to recognize Mr Welch's long record of public service.

Mr Welch was first elected to the Ontario Legislature in 1963, and during his many terms served in just about every portfolio, including Attorney General twice, education and energy. As well, Mr Welch served many years as Deputy Premier. Mr Welch had a wonderful sense of humour, and was a great orator and an extremely capable manager of each ministry he captained. He was a true leader and a great gentleman. He was indelibly connected to and had a deep and abiding respect for the law.

The idea to dedicate the courthouse to Mr Welch came from a committee that was organized by St Catharines resident Dave McDonnell.

The courthouse is located in downtown St Catharines and currently serves St Catharines, Niagara-on-the-Lake, Niagara Falls, Grimsby, Smithville and the town of Lincoln.

Future visitors to the courthouse will be able to view a commemorative plaque that will be placed in the main lobby of the courthouse.

Hundreds of people came out on Friday to honour Mr Welch and the many contributions he made to the community and the province, for which we are all forever in his debt.

AFFORDABLE HOUSING

Mr Dominic Agostino (Hamilton East): I was proud this morning to be there along with a number of colleagues as my leader, Dalton McGuinty, unveiled the Growing Strong Communities platform, the second part of the Liberal platform that will lead us into the next election and lead us to a better province for people who are in need of affordable housing.

This platform, that has been unveiled today by the leader, is going to commit $245 million to housing in Ontario. We're going to ensure there are 20,000 new units built in this province. We're going to have a shelter allowance to help 35,000 Ontario working families.

We're going to have real protection, unlike the pie-in-the-sky NDP irrelevant approach nobody believes or listens to, and unlike eight years of being abandoned by this government. Tenants, people who need affordable housing in this province, are finally going to get some help.

We're going to get rid of the Tenant Protection Act that is now in place and bring in real legislation. We're going to bring in real rent control, that is going to help people across this province—not the type of deal that this government has cut with developers, that has abandoned tenants across Ontario. We're going to restructure the Ontario Rental Housing Tribunal; we're going to establish a provincial rent bank; and we're going to establish an Ontario mortgage and housing partnership. We are going to work with the federal government; we're going to work with developers; we're going to work with tenants. Ontario is going to have housing policies that are going to be proud. People are going to have a real choice next time.

After the eight years of abandonment of tenants and people who need help from that side of the House, and the irrelevant NDP, to real choice by a real leader with Dalton McGuinty, a real policy that Ontarians are going to be proud of. We're going to walk into the next election, and walk proudly with this and help tenants across this province.

BIODIESEL FUEL

Mr John O'Toole (Durham): A week ago the Minister of Energy, the Honourable John Baird, and our new Commissioner of Alternative Energy, the Honourable Steve Gilchrist, travelled to Halton region to announce an initiative in support of energy conservation, clean energy and alternative energy sources. I can tell you, as a member of the alternative fuels committee, I know the work they've done.

The host for the day was the Halton-based company called Biox. Biox Corp is a Canadian success story. It produces an alternative to petroleum diesel fuel and it is made from vegetable oil and animal fat. The product, called biodiesel, can be used in diesel engines without modification. You don't hear the big oil companies talking about biodiesel, and here's why: biodiesel is biodegradable, it's renewable, it's non-toxic and it's essentially sulphur-free.

Biox Corp is supported by a number of contributors and alliances. Contributors include Rothsay, one of Canada's largest renderers, the Ontario Soybean Growers' Marketing Board, and Trimac Corp. In fact, Biox's innovative work takes place inside the Trimac facility at Halton region.

Congratulations to Biox, Trimac Corp and to everyone who is involved in biodiesel, in making the oil companies stand up and take notice. In this context I want to commend Biox, the Minister of Energy and our Commissioner of Alternative Energy for the work they've done and will continue to do to make our environment cleaner for all the people of Ontario.

GROWING STRONG COMMUNITIES

Mr Dave Levac (Brant): I rise in the House today to speak on the newly released Liberal policy on improving Ontario communities, called Growing Strong Communities. Liberal Leader Dalton McGuinty, in consultation with many stakeholders across Ontario, released this policy that will make sure that Ontario communities work for the people, not against the people, of Ontario.

Statistics Canada stated that Ontario has lost 2.5% of its front-line police officers since the Harris-Eves government came into power in 1995. The Ontario Liberals are committing to placing 1,000 net new front-line police officers on our streets to fight crime and keep our streets safe. Ontario's probation and parole officers have a 70% higher caseload than the national average. This is putting Ontario people's families at risk and the Ontario Liberals are going to fix it. In our first term of office, we are committed to hiring an additional 100 probation and parole officers to correct this government's abysmal record on probation and parole staffing.

I am proud to announce that the Ontario Liberals have committed to assist our firefighters by ensuring that each fire service in Ontario is equipped with a thermal imager, that allows firefighters to see into dark places for trapped victims and into burning buildings. This is a necessary tool that will enable firefighters to find victims quickly and minimize the amount of time spent in a burning building. The Ontario Liberals value the dedication and commitment of firefighters, and that is why we will do what is necessary to provide them with the best tools possible.

Ontario Liberals have a plan to repair and improve Ontario's communities by introducing Growing Strong Communities, and I am proud to be a part of that plan.

AUTISM

Mr Tony Martin (Sault Ste Marie): I rise today to let the House and the Minister of Community, Family and Children's Services know that I met on Friday with a group in my community, the Sault Ste Marie chapter of the Autism Society Ontario. They are very upset, frustrated and angry about the government's lack of support for services for that group of people. They're saying there was no funding and that the funding she announced last week was simply not enough. When you break it down across the province and look at the number of communities and the number of families and children who are in need, it's a paltry amount of money to be putting out there. They also say that continuing to stick to the age six tack is arbitrary and based on no science whatsoever.

They feel very strongly that the government has a responsibility. They say the government should listen to my colleague Shelley Martel, when she calls for autism to be moved into the health portfolio and for intervention for every child in this province diagnosed with autism to be automatically covered. They also ask the government to pay attention to the court case in British Columbia, where the government was found to be in contravention of the Human Rights Act, and indeed of the Constitution, for refusing to provide immediate and needed services to children and families suffering with autism. That court told the government very clearly that it needed to provide funding and services. As a matter of fact, it went so far as to say it would fine individual bureaucrats if that service is not delivered. Your government is on the hook here and should be listening to that court finding and delivering to those people the services that are needed.

ENVIRONICS POLL

Ms Marilyn Mushinski (Scarborough Centre): It's not my normal practice to comment on public opinion polls, but one recent sampling did manage to catch my attention. I refer to a poll that was done for the TVO program Fourth Reading by the Environics Group. The poll found that Ontarians are questioning the Liberal Party of Ontario. It showed that more people trust the PC government led by Ernie Eves than the Liberals. This got me thinking. "Why would this be?" I asked myself.

First, I suppose, are the flip-flops that have characterized the Liberal leader. One day he is for shutting down Ontario's coal-fired generators; the next, as the Globe and Mail so eloquently put it on Saturday, the Liberal clean air plan is blown out of the water. According to the Globe, Dalton was the target of ridicule by members of his own caucus.

The people of Ontario recognize how hard it was for Finance Minister Ernie Eves to manage this province's budget after the 10 lost years of Liberal and NDP governments. They recognize that this government has created an economic environment of lower taxes and balanced budgets. The result has been the creation of more than one million net new jobs since our election in 1995.

We delivered on our promises to the people of this province, and our economy is stronger as a result. The poll result, showing distrust of the Liberals, marks the recognition that people understand that Dalton's shiny, expensive promises cannot be kept without tax increases.

ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION

Mr Mike Colle (Eglinton-Lawrence): Today there was a momentous announcement by Dalton McGuinty where he basically laid out a protective plan to ensure that all the Golden Horseshoe has protection, a shield whereby lands in Seaton will be protected, the 6,600 homes will not be built in the middle of the moraine and the Oakville Trafalgar moraine lands will not be given away to developers. We will put a line in the sand and make sure developers don't pave all the GTA and the Golden Horseshoe.

This morning, Dalton said, "Save, don't pave." This government has pretended to protect, when all they've done is given away sensitive lands to developers; that's all they've done. We are saying you need public transit.

That's why we're giving two cents on every litre sold to public transit, because without public transit you can't protect the environment. We are saying that we're going to have a greater Toronto transit authority to coordinate transit throughout the GTA to make sure it's done in a comprehensive fashion. Right now this government has abandoned transit. We are saying you can't save unless you have transit, so save; don't pave.

WHITE RIBBON CAMPAIGN

Mr AL McDonald (Nipissing): Today is the official launch of the 2002 White Ribbon Campaign to stop violence against women. Since the campaign began in 1991, men have been encouraged to wear a white ribbon at this time of the year as a personal pledge to never commit, condone or remain silent about violence against women. I and our government believe that ending violence against women is everyone's responsibility, so I am pleased to support this campaign.

Men are encouraged to reflect on this important issue and to talk to their friends about the problem of violence against women. We need more men to take an active role to ensure that women can live in safety and security in our province.

The government of Ontario is committed to ending violence against women. It is a commitment that is ongoing and unwavering. This government is spending more than $160 million this year alone to address the issue of violence against women. This is more than any previous government.

The government of Ontario does not tolerate violence against women. We are taking a comprehensive approach to domestic violence that focuses on protection and prosecution, support for victims, and prevention and education.

While we've made progress on this issue, we know that more can be done. Preventing domestic violence is everyone's responsibility. We need everyone to be involved to make this a success.

Today I'm wearing a white ribbon. It is my personal pledge that I will not condone or remain silent about violence against women. To my colleagues, I urge that you make this commitment as well.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON ESTIMATES

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Standing order 62(a) provides that, "The standing committee on estimates shall present one report with respect to all of the estimates and supplementary estimates considered pursuant to standing orders 59 and 61 no later than the third Thursday in November of each calendar year."

The House not having received a report from the standing committee on estimates for certain ministries on Thursday, November 21, 2002, as required by the standing orders of this House, pursuant to standing order 62(b) the estimates before the committee of the Ministry of Training, Colleges and Universities; the Ministry of Community, Family and Children's Services; the Ministry of Natural Resources; the Ministry of Public Safety and Security; the Ministry of Tourism and Recreation; and the Ministry of Enterprise, Opportunity and Innovation are deemed to be passed by the committee and are deemed to be reported to and received by the"—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Shall the report be received and adopted? Agreed.

The bill is therefore ordered for third reading.

The Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

The minister for a short statement?

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, minister responsible for francophone affairs): This important legislation puts Ernie Eves's action plan for electricity into law. It provides a rebate of every cent more than 4.3 cents that consumers have paid for electricity back to May 1. It provides some stability on price going forward to 2006. It also includes different measures for supply and conservation.

If I could, on a personal note, I have always tried to approach these important public policy issues in a non-partisan way, and I want to thank the official opposition for treating it that way.

Mr Howard Hampton (Kenora-Rainy River): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I ask for unanimous consent for the minister to give a five-minute statement telling us about the provisions of the bill.

The Speaker: Is there unanimous consent? I'm afraid I heard some noes.

Mr Michael Bryant (St Paul's): On a point of order, Speaker: I listened closely to the statement by the minister and I ask you whether that constituted a minister's statement, for which we get five minutes to respond.

The Speaker: No, unfortunately it isn't. Members do get a little time, a short statement, and that was well within the bounds.

Mr Hampton: On a point of order, Speaker: I ask for unanimous consent for the Liberals give a five-minute statement about the bill.

MAN WHO WASN'T THERE ACT, 2002

LOI DE 2002 SUR LA PRÉSENCE
À LA PÉRIODE DE QUESTIONS ORALES
DES CHEFS D'UN PARTI RECONNU

Mr Kormos moved fist reading of the following bill:

Bill 212, An Act to amend the Executive Council Act and Legislative Assembly Act respecting an institution of democracy in the Legislative Assembly / Projet de loi 212, Loi modifiant la Loi sur le Conseil exécutif et sur l'Assemblée législative concernant une institution démocratique de l'Assemblée législative.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion carry?

All those in favour will please say "aye."

All those opposed will please say "nay."

In my opinion, the ayes have it. Carried.

The Speaker: The member for a short statement?

Mr Peter Kormos (Niagara Centre): Recently, Bill 21 received first reading in this Legislature, which has as its goal an effort to secure more regular attendance of the Premier at question period. We've made observations since November 21 that demonstrate that one official party leader has attended little more than 30% of question periods, while the other party leader has attended over 70%, even though his caucus only numbers nine.

This bill would amend the Legislative Assembly Act to ensure attendance of party leaders in the same manner as Bill 21 would require attendance of government leaders.

The short title of the act is the Man Who Wasn't There Act, 2002, although it has become known readily and rapidly as the Dalton, we hardly knew ye Act.

Mr George Smitherman (Toronto Centre-Rosedale): Mr Speaker, on a point of order: I seek unanimous consent to move and pass a motion without debate removing section 25 pertaining to the Pension Benefits Act from Bill 198.

The Speaker: There is no process to do that. What you would have to do if you wanted to amend the bill is ask for unanimous consent for the House to go to committee of the whole, at which time there would be a process to do it. There wouldn't be a mechanism if that motion passed to do it, so if the member wanted to and if that was the intent, he would have to move that this House go to committee of the whole right away to deal with it.

Mr Smitherman: Thank you for that clarification, Mr Speaker. I seek unanimous consent to move that the House go into committee of the whole to deal with section 25 of the Pension Benefits Act.

Hon Chris Stockwell (Minister of the Environment, Government House Leader): Mr Speaker, on a point of order: Always in an effort to entertain and accommodate the members opposite—

Mr Smitherman: I don't think it's funny.

Hon Mr Stockwell: I wasn't being humorous, Mr Smitherman. If we did go into committee of the whole to do this debate and the clock did continue to run till past 3 of the clock, would we be jeopardizing question period?

The Speaker: Yes, if we did.

Is there unanimous consent? I'm afraid I heard some noes.

VISITORS

Hon Jim Wilson (Minister of Northern Development and Mines): Mr Speaker, on a point of order: I would ask members of the Legislature to join with me in welcoming 52 members of the Minesing Good Times Club. They've come here for a good time, so I would ask all members—

Applause.

Hon Mr Wilson: Since they have come for a good time, could we at least behave today, folks?

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): We welcome our special guests.

STATEMENTS BY THE MINISTRY AND RESPONSES

TEACHERS' LABOUR DISPUTE

Hon Brad Clark (Minister of Labour): As members are aware, secondary school students with the Simcoe Muskoka Catholic District School Board have been out of class since November 4. They have endured rotating strikes since October 23 and a work-to-rule campaign by their teachers since September 24.

Bargaining between the school board and the union has come to a halt, leaving no end to this dispute in sight for students. As a result, the Education Relations Commission has advised that the continuation of the current situation will place the students' school year in jeopardy. It should be obvious to all members that the time to act is now. We must ensure that these students' studies are not put at risk by a continuation of the strike. We must get them back to the classroom. That is why today I am introducing the Back to School Act (Simcoe Muskoka Catholic District School Board), 2002. This bill would get students back into the classrooms and ensure a fair settlement can be reached between the board and the union.

The government always prefers that labour disputes be resolved through the collective bargaining process. The best solution is a local solution, where the school board and the union achieve a mutually acceptable, fiscally responsible, negotiated settlement. We have given the school board and the union time to achieve such a settlement. Now the priority is to get the children's education back on track.

The bill, if passed by the Legislature, would provide a fair and balanced approach. It would get students back in their classrooms without delay. It would allow the school board and the union seven days to continue to negotiate a fair settlement or jointly agree to a mediator-arbitrator. If the school board and union are unable to reach a settlement or agree to a mediator-arbitrator within these seven days, the Minister of Labour would appoint an independent third party as mediator-arbitrator.

Until a new agreement is reached, the terms and conditions of employment would remain those that were in effect on the last day before the strike began. The mediation-arbitration process would begin within 30 days of appointment of a neutral third party, and a final award is to be made within 90 days of appointment.

The bill would also provide for maximum fines of $2,000 for individuals and $25,000 for the board or the union for non-compliance. Each day of non-compliance would be a separate offence.

We believe it would be best for the parties to reach an agreement and achieve a quick ending to their labour negotiations. We want school boards and their employees to be able to negotiate fair and reasonable contracts, but this must be done without jeopardizing the education of students.

Like parents, the government does not want the children's education further disrupted because of this dispute. We want Ontario's students to benefit from one of the best and most challenging curricula available and the assurance of quality provided by province-wide standards. That is why we are continuing to put students first by introducing the proposed Back to School Act (Simcoe Muskoka Catholic District School Board), 2002.

I call on all parties to also put the students of the Simcoe-Muskoka area first, as my honourable friends in the New Democratic Party did in 1993 with the Lambton County Board of Education and Teachers Dispute Settlement Act, the East Parry Sound Board of Education and Teachers Dispute Act, and the Windsor Teachers Dispute Settlement Act.

I would also encourage the Liberals to do the same as they did in 1985 with An Act respecting the Wellington County Board of Education and Teachers Dispute and with the Wellington County Board of Education and Teachers Dispute Settlement Act, and in 1989 with an act respecting the Toronto Transit Commission labour disputes. It's important to note that when these bills were brought forth, there was all-party consent to get them passed.

I know the students in the Simcoe-Muskoka area want their schools to return to normal. Many of these 7,000 students are about to graduate from grades 12 and 13 and are now preparing to head to university or college. This is a crucial time for them, as the marks they receive now will help determine their future paths in life. We want these students in school, learning and growing.

I ask all members to support this legislation and allow it to proceed to second and third reading today so our children's education will get back to normal as soon as possible.

With that, I would ask that we get unanimous consent to proceed with this bill on second and third reading.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Is there unanimous consent? I'm afraid I heard some noes.

Responses?

Mr Gerard Kennedy (Parkdale-High Park): We stand in the Legislature today with what is supposed to be a last-resort measure from the government, through the Education Relations Commission, when school boards and federations representing teachers can't arrive at agreements. But it is very important to remark here what the first resort of this government should and could have been to accommodate the students in Simcoe Muskoka, because this is just the latest: 136,000 days lost in Simcoe Muskoka, part of almost 25 million lost days under this government for students, three times as many days as the previous two governments combined because of the policy of turmoil and non-support for the school system that this government has made its breakfast and dinner when it comes to education policy. Every one of the students in Toronto and Simcoe and all around the province on average has $1,200 less in support because this government deems them less valuable. Then they leave it to the boards and to the students and to parents to sort out where that hurt and that pain are going to be felt.

In some years we have had no increases in teachers' salaries and sometimes we have had instead some constraints in the system. They have put impossible choices in front of the boards and the teachers of this province and they have, in every instance, put paid to the title of this bill, or at least the subtitle: the interests of students last.

We have seen turmoil and fights incurred with teachers, with school boards. In fact, we see that last year this government has had such an impact on the teaching resources of this province—and that's how we need to start to regard the teachers that are part of this dispute—that we have 1,884 letters of permission from the government, letters that said that people who are not teachers have to stand in front of the class and attempt to provide instruction to children. That's up from just 300 a few years before. Why? Because the policies of this government, the endless turmoil that they generate with their lack of support for the education system, are chasing teachers right out of the province and right out of the profession.

We say here today that it is vitally important that the province starts to awake to the implications. The Premier said to the boards of this province, "You should wait for us to provide more funding." Well, they've been waiting from the beginning of this year and there has been no additional funding coming forward—nothing apparently put forward by the member for Simcoe, nothing put forward by any of the members opposite—to see that there be some equitable funding.

In June of this year, Dalton McGuinty and I put forward a critical action plan. We said, "Don't give in to boards, don't give in to teachers; give in to students' needs," which is what we believe most of the people that are participants in this dispute today would like to see happen. This government had that opportunity. They could have reckoned with curriculum casualties, with the kids who were having very great difficulty passing courses.

We heard reference today to the double cohort. This may be the only thing this provincial government does on behalf of the kids in the double cohort, perhaps have them go back to school a few days earlier because, quite frankly, it's an absolute car crash that this government could have avoided in terms of providing for those kids in this year, trying to get their credits, trying to get into school, trying to get scholarships, trying to get spaces in colleges and universities, all courtesy of a government that has had a recipe for turmoil in our schools from day one. We see, just today, in front of us, the legislation that deals with just the most recent example of that.

This government has not had within it the ability to support publicly funded education. They have put their priorities forward and they have been for private schools. There has been a 54% increase in the enrolment of private schools. Four hundred public schools have closed, 200 private schools have opened, and the members opposite are proud of that effect.

We should not be surprised that we have in this Legislature yet another example of last-resort legislation, because there's no one opposite who will stand up for the average, everyday interests of students and the people who help make that system work.

Mr David Ramsay (Timiskaming-Cochrane): Legislating any worker back to work in this province is a very serious step, and I would have hoped that this government would have learned, from its experience in dealing with the Toronto garbage strike this summer, that they would have dealt with more sensitivity in dealing with the different parties involved in this, in looking at their choice of arbitrator. Several of the parties have put forward names, but unlike what finally happened in the crisis dealing with the garbage strike, this government is adamant in not allowing the parties to come together and choose a mutually-agreed-upon arbitrator, but is going to appoint one in the end.

That's not the way to resolve these disputes. We should be working in partnership. This is a serious step to take, it's a tough step to take and we should make sure that all the parties are involved in this and that they can work together from the beginning to find an arbitrator who is acceptable to all sides, so we can get to a successful conclusion of this dispute.

Mr Peter Kormos (Niagara Centre): The Liberals support the government today by virtue of their vote on first reading. I tell you, New Democrats don't. Even the most cursory reading of this bill—take a look at subsection 10(5): "In appointing a mediator-arbitrator, the minister may appoint a person who has had no previous experience as an arbitrator, has not been previously or currently recognized as a person mutually acceptable, is not a member of a class of persons which has been or is recognized, who are mutually acceptable." Obviously, the only inference to be drawn is that the Liberals support that proposition as well.

Take a look at subsection 10(7), where there is no possible review of even the most un-neutral, the most biased arbitrator. Subsection 10(7) permits this government to appoint—it has been said before; let's say it again—Guy Giorno as the arbitrator. The appointment of Guy Giorno would not be subject to a review.

New Democrats do not support this legislation. New Democrats will not willy-nilly force teachers back to work. New Democrats believe in free collective bargaining and New Democrats condemn this government and, quite frankly, their Liberal collaborators for giving boards of education like the Simcoe-Muskoka board carte blanche, because the Simcoe-Muskoka board doesn't have to negotiate. The Simcoe-Muskoka board can go to the table week after week, time after time empty-handed, silent, not prepared to participate in active negotiation, knowing full well that at the end of the day this government is going to reach in and pull them out of the wringer.

New Democrats don't agree with the government; we don't agree with the Liberals. The Liberals agree with the government; they don't agree with us. I understand that. New Democrats are standing with the teachers in Simcoe-Muskoka. New Democrats are going to ensure that those teachers get a resolution that's fair, that's just, that reflects their interests. Indeed it's their interests, when properly responded to, that are going to improve the quality of education, not just in Simcoe-Muskoka but in every board of education jurisdiction in this province.

Mr Rosario Marchese (Trinity-Spadina): I want to add a couple of things and say that I congratulate the teachers from the Simcoe-Muskoka area for standing up against a very hostile board and a very hostile government. These are the lowest-paid teachers in the whole of Ontario. For the last 10 years they haven't had an increase. For the last 10 years these are the heroes of our system, working with our students. Because we expect the best, we think they should be paid as fairly as the rest of the teachers across Ontario, and they haven't had an increase in 10 years. When you factor in inflation, it's less than zero per cent. That's not fair.

The minister stands up and says, if you can believe him, "We think the best solution is a local solution. How can they get a local solution when they're short of money to be able to negotiate fair agreements? You have, under your reign, not given the money they deserve to negotiate fair settlements. They are $1 billion short of the money they need to be able to negotiate fair settlements. So how can you stand up and say the best solution is a local one, when you know without money they cannot ever have a local solution? You know that. They have been dipping into their reserve funds to balance their budgets. Reserve funds should not be dipped into to pay for ESL, to pay for librarians, adult education, music teachers, vice-principals, educational assistants, books—and the list goes on and on. They shouldn't be using reserve funds for those purposes.

Chris Stockwell puts his hand to his forehead like this, as the typical young adolescent that he is from time to time. What are you talking about?

Interjection.

1430

Mr Marchese: Teachers are looking for the fairness they deserve. We are telling you that the public needs to know that the problem is not with the teachers; the problem is with this government. The debate needs to happen in this place. Unless we do that, the public will not know, and they will take a position against teachers, I would say, unfairly. The fairness of the argument takes place in here. We will expose it. We will fight for the fairness that students and teachers need and we will make sure that will happen. We're not going to let you just come up here and say, "We will give unanimous consent so teachers can go back into the classroom, so they"—and Liberals, God bless, with their support. We're not going to let that happen. The debate will happen here, and fairness will take place in this Legislative Assembly.

ORAL QUESTIONS

EDUCATION FUNDING

Mr Dalton McGuinty (Leader of the Opposition): My first question today is to the Minister of Education. Minister, it turns out that last week's Toronto public school board budget was wrong. The budget you celebrated as increasing funding to classrooms in fact did the opposite. It cut classroom funding by a full $23 million. My question is, why did you tell Toronto parents their children would get more classroom dollars when in fact that funding will be cut by $23 million?

Hon Elizabeth Witmer (Deputy Premier, Minister of Education): I think the Leader of the Opposition has neglected to keep in mind what the point of the exercise was. What happened in Toronto was that the trustees refused to abide by the Education Act and pass a balanced budget. In response to the refusal of a small majority of trustees to not abide by the law, it became necessary for us to send in a supervisor.

I am very pleased to say that the supervisor's task was to balance the budget, and last week the supervisor did exactly that: he balanced the budget.

Mr McGuinty: Minister, I assume you're agreeing now that in fact classroom spending is going to be cut by $23 million.

Last week the Premier boasted, and I quote, "The supervisor has managed to increase [spending in] the classroom." That simply was not true.

Several months ago, when he first appointed supervisors in Ottawa, Toronto and Hamilton, he said classroom spending would not be affected. That is not true either.

The truth is that both in Toronto and in Ottawa you can't balance the books. You're short $16 million here in Toronto. Our kids are continuing to pay the price as a result of your cuts to education. That means less money for textbooks, less money for special education programs, less money for computers, less money for teachers and assistants and on and on.

Madam Minister, will you now admit the truth: your supervisors' budgets are doing nothing less than further compromising our children's education.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): Christie just lied.

Hon Mrs Witmer: For five years, the trustees on this board had the opportunity to use almost $1 billion in transition funding in order to make a smooth transition to the funding model. Unfortunately, they refused to use the funding to do the necessary restructuring; they did not make the decisions; they did not pass a balanced budget; they did not obey the law. As a result of that, we sent in the supervisor.

Now, I think the opposition would agree with me that all of the programs they said were in jeopardy are there: the swimming pools, the heritage language and the parenting centres. All the things you said would be gone are still in place.

The other thing I can tell you is that spending, if we take a look at the classroom—

Interjections.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Order. I'm afraid the minister's time is up.

Mr McGuinty: Madam Minister, why not have the decency to admit that this entire business of taking over school boards and imposing supervisors has been an expensive, time-wasting charade. The end result has been further compromises to our children's education. You did not balance the budget in the city of Toronto. We're short $23 million more this year when it comes to our children's education, and you're short $16 million when it comes to balancing the budget.

This has been an expensive, time-wasting charade that is further compromising the education of our children. Why not have the decency to stand up and admit that this has been a terrible exercise? It has wasted money, it has been a fraudulent perpetration on our children, and it has done nothing more and nothing less than impose further cuts on their education.

Interjections.

The Speaker: Order. I'm going to ask the member to withdraw that comment, please.

Mr McGuinty: I withdraw the comment, Speaker.

Hon Jim Flaherty (Minister of Enterprise, Opportunity and Innovation): On a point of order, Mr

Speaker: I heard the member from Scarborough-Agincourt say a moment ago, "Christie just lied." That is unbecoming—

The Speaker: Order. Take your seat. The member will know that he didn't say it about a minister. I listened very carefully. He did not indicate the minister. I would say this, however: I would ask all members to think before they make any comment.

The Minister of Education has the floor.

Hon Mrs Witmer: The Leader of the Opposition appears to be somewhat confused on this whole issue of whether or not trustees or boards should be required to balance their budgets, or whether they should be allowed to break the law. In fact, in September 2002, Mr McGuinty suggested trustees should be allowed to make their own decisions. Then he goes on to say that the school board does not balance the books—

Interjections.

The Speaker: Minister, take your seat. Come to order, please. Would the minister continue, please.

Hon Mrs Witmer: As I said, the Leader of the Opposition seems to be confused in his position. Then he goes on to say that if they do not balance the books, the Liberals would be "all over them like a cheap suit."

Do you know what? I can tell you about the budget. The budget was able to increase spending for classroom teachers, textbooks, classroom supplies and classroom computers. There were no school closures. There were more—

The Speaker: Order. I'm afraid the minister's time is up.

PENSION PLANS

Mr Dalton McGuinty (Leader of the Opposition): My question is to the Minister of Finance. Minister, on Friday there was a landmark ruling in the Ontario Court of Appeal that protects employee rights when it comes to their pension surpluses. You will know that your omnibus bill is going to change all of that. You want to turn the tables and allow employers to raid pension funds of any surplus and keep it for themselves. We believe that is patently unfair. We believe that any decision regarding pension funds ought to be a joint decision involving the employer and the workers. Will you respect the unanimous decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal by withdrawing your changes to the Ontario pension law?

Hon Janet Ecker (Minister of Finance): I would agree with the honourable member that nothing should be allowing employers to raid pension plans. The proposals do not do that. We respect the fact that the court has made a decision, we respect the fact that that decision may have an impact on the amendments, and that's why we put out the statement on Friday to say that we will not proclaim those sections of the bill until we have analyzed the court decision thoroughly to make sure there is nothing in any proposals that is taking away any rights of pensioners in this, because that is not the intent nor is that the desire of the government.

Secondly, we will continue to do consultations on any proposed regulations, again to make sure that pensioners who have heard this debate, pensioners who may be concerned, can see and can feel fully confident that their pensions are secure.

Mr McGuinty: Madam Minister, do you honestly think that Ontario workers, people who stand to benefit in one way or another under a pension, are going to take satisfaction in knowing that you're going to take this away and somehow, under cover of darkness, you're going to make some kind of a decision that's going to respect their interests and their needs? Hardly.

The question everybody is asking is, why are you doing this? Last week, you were asked to name one single employee group that supports what you're doing, and you could not. You said you needed to ram this bill through the Legislature to keep pensions viable, but you can't name a single pension plan whose viability is at risk.

The highest court in Ontario has now told us that the surplus is something that should be shared. Your legislation is going to give employers the right to take the surplus away from the workers who have earned it, and it denies those workers any right of appeal. Minister, it's fundamentally not about workers, and it's not about the employers; it's about what is fair in the circumstances.

We believe that workers and employers should be making joint decisions when it comes to the future of their pension funds. We think what you're doing is fundamentally wrong. We think the right thing to do in the circumstances, Madam Minister, is to withdraw your changes to Ontario pension law.

Hon Mrs Ecker: Obviously the honourable member has not read the legislation or read the discussion paper, because the legislation specifically recognizes and requires in many circumstances that a surplus-sharing agreement between the employer and the employees is the preferred way to go. Absolutely we agree with pensioners on this issue. But we should also be very clear that if there is no change in the current situation of uncertainty that is causing people to go to court, that is causing groups to make applications for this, that there were circumstances where pension plans could be forced into putting surpluses out for employees, whether the plan was able to withstand that or not—now, maybe the honourable member thinks that is not something that the government should be concerned about. But I would think pensioners would want to know that decisions made about their pension plan are paying attention to the future viability of the plan.

Mr McGuinty: Madam Minister, I have no idea what you're saying. What I know is what the Ontario Court of Appeal said—they were very, very clear—that workers have to be involved when it comes to issues dealing with the future of their pension funds. It is as simple and as straightforward as that. If you're looking for clarity on this, read the decision. The offending sections of your bill are going to affect hundreds of thousands of Ontarians and millions and millions of dollars. There were 200 cases—that's 200 separate employee groups—awaiting the Monsanto decision. You want to pass legislation now that is going to take their rights away from them without giving them any right of appeal.

Your bill is wrong. It's wrong to trample on the rights of hard-working people and then unilaterally and retroactively change their pension rules. What you want to do now is that you're looking for us to give you authority to make changes under cover of darkness. This bill was wrong from the outset. The policy that informs it is wrong. It is patently unfair to Ontario workers. The only reasonable and responsible thing to do is to withdraw this change to Ontario pension law.

Hon Mrs Ecker: The honourable member seems to be ignoring the advice of many, many pension experts who have publicly stated that with the reduction in investment income that has hit many pension plans—a National Post article, for example; a study by Caldwell Securities—46 major Canadian companies with pension plans expressed the concern that there were underfunded plans out there—a Globe and Mail article; a UBS Warburg study—again, a warning that pension plans have to be very, very cautious about how they continue to function so they remain viable. Maybe the Liberal Party thinks the government should ignore that. On this side of the House, we believe steps should be taken to ensure that there is nothing that takes away the rights of pensioners, that legislation respects, encourages, supports employees making surplus—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): I'm afraid the minister's time is up.

HYDRO DEREGULATION

Mr Howard Hampton (Kenora-Rainy River): My question is for the Minister of Energy. Minister, a quick review of your pre-election hydro bribe legislation reveals that Hazel McCallion, mayor of Mississauga, is right: you will stick the municipal hydro utilities with the $500-million cost of implementing your hydro deregulation and privatization fiasco and you will stick them with the cost of sending out the rebate cheques, which means the only way they can recover this is by, in effect, putting it on to municipal property taxpayers. A $500-million cost spread across property taxpayers in this province is $100 per household. Do you really believe that you can bribe people with a $75 cheque—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Order. The member has to withdraw the word "bribe." You're not going to be able to use that. Withdraw it, please.

Mr Hampton: I withdraw it. Minister, do you really believe that you can send out a $75 cheque before the election and then force up people's property taxes to cover your tracks, and that people are going to fall for it?

Hon John R. Baird (Minister of Energy, minister responsible for francophone affairs): I'd like to address both issues that the honourable member raised.

With respect to those costs to get the rebate out, we believe they should be recoverable from a corporation should the local distribution company get the rebate out by December 31, after the 2006 freeze.

With respect to the market-ready costs, they have not even begun to be determined by the Ontario Energy Board. I think some are rather modest, like in the case of Mississauga. Some are perhaps greater than they need to be. The Ontario Energy Board will make those determinations at some period of time in the future, as they were going to do, and they'll be held as assets.

So the leader of the third party is wrong on both of those.

Mr Hampton: What's clear from reading your legislation is that scam artists like Direct Energy will continue to collect their outrageous profits and get a rebate from the taxpayers of Ontario as well; that Hydro One won't be forced to operate on a not-for-profit basis; that Brascan, British Energy and OPG will continue to charge outrageous prices, but municipalities are being lined up to carry all the freight here.

Minister, there are a number of municipal hydro utilities that are already on the brink of bankruptcy thanks to your deregulation and privatization fiasco. Now you're going to stick them with more costs. Do you really think you're going to get away with this? Do you really think you can say to the Hazel McCallions of the world that they should just buzz off?

Hon Mr Baird: I don't think there is anyone in the province of Ontario who would indicate that to Her Worship, the Mayor of Mississauga.

With respect to Hydro One and the two examples you raised, both for the cost of getting rebates into consumers' hands and for the market-ready costs, we're going to treat Hydro One exactly as we treat every other local distribution company in Ontario. That is not any different.

I suggest to the member opposite that he might want to take more than a few moments to read the bill that was presented to the House. I'd certainly be very happy to offer him and his folks a briefing on the issues so he can be informed as to its contents.

Mr Hampton: There is nothing in this bill that will force Hydro One, for example, to roll back its transmission charges that are now profit-based. There is nothing in this bill that is going to force Direct Energy to fork over the 40% increase in hydro costs that they've pushed on.

For almost over a century, municipal hydro utilities have always paid their bills on time. Now, after your deregulation and privatization fiasco, Dominion Bond Rating Service last Friday came out and said that many of them are in big financial trouble. Now, in your attempt to cover up the disaster of hydro privatization and deregulation, you're going to push more costs on to them.

Why don't you just admit it? Hydro privatization and deregulation is the problem. Kill it, not the municipal hydro utilities.

Hon Mr Baird: The leader of the third party raises three issues, and I'll go through them one by one.

With respect to marketers like Direct Energy, under the piece of legislation we introduced, they are not entitled to a single cent more than they were entitled to before the legislation was introduced—not a single cent.

With respect to transmission charges at Hydro One, they have been frozen and they haven't gone up since the market opening.

With respect to local distribution companies, what we're doing is going back to the price of the commodity that existed before the market opening. I don't recall a single local distribution company going under on that former process.

PENSION PLANS

Mr Howard Hampton (Kenora-Rainy River): My next question is for the Minister of Finance. On Friday the highest court in Ontario, the Ontario Court of Appeal, delivered a clear and unanimous judgment. They said that under the existing Ontario Pension Benefits Act, a pension surplus must be distributed to employees affected by a plant shutdown and mass layoffs. Your government has tried to tell Ontarians that the existing pension law must be amended and clarified, but the Court of Appeal says it's very clear.

What is equally clear is that the whole objective of your offensive pension amendments is to give your corporate friends on Bay Street the capacity to go in and raid the pension plans of retirees and hard-working employees.

Now that the Ontario Court of Appeal has said clearly and unanimously that you are wrong and your pension amendments are wrong, will you withdraw them from Bill 198 immediately?

Hon Janet Ecker (Minister of Finance): I think it's very clear to note that the Monsanto court decision was about a particular circumstance. It was not a judgment on proposed legislation before this House.

However, we quite recognize the significance of this decision for workers. We quite recognize the fact that there is a great deal of concern among pensioners that something could happen to their pension plans that might jeopardize their rights. We do not wish this to happen. That is why we have said very clearly that those amendments are not going to be proclaimed. There needs to be further work done to ensure they are consistent with the court decision. If they're not, they will be amended.

Second, any regulations that may or may not go forward will not go forward until there has been clear consultation, until all of the groups are very aware that their rights have been protected. This is about respecting those plans where there is, in the plan documents, old documents, new documents, where there is entitlement for—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): I'm afraid the minister's time is up. Sorry. Supplementary?

Mr Hampton: What a pile of complete nonsense. The Ontario Court of Appeal interpreted the law of Ontario, the Ontario Pension Benefits Act, and they said there's no need for clarification, there's no need for amendments. The law is clear: where there is a plant shut down and there is a pension surplus, it must be equally shared between employer and employees. They said that your amendments aren't necessary.

Let's recognize what your amendments are all about. Your amendments are all about making it possible for your greedy friends on Bay Street to take money away from retirees, to take money out of the pension plan of people who've worked for years and years. That's what it's about. It is theft from people's pension plans. If you had any decency, you would do what you've done in the past with some of your other budget bills: you'd amend it. You'd rip those sections out of the bill, because it is an insult to all hard-working Ontarians that you even tried to do this. Will you do it now?

Hon Mrs Ecker: This legislation respects the rights of employees. It does not allow employers to raid pension funds.

Secondly, let's be very clear. We have said we are analyzing the court decision. We quite understand the concern that pensioners may have. We want to make sure that pension plans, that the rights that pensioners have, that the earned benefits that pensioners have, are indeed protected. This legislation will respect the court decision or it will be amended.

Regulations under any sections will be thoroughly consulted on. We've got additional meetings scheduled. I repeat, as I've said in this House before, this is an issue that has been worked for over two years. The government was very open about the concerns and the problems, and consulted in order to try and resolve the issue. If we haven't got an appropriate resolution, we are prepared to continue to make sure we have a resolution so that pensioners' rights are respected.

EDUCATION FUNDING

Mr Gerard Kennedy (Parkdale-High Park): I have a question for the Minister of Education. Minister, I want to speak to you directly in your special capacity as the person particularly responsible for the kids in the Toronto public system. Last week you and the Premier said things like, and this is the Premier's quote, "First of all, money spent in the classroom has actually increased under the supervisor's recommendation." Figures were released to say there was a $2-million increase. In fact, there was a $23-million cut to the classroom.

Minister, you had to know. You have the staff; you have the supervisor's staff, the board's staff. They're all working for you now. You had to know. Your job is to protect those kids. For three days, until it was pointed out by somebody else, you let that be told to the parents and children of this province. How is it possible that you would forgo your responsibility and let a story like that get told to the parents and students of this city?

Hon Elizabeth Witmer (Deputy Premier, Minister of Education): The story that needs to be told is the fact that a small majority of trustees refused to obey the Education Act. It was necessary to send in a supervisor, and the supervisor managed to balance the budget. All those programs that you said were going to be cut—the swimming pools, the heritage languages, the parenting centres—are still in place. Furthermore, there is more spending for classroom teachers, for textbooks and classroom supplies, as well as computers. There was also more money for hall monitors in order that there would be extra school safety. Those are the facts.

Mr Kennedy: They are wrong. The minister opposite, who is responsible for the well-being of children in the Toronto public school system, directly took it over, and last week the minister and the Premier said they were protecting the interests of those children by not having cuts to the classrooms.

Minister, you know then there were $23-million worth of cuts. You tried to say just now the budget was balanced. In fact, there's a $16-million deficit. You're not telling the people of this city what's happening in their schools. I want to say to you, as they have in fact fewer textbooks, according to the real figures, as they have less classroom support, less teachers' assistants, less supply teachers, why should anyone in this province in any of the schools believe you when you let this be on the public record for as long as it was when you clearly had the knowledge beforehand that things were different?

Hon Mrs Witmer: I guess the question is, why would anyone believe you? You were the people who talked about parenting centres—gone; heritage language—gone; swimming pools—gone. Instead, all of those programs were saved, plus there was a balanced budget plan, plus there is more money for classroom teachers and textbooks and classroom supplies, stabilized spending for special education, stabilized spending on school maintenance, stabilized funding for the itinerant music teachers, the preservation of the international language programs, and stabilized funding for the parenting and family literacy centres. This is the job that the trustees could do and refused to do.

Interjections.

SCIENCE NORTH

Mr AL McDonald (Nipissing): My question is for the Minister of Culture. I understand that on November 9 you were in Sudbury to announce this government's support for the capital expansion underway to improve the facilities at Science North. We all know that Science North is a very popular attraction in northern Ontario. In fact, you know that—

Interjections.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): This is the last warning for the member for Parkdale-High Park and the member for Windsor West. If they continue to yell across when the question is being asked by someone else, they will be thrown out. Last warning for both of them.

Sorry for the interruption, member for Nipissing.

Mr McDonald: Minister, we all know that Science North is a very popular attraction in northern Ontario. In fact, you do know, and I was happy to hear, that Science North was the winner of the 2002 Attractions Canada national award for best indoor site with an operating budget of more than $400,000. Science North has become famous for its visitor-friendly approach, which creates an environment that highlights learning over teaching.

Minister, could you tell us a bit about this expansion project?

Hon David H. Tsubouchi (Chair of the Management Board of Cabinet, Minister of Culture): I thank the member for Nipissing for that excellent question. I did have the pleasure of being in Sudbury to visit Science North along with my colleague the Minister of Tourism. We were able to announce a $2.2-million investment over two years for the expansion of Science North. Science North will be looking for an 8,500-square-foot expansion to go to the educational and tourist attraction, as well as exhibit floors and science workshops.

I give my congratulations to both Jim Marchbank, who is the CEO, and Risto Laamanen, who is the chairperson, for the wonderful "bluecoats," as they are affectionately called, who make a visit to Science North a memorable learning experience. There are also volunteers there who are like bluecoats, as the member for Sudbury knows, 150 or 200 of them, some of them over 80, and some of them as young as 13 or 14 years old who plan to have careers in science and who make our experience there a wonderful thing.

Mr McDonald: Thank you, Minister. I also understand that in keeping with their entrepreneurial spirit and through their independent business division, Science North continues to market and sell their expertise in multimedia attractions, film production and program development. I understand that the recent IMAX film Jane Goodall's Wild Chimpanzees and the creation of Discovering Chimpanzees are both examples of this entrepreneurial spirit. Both of these exhibits have now moved on to Cincinnati and will tour other American cities and bring revenue back to Science North.

Minister, could you tell this House what future plans Science North may have for the people of Ontario to enjoy?

Hon Mr Tsubouchi: One thing that really struck me about Science North when I was there was the fact that they are quite a leader in innovation. This was brought home to me with some of the innovative projects they are doing in exporting our talent to the United States. For example, and this is quite ironic, at the Tech Museum of Innovation in San José, in the middle of Silicon Valley, Science North was hired to create this wonderful theatre of innovation in Silicon Valley. The same thing happened in the middle of car country with the Henry Ford Museum in Dearborn, Michigan. They were the ones asked to do this display on cars. What's really exciting is that they've got this wonderful exhibit called the Dynamic Earth project, at a cost of $14.35 million, that allows visitors to Sudbury to really engage in what Sudbury is all about—the mining community and the community itself—explaining it in a wonderful way to visitors. It's a wonderful project for tourists, and this is exceedingly good news for Sudbury as well.

PENSION PLANS

Mr George Smitherman (Toronto Centre-Rosedale): My question is to the Minister of Finance, and it concerns Bill 198 and, in particular, the pension considerations. She has used the word "viability" so many times in trying to define this issue, when everybody but her seems to have understood that it's about state-sanctioned robbery designed to placate the business elite—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): You have to withdraw that, please.

Mr Smitherman: Yes, I withdraw.

It is about state-sanctioned legislation that is designed to offer an incentive to corporations to take all of the surpluses out of pension funds. This honourable member, who ran around getting sports teams to sign off for $10 million, has established a record that makes people very concerned about dealing with her, to the point where she refuted the suggestion that I made on Thursday about her flawed consultation, only to agree by Friday at 6:15.

So, Madam Minister, I'd like to ask you a question, which is: will you stand in your place today and agree to withdraw section 25 of Bill 198 because it is so deeply flawed?

Hon Janet Ecker (Minister of Finance): If the honourable member has read Bill 198, he knows that the tax to which he refers, the special treatment for sports teams, is not allowed to proceed under that legislation, so perhaps he might want to consider voting for the legislation since he seems to agree with the direction.

First of all, what the honourable member should understand is that some pension plans currently allow employers access to surpluses. One of the things this bill talks about in the proposals is that there has to be an application, there has to be entitlement, there has to be protection for the rights of pensioners. The plan itself has to have a surplus to distribute. I'm sure the honourable member would agree with that.

We understand that the court has ruled. We are taking a look at that court decision. We are making sure that anything this government wishes to do is clearly respecting rights workers have in this province, and we will continue to do that. I think it is only due diligence to do that.

Mr Smitherman: It would be nice if it were so, but it isn't, because the legislation you propose wipes out any of the rights that the Monsanto workers were awarded on Friday. If that isn't enough, it goes one rather significant step further, to make Ontario the only jurisdiction in North America that encourages the stealing of surpluses from ongoing pension funds, section 79.1.

So, Madam Minister, since you don't seem to understand your own legislation and since you didn't take the time over the weekend to read it and because you have admitted that it's probably way out of whack, why don't you do the honourable thing and withdraw it today?

Hon Mrs Ecker: Employers were not required to distribute surpluses in partial windup situations under the Liberals and under the NDP. But decisions have been made that have made it very unclear. What is important here is that we are looking at the court decision. We are not going to be proceeding with something that is flouting the rights of workers. We are continuing to sit down with all of the groups that are part of this, because this legislation does not, nor would we stand for something that would, allow employers to raid pension plans, to take away the rights of workers. That would not be appropriate and would not be fair. If the honourable member would like a full briefing on this, we'd be quite happy to give it to him.

Mr Norm Miller (Parry Sound-Muskoka): My question is for the Minister of Transportation. Minister, road safety has been improving in this province. In 1994, Ontario had the eighth-safest roads in North America; by 1999, we had improved to having the second-safest roads.

Sadly, tragedies do occur on our highways. There have been growing concerns, including those of our own Premier, over the safety and the stretch of Highway 69 between Parry Sound and Sudbury. This part of the highway has seen a number of tragic collisions and loss of life. The loss of even one life is one too many.

The Premier has committed to making this two-lane stretch of Highway 69 safer by expanding it to four lanes within 10 years. Will you tell us what you are doing to make sure this happens?

Hon Norman W. Sterling (Minister of Transportation): Our Premier is the first leader of any political party to make a commitment and commit to a time frame for four-laning Highway 69 to Sudbury. Road safety is a top priority in my ministry and our Premier announced in Sudbury on November 21 that we are working to complete the four-laning of Highway 69 from Parry Sound to Sudbury in stages. Starting in 2003, we will begin construction of 14 kilometres of four-lane highway north of Parry Sound. We are finalizing the design and acquiring property to allow construction of another 20 kilometres south of Sudbury. We're fast-tracking the schedule to complete four-laning of the 118 kilometres between Noble and Estaire.

When all is said and done, over $1 billion will have been spent four-laning Highway 69, one of the largest transportation projects the government has ever tackled. We are proud of this commitment and the $1.6 billion we have spent on highways in northern Ontario since 1995.

Mr Miller: Thank you, Minister, for restating that commitment.

There are many factors that contribute to collisions on our highways. We hear from police and other authorities that many collisions are preventable. I certainly appreciate that our roads are the safest in Canada for the second straight year, but any loss of life on Ontario's highways is a concern for us all.

People are concerned about what appears to be an increasing number of collisions and fatalities. What is your ministry doing in the shorter term to make it safer for those who drive on this highway?

Hon Mr Sterling: Unfortunately, we cannot build roads immediately. There are many, many things that we are doing in the interim to deal with the problem with highway use on 69. Over the past 13 years—that is, from 1988 to 2000—the overall average of the collision rate actually has declined slightly.

However, we continue to be concerned about fatal collisions. According to the police reports on Highway 69, in fatal collisions, some 27% involved drivers that were speeding, following too closely or passing improperly. We are helping to improve road safety through the implementation of our Highway 69 action plan, installing 50 new road signs to promote safe driving habits, increasing enforcement of commercial vehicles by 30% and short-term highway improvements to the S curve south of Highway 637. But we cannot do this alone; drivers must improve their habits. We will continue to look at methods to stop the fatalities that are occurring on Highway 69.

EDUCATION FUNDING

Mr Rosario Marchese (Trinity-Spadina): My question is to the Minister of Education. Evidently, the supervisor is allowed to carry a deficit of $9.5 million over a three-year period for severance for all of the workers that he has either laid off or is firing. But the trustees at the Toronto Board of Education reminded me that there is a $45-million account that's available for severance. My question to you is, why is he carrying over a deficit of $9.5 million over a three-year period when there is $45 million available for the purposes of taking care of severances?

Hon Elizabeth Witmer (Deputy Premier, Minister of Education): I didn't hear all of the question, but I think it had to do with severance costs. I would just mention to the member opposite that the fact that the budget was balanced five months late into the year also meant that a possible $9 million in savings was not able to be achieved, and that's why there is some carry-over.

Mr Marchese: If I could just suggest to you, Minister, because you couldn't hear the question, that you wear this little earpiece just in case.

My question to you is, he's allowed to carry over a deficit of $9.5 million that deals with severance and another $6 million that deals with enrolment decline, for a total of 16 million bucks. The board has available $45 million for the purposes of severance. We don't know what the supervisor is doing with that 45 million bucks.

We think he's cooking the books. We think you should know about it.

Trustees were not allowed to carry over a deficit. Why is the supervisor allowed to carry that deficit, and why is he not using the $45 million that's available for the purposes of severance to do that? It's a simple question.

1540

Hon Mrs Witmer: On the issue of the enrolment numbers, obviously the trustees were not aware that the numbers were going to go down. So that has had an impact on their bottom line and their per-student funding allocation. That's why Mr Christie has brought forward a plan that responds to a budget that is now being balanced five months later.

We are well aware of the severance fund. In fact, as the member probably knows, the trustees at one time thought they would have access to this in order to balance their budget.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): New question.

Mr Richard Patten (Ottawa Centre): My question is to the Minister of Education. Minister, I'm sure you have learned by now that your appointed supervisor for the Ottawa school board, Mr Merv Beckstead, has been unable to balance the books. He says that the funding formula is to blame, and I quote from an interview he had on CBC radio: "A permanent fix for Ottawa's problem is unlikely until the government changes the funding formula...."

"It's very difficult to have a universal formula that works the same for everyone. The idea is sound but they didn't get it right the first time. Major shifts in policy like that—rarely are they ever right completely the first time."

So, Minister, I ask you, will you withdraw the supervisor and his very expensive office that has cost the board about half a million dollars—he has been unable to balance the budget—and will you apologize to the trustees who are now totally vindicated in their fight to do something for students for a change? Will you remove him?

Hon Mrs Witmer: We should probably review the actions of the trustees and be mindful of why it was necessary to bring in a supervisor. But certainly I think it's important to remember that the supervisor is presently preparing a plan that we anticipate will return the Ottawa-Carleton board to a balanced financial position, and I hope we'll receive that plan this week.

Mr Patten: I have a speech here from Mr Beckstead that he gave to the Greater Ottawa Chamber of Commerce. I note with some interest the title of his address: Challenges in Managing Funding for Public Education. It was subtitled "You Cannot Solve a Problem with the Same Thinking that Created It."

On Friday, Beckstead said that in spite of making painful choices, he could not find enough cuts to balance the board's budget, and the funding formula is to blame. "The province's funding formula did not work for Ottawa.... Only when that formula is changed can Ottawa begin to think of longer-term solutions."

Minister, you have said that there needs to be a review of the funding formula. It must be rather embarrassing now to have your appointee come back and say you have created the problem—not you, but your government. Will you do the right thing and make adjustments and provide adequate funding to these school boards in the interests of our children?

Hon Mrs Witmer: I think it's very important to remember what Mr Beckstead has been able to do. If you remember, when he was appointed as supervisor, the school year and the school starting date were all in jeopardy simply because the board had not selected to behave in a way that was in accordance with the Education Act. Mr Beckstead made sure that the schools opened safely and on time. The banks did not cancel the board's line of credit. Teachers and staff were paid. He is presently putting in place a plan for long-term financial stability.

The Speaker: New question.

Mr Toby Barrett (Haldimand-Norfolk-Brant): I also have a question for the Minister of Education. We in rural Ontario have certainly been following the work of the supervisor as he puts the Toronto Board of Education back on course. However, I understand that Mr Kennedy, the member for Parkdale-High Park, is apparently trying to confuse the budget numbers for the Toronto District School Board. Is this true, Minister?

Hon Mrs Witmer: Unfortunately, the methodology that has been used by Mr Kennedy is flawed. The supervisor's table compares net expenditures in 2001-02 to net expenditures in 2002-03, in other words, an apples-to-apples comparison. Mr Kennedy, on the other hand, has a table that compares total expenditures in 2001-02 to net expenditures in 2002-03, an apples-to-oranges comparison.

The net-to-net comparison used in the supervisor's table shows there were increases in spending for teachers, textbooks, supplies, computers and school operations. This method of reporting was not invented by the supervisor. All boards report to the ministry on both a net basis as well as a gross basis. So the methodology is flawed.

Interjections.

Hon Chris Stockwell (Minister of the Environment, Government House Leader): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: The member for Parkdale-High Park accused the Minister of Education of misleading them. I think that's out of order and I would ask he withdraw it.

The Speaker: If the member said something, he wasn't doing it publicly. I didn't hear it. I was trying to listen to the question. Quite frankly, I couldn't hear him because of you.

Interjection.

The Speaker: He can withdraw it any time if he wants to. I didn't hear it.

Mr Barrett: Thank you, Minister. That clarifies some of the flawed methodology of the member opposite. If one were to look at this budget in a clear way, could you tell us just what it does, not only for students but for people in Toronto?

Hon Mrs Witmer: What this budget does—
Interjections.

The Speaker: Now I'm going to have to do it formally. Last warning to the government House leader as well. I'm not going to continue when you're shouting across. Sorry, Minister of Education.

Hon Mrs Witmer: Regardless of how you look at the numbers, the supervisor's budget has put the board back on a sound financial basis. He has been successful in finding $90 million in savings. The programs that were in place when the supervisor was appointed, such as parenting, the literacy centres, the pools and of course heritage language, are still in place. The budget release has been transparent. The supervisor has not tried to disguise his savings plan; quite the contrary, he released nine pages of details on where the savings can be found. Again, I would say that Mr Kennedy's methodology is flawed. The method of reporting used by the supervisor is the same one the boards use to report to the ministry on a net as well as a gross basis.

PENSION PLANS

Mr Monte Kwinter (York Centre): My question is to the Minister of Finance. In answer to questions last week, you said, "There has been public consultation on this bill. There has been a public discussion paper, meetings and submissions." You went on to say, "This legislation is clearly there to protect the rights of pensioners."

After the Ontario Court of Appeal ruled on Friday that former employees are entitled to a share of pension surpluses, you have now decided not to proclaim parts of the bill pertaining to pensions while you conduct these same consultations on measures to ensure that the rights of pensioners are protected. The problem is that by not proclaiming this bill you solve nothing, because you're going to pass this bill and it's going to be law, other than the proclamation.

What confidence can anybody have that the same consultations that led to this disaster on your pension bill are not going to be repeated in these subsequent consultations when there is no public input? Would you now agree to withdraw that portion of the bill and have public hearings so we can at least get some real input to it?

Hon Janet Ecker (Minister of Finance): With all due respect to the honourable member, sitting down and having a meeting with the Ontario Federation of Labour is hardly not having public input; sitting down and having meetings with some of the other groups, as has happened in the succeeding months and will happen in the future—he says that's not public input. I reject that. We are indeed going to sit down with all of the groups.

We're analyzing the court case. The portions of this bill that pertain to pensions are not going to be proclaimed until we have done due diligence with the court decision, until we have finished further consultations to make sure they understand that their rights are protected.

If amendments have to be made in the future, we're prepared to do that, but I think what is important here is that this was started in the year 2000. There was a public discussion paper, there were many submissions from groups—employee groups, union groups, legal groups, employer groups—there have been meetings. Those consultations will continue until people's concerns are eased.

Mr Kwinter: Madam Minister, you went on to say, "This bill does not interfere with court cases that are going on. We specifically are not retroactively changing court decisions."

First of all, there was only one case, and that was the Monsanto case. You rolled the dice on that one and you lost. There were 200 cases that were pending that decision. You are retroactively going to wipe them all out, notwithstanding that the courts have ruled on the same issue that most of those cases are pursuing.

How can you possibly suggest that you are dealing fairly and equitably with this issue? Why don't you just withdraw this section? Let's have some public hearings and let's make sure we get it right, because obviously you didn't get it right the first time.

Hon Mrs Ecker: First of all, the legislation clearly exempts any case that is before the courts. We thought that was appropriate. We are indeed analyzing this particular court decision. It was on a particular case, a particular set of circumstances, but we're doing what I think is the prudent thing: to analyze that court decision to see what direction it would have for us.

The other thing is that there are cases before the superintendent. Yes, those are not before the courts, they are before the superintendent, and one of the challenges has been that because of the unclear direction that is there, there were circumstances that could have forced surplus distribution, that could have put some pension plans in jeopardy.

We will continue the consultations to ensure that pensioners' rights are indeed protected and that that is very clearly understood by all the organizations.

RURAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Mr R. Gary Stewart (Peterborough): My question is for the Associate Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing responsible for rural affairs. Minister, your hard work continues to improve the economic well-being of hundreds of thousands of rural residents. Ontario's small towns and rural communities have benefited enormously from our government's foresight and strategic thinking as it implements a variety of programs for rural Ontario. Indeed, rural Ontario could not have a stronger advocate working to ensure that its residents have the same opportunities for economic growth and prosperity as our urban residents.

Minister, I understand this past weekend you visited the Ottawa Valley to announce a major economic investment. Can you expand on your work and the investment you made on Saturday for the working people of Renfrew county?

Hon Brian Coburn (Associate Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing): I thank the honourable member from Peterborough. On Saturday, I was in Pembroke at the Renfrew county council chambers to announce a major economic development program for this area. This resulted from an innovative project that emphasizes the partnerships, skill sets and assets they have right across the county of Renfrew.

Our government, through the OSTAR-RED project, is investing more than $1.8 million in the County of Renfrew Partners Initiative, or CoRPI. This is a $4.1-million, public-private sector investment partnership that goes right across the county of Renfrew and creates 200 new jobs in tourism, manufacturing, agriculture and resource processing in Renfrew county.

It's a joint initiative between the Renfrew county economic development, the Renfrew Industrial Commission, the town of Deep River, the town of Petawawa, the Ottawa Valley Tourist Association, the Ottawa Valley Manufacturers Alliance and Enterprise Renfrew County, an innovative initiative.

Mr Stewart: Thank you, Minister. It's another example that partnerships do work. Partnerships will continue to move this great province forward.

This is outstanding news for the Ottawa Valley. This CoRPI announcement shows that we are indeed addressing the economic development needs of this region.

Minister, can you tell this House how this investment fits into our government's overall rural economic development strategy?

Hon Mr Coburn: The OSTAR-RED economic development program in rural economic development is an initiative, and that's where this project is funded. It's an initiative that enables partnerships, and in fact promotes partnerships, between municipalities and between businesses to capitalize on some of the technologies and initiatives they have in their communities. It's a $200-million program that assists rural and small-town Ontario by promoting a diversified business climate and creating and retaining long-term jobs.

To date, there have been 48 projects approved. These projects are injecting $308 million into new economic activity all across rural Ontario. Of this total, the province has contributed in the order of $49 million in direct investment.

So there are success stories, from Essex county, Kingston, Midland, Trenton, and in Pembroke and Renfrew county—all across the province.

ONTARIO DISABILITY SUPPORT PROGRAM

Mr Tony Martin (Sault Ste Marie): My question is for the Minister of Community, Family and Children's Services. Minister, last spring you raised the hopes of people living on the Ontario disability support program.

You promised to review the program, look at ways to improve it and raise benefits for the first time in nine years. But almost six months later, we've heard absolutely nothing from you.

Here with us today are more than 20 people from the ODSP Action Coalition, who have done your work for you. They have put together a full report of the problems with ODSP and have made 10 practical recommendations that you could implement today.

People on ODSP are being forced to live in poverty. Thousands of others are even worse off because your application process makes it too hard for them to even apply.

Minister, will you stand in this House today and commit to implement the 10 recommendations given to you by the ODSP Action Coalition?

Hon Brenda Elliott (Minister of Community, Family and Children's Services): I thank my colleague across the way for the question. He will know that our government has been committed for some time to do what we can to improve the lives of the disabled. It is our government that removed those who are disabled from the old welfare program and created the new ODSP plan, with a number of improvements that we think make lives easier for those who are disabled. It is also our government that introduced the Ontarians with Disabilities Act, one of the first in Canada.

My colleague across the way indicates that he has some ideas, on behalf of constituents, that he wishes for me to consider. I have indicated that our government is looking at doing what we can to improve the plan. Of course, as in any other situation when ideas are presented to our government on how to make plans or processes work better, I'd be more than pleased to receive those—

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): I'm afraid the minister's time is up. Supplementary. There was some time left.

Mr Martin: The answer was totally unsatisfactory. It's obvious that the minister hasn't read the report, so I'll send it over to her, if I could have a page here, please.

Minister—

The Speaker: I apologize.

Interjection.

The Speaker: Order. I apologize. It is 4 o'clock. I thought there was time on the clock, but unfortunately it's 4 o'clock.

Just before we begin, it being 4 of the clock, pursuant to standing order 30(b), I'm now required to call orders of the day.

The member for St Catharines on a point of order first.

Mr James J. Bradley (St Catharines): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I'd like to request unanimous consent of the House to present a petition calling for the cleanup of the abandoned aluminum smelter in the town Georgina.

The Speaker: Is there unanimous consent? No, I'm afraid not.

Mr Gerard Kennedy (Parkdale-High Park): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I'd like to raise my dissatisfaction with the answers provided by the Minister of Education. I have filed a notice with the Clerk for a late show tomorrow.

The Speaker: I thank the member, and if he could table the appropriate papers with the table.

WEARING OF RIBBONS

Mr John O'Toole (Durham): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: Earlier today the member from Nipissing, Mr McDonald, spoke rather passionately about the White Ribbon Campaign, which is a violence-against-women initiative. I'm seeking unanimous consent for members to wear the white ribbon for this significant event.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Agreed? Agreed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

TIME ALLOCATION

Hon Chris Stockwell (Minister of the Environment, Government House Leader): I move that pursuant to standing order 46 and notwithstanding any other standing order or special order of the House relating to Bill 191, An Act to amend the Highway Traffic Act to ensure the safety of emergency vehicles stopped on a highway and people who are outside a stopped emergency vehicle, when Bill 191 is next called as a government order, the Speaker shall put every question necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of the bill, without further debate or amendment, at such time the bill shall be ordered for third reading, which order may be called on that same day; and

That, when the order for third reading is called, the Speaker shall put every question necessary to dispose of this stage of the bill without further debate or amendment; and

That the vote on second and third reading may, pursuant to standing order 28(h), be deferred; and

That in the case of any division relating to any proceedings on the bill, the division bell shall be limited to five minutes.

The Speaker (Hon Gary Carr): Mr Stockwell has moved government notice of motion 65.

Mr Rick Bartolucci (Sudbury): I stand to speak against any type of time allocation motion because in this instance, as in other instances, it stifles debate in this House and doesn't enhance the democratic process. In fact, it does not allow the general public, the people in Ontario, to have a say in the important bills that this government should want to be taking out to committee and to have input etc.

In this particular instance, this bill is important. The act itself, Bill 191, is a good piece of legislation. In the words of Brian Atkin, the president of the Ontario Provincial Police Association, "Lives could be saved by having this bill introduced as law." For that reason, I as a member representing the people of Sudbury will be supportive of the legislation. Our Liberal caucus said, on first reading, that we would support the legislation.

The problem we have with the way the government has been doing business lately is that it's stifling critical debate on a number of very serious initiatives. If the government were able manage its time better to allow bills to go to committee, to allow for a more democratic process to take place, I think we could be passing a lot more bills that would enhance the safety of children in this province, the safety of police officers and the powers of the police to execute their duties more diligently and with less restraint.

I think of some of the private member's bills I've introduced—for instance, Bill 24, the Municipal Amendment Act, with regards to adult entertainment parlours—and how children could be exploited because they haven't passed some of the arguments I put forth in Bill 24. I think of other bills—Bill 47, the Highway Traffic Amendment Act (Driving While Suspended); I don't think the fines are strong enough for people who drive while they're suspended.

I'm going to the launch of the red ribbon campaign on Friday with Action Sudbury. Again, I'm going to say that I've tried to get the government to pass Bill 47, but they refuse to pass Bill 47.

As winter approaches, in northern Ontario in particular, I think of Bill 119, which is my studded tire bill. I'm concerned that this government continues after four years to be reluctant to pass meaningful legislation that will potentially save the lives of police officers who have to drive on inferior winter roads because of a privatized maintenance program that is at best flawed and, in the real-case scenario, lousy in most parts of the province.

I think of Bill 128, the highway memorials act, that I've introduced. It may be a mission of mine and of the constituents whom I represent—but tragically, we lost two police officers. One was hit after putting down a spike belt—Sergeant Rick McDonald—and one, as we all know in this House, was brutally executed by two killers. It's a goal of my community to ensure that we have overpasses named after them. So we, with me as their voice, will continue to fight with regard to the passage of this bill so both Joe and Rick will know that they will be forever remembered by not only the people of Sudbury, but also by people who are passing through our great city, our wonderful city—and they find out that—do you know what?—there are these two memorials named after these two very, very fine police officers who died tragically way too early in their careers.

I think of Bill 136, the Highway Traffic Amendment Act, with regard to having police officers inspect motorcycle helmets. That's a very, very significant piece of legislation which will certainly allow police to do their job properly and very effectively in a short period of time.

I would suggest to the government that it would be in their best interests to ensure that they manage the time of the House a whole lot better, and that way, we'd be able to get a whole lot more debated.

The Acting Speaker (Mr David Christopherson): The floor is open for further debate.

Mr Michael Prue (Beaches-East York): I rise today to speak in favour of what the bill says and against, again, another closure. Here we are—almost every single bill this particular month, every single bill in this session of the Legislature, is ending by closure. No matter whether the bill is a good one or a bad one, it seems to end up in the same way: the government rams it through at the last minute without listening to the people and to debate. In fact, this debate probably would not have been necessary had the government been a little more open and honest in some of its other bills and allowed for the other bills to have the full limit of debate they needed and not pushed issues like this up against the wall so that we're here on a third day debating a bill that I'm sure every one of us in this room will probably end up voting for.

This is a bill, after all, that seeks to protect police and emergency personnel on our roads, who are out there with the express purpose of trying to save lives; people who are out there in accident situations, people who are out there pulling over careless drivers, people who are out there in ambulances, people who are out there in fire trucks, people who are out there trying to do what they can for the people of this province, sometimes in very hazardous circumstances, sometimes in slippery, wet, snowy and icy circumstances, where we should all hope that drivers would all show just a modicum of caution.

So of course it is important to pass this kind of legislation. In fact, this legislation does exist in other provinces and in states in the United States. No one can deny that the intent of the bill is a good one. No one can deny that asking motorists to slow down in what potentially is a dangerous situation is a good idea. No one can deny that the bill, in allowing motorists, where it is feasible, to stop—who actually stop their car either hopefully to come to assistance, but even if they don't come to assistance, just to stop their car so that it will make it easier for the enforcement and emergency people to do their jobs correctly—that they be allowed to do it.

One can ask, and I guess I've asked myself this question, why don't ordinary drivers do this anyway? Why don't ordinary drivers, when they see a difficult situation, when they see flashing red lights, instinctively and normally either slow down or stop in order to accommodate the men and women who are out there working to try to protect the lives and safety of motorists and pedestrians and the ill and the disabled and those who are on the sides of our roads? I don't know the answer, but quite frankly, we see it almost every day. In and around the city of Toronto where I'm wont to drive, especially in the periods when school is in session, one often sees school buses stopped at the side of the road with the stop signs coming out the side of the bus, with the lights flashing, and you see ordinary, otherwise careful drivers—I guess they're late for work or whatever it is or late trying to get home or trying to go about their everyday business—passing these buses. It is a very, very dangerous situation. We believe that something needs to be done in order to protect everyone.

I looked through this bill and some of the aspects of the bill are good because if the drivers can't slow down using their own common sense, which tells them they should be slowing down in slippery or icy conditions or around accidents where there are ambulances and fire trucks and police officers and all those things, if they do not have the sense to do that, well, I guess they're going to end up being fined. The fines here range from $400 to $2,000 for a first offence, and if anyone doesn't learn from that first offence, the fine the next time around is quite a bit steeper at $1,000 to $4,000 for second and subsequent offences—with two kickers. One is, you can get up to six months in jail as well, and as well, you can lose or have your licence suspended for a period of time.

Drivers should know how to do this already. This bill should, in reality, not be necessary, but I would suppose that there are people out there who, for whatever reason, are distracted, people who are out there who do not obey the simple rules of the road, people out there who are more than happy, more than willing or more than uncaring to put lives at risk.

Our police and emergency personnel have very dangerous jobs. They have jobs where they often put their lives at risk. Their lives are not so much at risk, although they are from time to time, in a shootout that one would see in Hollywood, and their lives are not so much at risk in ordinary situations around the office, but their lives are at risk when they are on the streets and roads and highways of our province. They are very often at risk when they are attempting to do work where the weather conditions are tough, where they're bad, where the roads are slippery or icy. We need as a society to ensure that their jobs are made just a little bit less risky. We need to make sure that the job for which they are hired and for which they are paid is made just that much easier so that they can do those jobs, so that they can get the traffic flowing, so that they can get the sick and the injured to hospitals, so that they can put out fires or car fires or whatever is adjacent to the street. That is why it is important, I would suggest, that this bill be passed.

The failure of the bill, and it's not enough for me to vote against it, is that it is confined in all of the sections to flashing red lights. I would draw the members' attention to section 159.1 of the bill, which reads, "upon approaching an emergency vehicle with its lamp producing intermittent flashes of red light that is stopped on a highway," and goes on. In section 159.2 it says the same thing again: "upon approaching an emergency vehicle with its lamp producing intermittent flashes of red light that is stopped on a highway with two or more lanes." It is confined to those vehicles except school buses that have red lights. There are many other vehicles and workers who need to be protected as well, and I do not know the rationale of why they are not being protected in this legislation, which I am sure would get swift all-party approval.

There are many workers who deal with emergency situations, who drive vehicles that have other coloured lights; that have orange lights that would show caution; that have blue lights to show they are highway vehicles clearing snow or dangerous debris. I do not understand why we are not seeking to protect them as well. It is granted that they may be moving vehicles and may not necessarily be stopped on the side of the road, but they have nothing with them except the lights with which they are equipped. So if you have a snowplow, for example, which is on the side of the road, perhaps helping a motorist who is stranded during a snowstorm and has gone off the road, or any other type of semi-emergency vehicle with orange lights, they can be stopped at the side of the road doing what they are supposed to do, as good Samaritans, to help clear up the emergency situation, and they are not covered by the ambit of this law.

I think the only failure of the law is that it treats our people in different categories. They are there to do the same kind of dangerous work, they are there to keep the traffic moving, they are there to help the injured and the sick, they are there to get rid of whatever problem is causing the tie-up, yet the workers from those vehicles are not being treated in the same way that we are treating our police officers, our fire people and our ambulance crews. I would suggest that they need to be protected in much the same way. Their lives are every bit as important to all of us as those of our emergency personnel. Their lives are important to themselves and to their families, and they need to be protected in the same way.

Obviously, since this is going to closure, it's far too late for us to move an amendment or to suggest that this be done, but I would suggest to the members opposite that the time has come as well to protect all of the people of Ontario in these dangerous situations, all of the people who are employed either by the province or the municipalities or by the federal government to do the kind of work that is done out there on the roads. In fact, with privatization there are also many private people—private snowplow operators, for example—who are out there as well. We need to protect those workers, those people who are called upon to do extraordinary things when we get huge snowfalls, those people who are asked to go the extra mile on behalf of all of us. We need to protect them as well. This bill does not do that, and this bill should have done that.

I would ask all the members of this House, either in the next session, when this can be brought back, or in a subsequent Parliament, whichever party is in power, to turn our minds to that important aspect of what is fair for the workers in this province. I would suggest that what is fair for the police, the firefighters and emergency vehicles is fair for everyone and that the subsequent law should be amended to include them all. As I said, this is a very good first step and I am pleased to be able to vote to make life safer for at least one small group in our society.

As they become travelled, our roads increasingly produce many problems, many accidents. We have heard repeatedly from the member for Sudbury and others—and even today on the government side—about the carnage that takes place on Highway 69 leading to Sudbury. We know of other highways throughout this province where there are a huge number of problems. Surely the people who are out there trying to save lives, trying to make sure the highways remain passable, deserve our respect and our support.

With that, I am going to yield the floor. My colleagues will be speaking for the balance of our time. I thank you for an opportunity to speak to this bill.

The Acting Speaker: The floor is now open for further debate.

Mr Wayne Wettlaufer (Kitchener Centre): I do appreciate the opportunity to be able to stand and speak on this important piece of legislation. It's unfortunate that the government had to move time allocation again, but I think we have to accept the fact that all of the workers involved, affected by this legislation, want this to pass right away. They want it to pass immediately, whether they be police officers, firefighters or other emergency workers who are so vital to keeping this province safe.

Just last week, as did a number of other members of the Legislature, I had some members of the Police Association of Ontario in my office. One of the items that was high on their agenda was this piece of legislation. They raised it in such a manner as to impress on me the urgency for it to be passed. They said, "Can't you move forward on this right away? Can't you get the other parties to agree with it?" I said, "The other parties do agree in principle but, for whatever reason, they're dragging their feet on allowing us to pass it." They said, "Get it done right away. We can't have any more cops die."

I'd like for a moment to recognize two members of the House who have been very instrumental in bringing Bill 191 before this House. One is my colleague Frank Mazzilli, the MPP for London-Fanshawe, who is a former police officer himself. He introduced a private member's bill that was the catalyst for this piece of legislation. I believe we owe Frank Mazzilli, the member for London-Fanshawe, a vote of thanks. The other member was my colleague the Honourable David Turnbull. He laid the groundwork for this legislation during his time as Solicitor General. He too deserves our thanks.

Over the past six years a number of Ontario Provincial Police officers have lost their lives while performing their duties, while patrolling the province's highways. We cannot and we will not forget them. We will not forget their efforts on behalf of the residents of this great province. Their names will live forever on the walls of the police memorial that stands just outside this building. But we also owe it to these fine officers and the thousands of others like them who go to work every day to protect us, the citizens of the province, not knowing what the next shift, the next hour will bring, to pass Bill 191.

They accept that their job is dangerous. They knew that when they applied to become police officers or firefighters or emergency workers. But that doesn't mean that we should put these fine people at risk needlessly.

I have a few statistics to emphasize just how important it is that this House unanimously pass Bill 191 today. Between 1998 and 2000, 78 parked and/or stopped ambulance, 69 fire and 819 police vehicles were involved in motor vehicle collisions in Ontario. Nine police vehicles were involved in fatal collisions, 237 emergency vehicles were involved in collisions that resulted in injuries and 720 vehicles were involved in collisions that resulted in property damage only. They could have resulted in injury or death. These are sobering statistics.

The legislation has the support, as I said earlier, of every organization whose workers will be affected. Little wonder. These outstanding men and women deserve our support and our protection.

Everyone who uses our provincial highways will benefit by passage of this bill because we all benefit when these hard-working workers—police, emergency workers and firefighters—are able to concentrate on their task at hand.

I would like to remind the House that this government has been at the forefront, we've been the leader, in supporting our police officers, firefighters and other emergency workers. We've given them the tools that they require to do their jobs.

Since 1995, as a government we have invested more than $68.2 million in the community policing partnerships program to put an additional 1,000 officers on the streets of communities across the province. I read on the weekend that Dalton McGuinty, the leader of the Liberals, advocates adding 1,000 additional members to the police officers across the province. Welcome to the real world, Mr McGuinty; we've already done that.

He also advocates doing other things. In British Columbia they have a saying, Speaker. I know you've heard this. They say they don't have a climate, they have weather, and if you don't like the weather, wait a minute. Well, if you don't like the Liberals' policies, wait a minute; they'll change.

Since 1995, we have also doubled funding for Reduce Impaired Driving Everywhere, the RIDE program, to $1.2 million annually to get impaired drivers off our roads.

We've given municipal police services in Ontario $11 million through the municipal police service technology grant program over the past two years to develop information exchanges and purchase hardware that will enable them to share information electronically with each other and with other justice system partners.

We've invested more than $2 million through the Youth Crime and Violence Initiative to help police fight youth crime.

We've provided more than $6 million in funding to expand the Ontario Police College and Ontario Fire College so they can provide specialized training.

We've invested $1 million to provide protective equipment to first responders that will protect them against chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear mishaps.

We've introduced the CERV Ontario program, whereby volunteers become members of emergency response teams in their local communities, thus allowing full-time police, firefighters and other emergency personnel to deal with more serious situations. We are targeting retired police officers, firefighters and other former emergency services personnel so communities can call on these people to support their local police officers, firefighters and emergency personnel.

It's indicative of what our government has done to support these people. The Liberals will say on one hand it's not enough; then, on the other hand, they'll say it's too much. As I said before, if you don't like their policy today, wait until tomorrow; it'll be something else.

In closing, I'd like to remind all members that by passing Bill 191 forcing drivers to slow down to a reasonable speed or, where it's feasible and safe to do so, to move to an adjacent lane, we are protecting those whose job it is to protect us. I know the members of the NDP agree with that. I can see them nodding their heads. The Liberals, we don't know. I encourage all members of the Legislature to support this legislation.

I want to point out that we cannot wait until another police officer, firefighter or emergency person loses his or her life. It shouldn't take the death of another one of those emergency personnel for this House to realize the seriousness of this bill. These people are very valuable to us.

I say let's put a stop to these needless deaths now. Let's pass this legislation. Let's do it unanimously. Let's not stand up with all the rhetoric and hyperbole you're so used to using over there. Stand up and support this; get on with it so that the police, firefighters and the emergency personnel of this province feel we're doing them a service.

Mr Dwight Duncan (Windsor-St Clair): I will vote in favour of this bill, as I voted in favour of Mr Mazzilli's bill, as I've voted and supported it for a long time.

Let me just again remind the public what this does. It basically will require, under the Highway Traffic Act, if there's an emergency vehicle pulled off to the side of the road with its lights flashing, moving into the next lane and slowing down as long as the conditions are safe. This should have been passed probably five years ago and the government just hasn't seen fit to do it. Let's remove the hyperbole and let's just say what this is: it's an amendment to the Highway Traffic Act that I think all three parties support.

What's amazing is that this government didn't do it four or five years ago. They talk a good game on a number of issues related to crime and safety. They thought this province needed 1,000 more police officers; they got it half right. We need still another 1,000, and we need more prosecutors. So again, they like to talk a good game.

I'll remind the member opposite who debated here and spoke about the substance of the bill that we're not dealing with the bill in this debate; we're dealing with time allocation. We're dealing with the government's desire to stop debate, to jam things through on a bill that all three parties in the House support. You could have had it a month ago. You could have had it five years ago. Why didn't you? Because you don't know how to manage the House, not to mention the affairs of the province of Ontario. That's why we're here tonight. That member from Kitchener can't run this House any more than his colleagues can.

Is this something unique, all these time allocations? Well, let's have a look at the record, because we do have a record. In 1999-2000, that government, in the first session: 22 bills under time allocation, 19 at second reading, for 86%; time allocation motions prohibiting committees, 45%; time allocation motions prohibiting third reading debate, 4.5%.

Let's look at the record of the Eves government: number of bills introduced at first reading, 16; the total that have been passed so far, six; number of bills passed with time allocation, five of those six. That's 83% time-allocated. That compares to Mike Harris's record of 70% with no third reading. He's even worse than Mike Harris.

What I think makes this particularly humorous to all of us in the opposition is the fact that we're time-allocating bills that everybody agrees to. And no, we don't want to delay them.

Why don't we have hearings on the budget bill? They don't want that. They don't want to do that.

Mr Dave Levac (Brant): It's faulty legislation.

Mr Duncan: It's faulty legislation. They don't want to talk about pensions in here. They don't want to do that. They flip-flopped on Friday, acknowledged the errors of their own bill, and he has the nerve to stand up and accuse us of that. Well, that's crazy and you're not going to get away with it, just like you haven't gotten away with it up until now. I don't want to hear about a government that can't manage its legislative agenda, because we know they can't manage the affairs of this province.

What about the Taxpayer Protection Act? We have a bill before us that was time-allocated on Thursday, that is, cut off debate, no third reading, no committee hearings. What did that bill do? It undid their own balanced budget legislation that was the centrepiece of their first term here in office. They simply got rid of it. They changed their mind. They took a different position. They said they couldn't afford the tax cuts, which is what we said all along.

What about hydro? For four years they advocate a policy, and in one fell swoop, gone.

But again tonight, this evening, this afternoon, we are speaking about time allocation. That's a fancy parliamentary term for stopping debate, for not allowing duly elected members the opportunity to address a piece of legislation—

Interjection: Killing democracy.

Mr Duncan: —killing democracy on something that should be relatively simply.

I spoke about the record of the Harris government. Let's look at other governments.

The Rae government had a great record on time allocation compared to either the Eves or Harris government. They used it only 11% of the time. Governments run into difficulties and, understandably, from time to time, time allocation will have to be used. It's a respectable number.

The Peterson government: 2.1% of the time. Of 183 bills passed, four of them were passed using time allocation.

So far in the Eves government, we're up to 83%. What's more insidious about it, in the time allocation motions—and that's what we're debating tonight, is a time allocation motion. As much as the member for Kitchener would like to talk about the bill and our police officers, he can't. We're talking about time allocation, and in this motion they will not allow committee hearings, they won't allow third reading debate—crazy.

That's why this institution is in such disrepute, because we don't want to talk about the important things. We time-allocated Bill 198 on Thursday, the bill that allows the government to allow employers to go in and take surpluses out of employees' pensions, without even consultation with those employees. We shut down debate, we prevented third reading debate, we allowed no committee hearings, and what happened on Friday? The Supreme Court of Ontario said, "You got it all wrong."

How did the government respond? The government responded by saying, "We won't proclaim the offensive sections of the act." Let me be unequivocal: I don't believe them when they say that. They will proclaim those sections of the act when this Legislature is not sitting, when there's not an opportunity to hold the government to account, late in the day on a Friday afternoon. That's been their record historically.

We're faced again this evening with time allocation. I would like to have some more time. I'm restricted because of the number of members in our caucus. I'd like to speak more about our police services, our fire services and our paramedics and ambulance workers. I would like that opportunity. If we were actually debating this bill, we would be afforded that opportunity, and more members of our caucuses would be afforded that opportunity.

I'd like to say that Dalton McGuinty and the Ontario Liberals made a commitment today to add 1,000 additional police officers across this province when they form a government next year, and 50 additional crown attorneys to deal with the increase in backlogs in our courts of justice.

I would like to have that opportunity. Unfortunately, I won't be able to. Most of last week, we spent our time debating time allocation, closure, cutting off debate.

I support this bill. I supported Mr Mazzilli's private member's bill. I support the concept. What I don't support is a government that can't manage its legislative agenda any better than it manages the affairs of this province. This government, the Eves government, has a horrible record in this regard. I'll vote against time allocation because I would like to talk more about our public service workers: police, fire, ambulance. Thank you.

Mr Rosario Marchese (Trinity-Spadina): That is the point the previous speaker alluded to: we're dealing with time allocation. We often say here that these are strangulation motions. They strangle debate. That's the purpose of them. I have just got to say, Michael, in the old days when we were in power, in 1990, we used to take out bills for four weeks at a time. Whether it was good or bad for the government, we would take a bill out four weeks at a time. Imagine. Some people will call that truly, genuinely democratic, right?

You go out and you get a beating on any bill out there, because for every bill you put out, some people are going to love it and some people are going to hate it. It's just the way it is. And we used to love the punishment. We used to love to be punished by the public. You'd find a couple of friends there supporting your bills, but mostly you'd find a whole lot of people who just didn't like what you were doing. And Chris Stockwell used to love that. He used to love us taking stuff on the road so we could get flogged as regularly as possible.

Hon Mr Stockwell: Flattulated?

Mr Marchese: Flagellate: to whip. He was thinking of another term, which he deliberately misheard.

That's what we did. That's what democracy was about. It was about defending your policies and your bills. Whether people loved it or not, it was a matter of honour, a matter of an obligation for governments to at the time say, "People need to be heard." It's not happening any more.

I also have to say to my friend Michael, we tried at some point to change the rules. I wasn't happy with changing the rules. At some point there were a few members of our caucus who said, "It's just not right. It's not fair. They're not allowing us to govern." Quite clearly, for the first time in this place, having a New Democratic Party at its head was not a very pleasant feeling for Liberals and Tories. They just didn't like it. It was most odious to them, most unpleasant, most malodorous. So they would whack us from one end of the room to the other. We didn't like the punishment and at some point we said, "Holy cow, this really hurts." So at some point we changed the rules to try to govern, to be able to remind the public, "Hey, we're in power and we need to find a way to be able to pass the bills that we feel are important for the public; otherwise we're not governing." I've got to say, I was not very happy with those rule changes.

As if it were not enough, this government comes into power and they change the rules again, limiting our ability as opposition to be able to slow down the government when it misuses its power, when it deliberately doesn't want to hear from the public. When it amalgamated the city of Toronto and close to 80% to 85% of the public were saying, "We don't want to be amalgamated," this government didn't pay any attention. It's in those instances that the people, the opposition parties, the public in general ought to have the means to be able to defend themselves against a government that is dictatorial.

Ms Marilyn Mushinski (Scarborough Centre): And the issue is?

Mr Marchese: To Ms Mushinski, the issue is strangulating debate—time allocation—and the point of strangulating debate is to prevent the public, and the opposition, through whom the public is often represented, to prevent them—us—from saying what we need to say.

You heard our member Michael Prue earlier on. I know Mr Wettlaufer said we were slowing down this bill and we really don't want it to pass. That's not the case. We have supported this bill. It's not a bad bill. It's a modest bill that, yes, enhances safety for people who are doing a job out there on those roads. What it says is that motorists approaching an emergency vehicle with lights flashing at the side of the road will be required to "slow down and proceed with caution, having due regard for traffic," if they are driving on the same side of the highway. No problemo here. We are in agreement with that.

We are in disagreement with the proliferation of time allocation, strangulation motions. They proliferate like rabbits in this place. Every other day this government introduces yet another time allocation, strangulation motion. That's what we're opposed to, Minister of Labour. You see, it doesn't feel good after a whole while to say, "Oh, this is really important so we've got to strangle debate." Everything you do around this place is so important to you, isn't it, for which you need to strangle very tightly the debate? That's what we're against.

This is our only opportunity, as the member from Beaches-East York said earlier on. It includes a number of people such as firefighters and, yes, ambulances, but it does exclude school buses—these are the ones that have red lights—and it does exclude from this bill other folks who do important work, vehicles that have orange and blue lights, that presumably deal with safety on the road. It doesn't deal with road vehicles with blue lights—I don't know. The point is, whatever lights we've got out there on those highways, it should include them too as a matter of safety. It's not a big amount of work to be able to include a couple of other people for whom safety is an issue out there and for whom most of us, as legislators, have a concern about. So, Minister of Labour, we're not slowing this down.

Hon Brad Clark (Minister of Labour): Yes, you are.

Mr Marchese: You are the ones who are speeding these things up. Often you don't give us the time of day to debate any bills. In fact, for bills that are in opposition to you, bills that are unsavoury, you guys give a day or two for debate, you allow some of those bills to get out on the road for a couple of days, but we used to give you four weeks, Minister of Labour, as you fiddle your figures. We used to give you four weeks to beat us up. When we, the public, got to have the opportunity to beat you people up—because you well deserve it, with a nice long whip, very thin—because you deserve it, you give us a day, you give us half a day, you give us a couple of days, and that's the extent of my democracy to be able to beat you up good. But you know how to avoid the beating, because you don't like it; you know how to avoid it, how to dodge it. You know how not to bend over. You know how to fly and squirm away, to skulk away, slithering like serpents, hither and thither. You do that well.

Hon Mr Clark: Serpent. Look in the mirror

Mr Marchese: I'm a good-looking serpent. I give socialism a human face.

So what we're saying is—

Interjections.

Mr Marchese: They laugh.

Hon Mr Clark: Let's talk about the back-to-work legislation you stopped today.

Mr Marchese: Well, we're going to get to that. We're going to get to the back-to-work legislation. The Minister of Labour says, "We want local solutions." Very smart, very clever, for those who don't understand the issue. But if you don't give boards the money, they won't be able to negotiate locally. So the minister quite properly, of course, quite smartly says, "We want them to be able to negotiate, but since they haven't been able to, here we are, we're going to whack you back to work." Give them the money to be able to negotiate their agreements and then they can do it locally, right? That's the point, Minister of Labour.

Hon Mr Clark: Do you remember the social contract?

Mr Marchese: Oh, please. Ten years later these people reminisce about the good old days. I remember Mike Harris, Stockwell and Jim Wilson in the old days. They used to scream over here on this side, saying to Bob Rae, "You got the wheel, stop whining." Remember, Jim?

Hon Jim Wilson (Minister of Northern Development and Mines): We didn't use that line.

Mr Marchese: Yes, you did. The presiding officer of this place always used to stand up and say to Bob Rae, "Stop whining, you've got the limo. Don't blame the federal government," they used to say, "You're in charge."

Jim, I've got to tell you, seven good years you had, a good economy, and you're still whining about the federal government not giving you enough money to do this and to do that. Please, you've got so much money you don't know what to do with it. You're still whimpering about Chrétien not giving you a couple more dollars to do your job. Come on.

This is about strangulating debate. We don't like it, nobody likes it, because it hurts. So we're saying to you, "We oppose strangulation motions. We support this motion." We are saying, "You could have made it a little better by including other safety vehicles out there that deal with issues of safety." Then I'm sure the policemen and policewomen would support this action. They would probably support your including school buses under the protection of this bill.

Hon Mr Clark: You said the snowplow a minute ago.

Mr Marchese: Whatever it is, whatever deals with safety on the road should come under the aegis of this bill. You didn't include them. It's not a big deal. It would only take a couple of minutes. It takes no great mind, and you guys hire a lot of good lawyers out there, well-paid, including Guy Giorno, who's coming back to prepare you boys for the election.

You should consult Guy Giorno and say, "Guy, how can we make this bill a little bit better without it costing us any money?" It's not a big deal.

Anyway, at the end of the day, we're going to oppose the strangulation motion.

Hon Mr Wilson: How do you do this without a conscience?

Mr Marchese: Are you kidding, Jimmy? How am I doing this without a—OK, I want to hear you stand up and tell me how I'm doing this without a—

Interjections.

1650

Mr Marchese: He's talking about the back-to-work legislation. We're going to get to it, Jimmy, otherwise the Speaker is going to rule me out of order, because we can't talk about another bill as we're trying to talk about safety for kids on the highway.

Anyway, we will oppose strangulation motions, but we do support this bill, in spite of the fact that you could have made it a little better and it wouldn't have cost you a cent.

Ms Mushinski: It is, I must admit, a bit of a challenge to follow the member for Trinity-Spadina, because he does tend to contribute a considerable amount of colour to this place in terms of the rosy type of speeches he makes.

Interjection.

Ms Mushinski: No, I'm talking about "rosy" as in sort of pink-coloured—you know, the pinky coral colour that tends to be, I guess, attributable or attributed to those who represent certain political parties.

It is, as I say, a bit of a challenge to follow the logic of that somewhat flamboyant, if not inflammatory, speech of the member for Trinity-Spadina.

Let's face it, this is about protecting the interests of our police officers, firefighters and other emergency personnel who often find themselves in dangerous situations, especially if they happen to find themselves working at the side of very busy highways and byways and roadways in Ontario.

Regrettably, just yesterday a firefighter in central Elgin, near London, was badly injured when he was struck by a car while directing traffic at an accident scene. The firefighter happened to be standing on the shoulder of the road when he was struck by a car and landed in a nearby ditch. He had to be airlifted to hospital in London. While he is expected to recover, there was no reason for this accident to happen.

As my colleagues have indicated in this Legislature, the legislation that is under discussion certainly has the support of every party in this House, and we know it has the support of every organization whose workers will be affected—and is it any wonder? These outstanding men and women deserve our support and our protection, and that is what government should be doing.

Serious accidents on our major highways frequently force the closure of key thoroughfares for many hours. Disruptions that hold up traffic for hours can have major economic ramifications in addition to environmental and health impacts. We know that the Eves government is aware of this, and we have decided to take some decisive action.

The Ministry of Public Safety and Security's guideline on traffic management, enforcement and road safety, developed to support the adequacy standards regulations under the Police Services Act, requires police services to implement procedures that address road closures and minimize interference with the flow of traffic. This regulation came into effect on January 1, 2001. The Ministry of Public Safety and Security is committed to working with the Red Tape Commission's highway incident management task force and MTO's road safety personnel on initiatives that will enhance community safety.

The task force report has recommended that every effort be taken to reduce the time it takes to respond to and to clear accident scenes. Anyone who commutes in this huge urban region called the GTA knows that has to be addressed. It also recommended that emergency vehicles be, as much as possible, stopped off roadways or cleared off accident scenes.

Safer communities and enhancing community safety were also Blueprint and action plan commitments of our party. The Ministry of Transportation's action plan on safer roads also focuses on aggressive and unsafe driving, as well as improving driving habits and increasing seat belt use. In addition, the Ministry of Public Safety and Security has given communities the right to establish community safety zones, areas of roadways where public safety is of particular and special concern. They're generally set up near schools, daycare centres, retirement facilities and roadways in high-collision areas. Fines for moving violations in these zones are increased or doubled. I have to say that the city of Toronto council has done a commendable job in making sure that there is appropriate signage erected in these particular safety zones.

I think it's a known fact that this problem doesn't just exist here in Ontario. Jurisdictions worldwide face the same situation on a daily basis. In the United States, for example, more than 200 officers lost their lives in a similar fashion. That's why 16 American states and the province of Saskatchewan have enacted legislation similar to Bill 191 that's intended to protect these emergency workers. When police and firefighters and other emergency service personnel are focused on the accident or incident at hand, they really have little or no opportunity to address their own safety. The proposed legislation will protect these workers as they go about their jobs. Future deaths and injuries, we believe, can be minimized by enacting this legislation. That's why we need to do it quickly.

I can assure this House that the Eves government is serious in its quest to protect these people. That's why the penalties for not obeying the law, once enacted, will be serious. Few other jurisdictions have penalties as stiff as those that this government is proposing for those who fail to adhere to the law. Our message to those drivers who are inclined to disregard the law is clear: do so at your own risk. It will be expensive, you could lose your driver's licence and you might even end up in jail. Tough penalties? Absolutely. Our police, firefighters and other emergency services personnel deserve nothing less from us. By forcing drivers to slow down to a reasonable speed or, where it's feasible and safe to do so, move to the adjacent lane, we are protecting those whose job it is to protect us.

In conclusion, Mr Speaker, I know that you and all members of this assembly recognize that we are living in a time when our police and firefighters and other professionals who routinely respond to emergency situations have taken on a new and profound significance. We all stand to benefit if they do their job efficiently and safely. Because of the very nature of what they do, they're often placed in harm's way. There's no need to subject them to additional risk. They believe we can help their cause if this bill is passed. That's a view that our government shares, and I urge all members to support this legislation and to ensure its speedy passage by supporting this time allocation motion.

Mr Ernie Parsons (Prince Edward-Hastings): Never time to do it right; always time to do it over. Here's another bill that's being rushed through.

It's a good bill. What's in there, I have no quarrel with. The concept of protecting our police officers and our firefighters and our ambulance personnel: superb. I believe it was another member, from Windsor, who said earlier, though, why not seven years ago? Why now? The US has had legislation similar to this for many years; many of the other jurisdictions in Canada do.

Working on a highway or standing on the edge of a highway is extremely intimidating and, statistics tell us very clearly, extremely dangerous. I worked at one time for the Ministry of Transportation, when it really was a Ministry of Transportation and it did things instead of contracting out, not to low bidders, but to high bidders. But this doesn't go far enough.

The bill refers to having to move over for vehicles displaying an intermittent red light. Great stuff. In a rural community such as I represent, we have volunteer firefighters who often drive directly to the scene of the accident or the fire on the highway with their own personal vehicles, and they are displaying a flashing green light. According to this bill, there's no need to move over and provide them with safety; it must be an intermittent red light. I would say strongly that whether one is a full-time firefighter or a volunteer firefighter, they are entitled to the same protection. If this bill wasn't being rammed through on time allocation, there would have been an opportunity to make that amendment to protect our volunteer firefighters, but it's focusing too closely on just one group.

Tow truck drivers, service vehicles that have to stop: again, as a rural member I drive to Toronto on a great many occasions and I see a large number of vehicles, whether they be cars or trucks, broken down. There are times, particularly with transports, when they can't get very far off the highway. So the service personnel are forced to work almost on the edge of the road. They are going to be displaying an orange light. I think their lives are valuable; I think their safety is important. There is no provision in here for anyone having to do anything for someone displaying an orange light.

From my experience working on construction, it is absolutely terrifying working on construction if you are in a lane that's closed off, if you are working on the edge of a highway. The member for Brant some time ago introduced Bill 191, which would have doubled speeding fines for any vehicle going through a construction zone. It may not feel like one is driving very fast at 80 kilometres an hour through a construction zone when the regular speed is 100, but if you are that worker standing on the edge of the road, that is a very scary feeling. In the construction field, the people who work on our highways are in an extremely dangerous profession. We could do more for them too. We could do more to force traffic to recognize them.

All too often I see a little item in the paper, particularly the Toronto paper, about someone who broke down on the edge of a highway, got out and was struck by a car, or was struck trying to go across the lanes for help. In that case, although they wouldn't be displaying any light, I would suggest that if we're concerned about the safety of people on our highways, we would at the same time undertake an education program. People who break down on the edge of the 401 in Toronto often don't know what to do. They're panicky. They know they can't walk to a service station. In fact, thanks to self-serve stations, there aren't service stations to walk to any more to get assistance from a mechanic. I think we need to do an education program that would assist them.

I would even suggest that a lot of our highways could be made much safer by the simple act of paving the shoulders. Certainly it would reduce the accidents involving cars that happen to slip off the edge of the shoulder and hit the soft gravel and overturn. There are far, far too many people killed in Ontario for having simply let the wheel of their car go three or four inches off the edge of the pavement. There should not be capital punishment for losing control and drifting a little wee bit out of the lane. The government could greatly improve the safety on our highways by paving the shoulders. They would also make the highways themselves last longer, because with the solid surface pavement there, we're not going to get water running off the highway and freezing, expanding and deteriorating it. It requires some upfront money, but this government doesn't do the upfront money. It doesn't do things that are preventive or protective in nature. We bring children into care in this province, rather than doing things to keep them in their own homes, in far too many cases, where prevention would have eliminated the need for further expenditures down the road. We take the simple shortcut of, "Let's pay for it now." So I'm distressed at times with the number of accidents that occur in Ontario simply because we won't do the paved shoulders. The other jurisdictions in North America know that. We've lagged far behind.

Once again, we have time allocation. The government doesn't like to hear us talk about that, but I think perhaps a lot of Ontario doesn't realize the world in which we function here in the Legislature. It was naive on my part, but when I was elected here to Toronto I thought I would have the opportunity to bring the viewpoint of my constituents forward.

The democracy we live in is extremely fragile. The more we convey to people that they're not part of the system, that their vote or their opinion doesn't make a difference and nobody cares, the more we drive them away from democracy. We continue to see countries in the world where people are prepared to die to get some form of democracy that is maybe only half of what we have. People want to be involved in their community, they want to be involved in their province, but as we take away their opportunity to do that, they become disenchanted.

I learned very quickly in life that none of us are as smart as all of us. We need to hear the experts in the field. Many of the bills that are put forward through this House clearly reflect that the government hasn't even consulted before they do the legislation, let alone during the process when it goes through the House. We've seen this government try to do things either behind people's backs or simply outside of the House. The change in the pensions has been referred to. That wasn't going to be brought up by the government. Their hope was that it would sneak through on the omnibus bill and no one would notice it. The increases in long-term care—an increase that affected every member in every riding, whether on the government or the opposition side—were announced on a late Friday afternoon of a holiday weekend, rather than here in the Legislature to be debated.

I find it most distressing that when the Premier has new legislation to introduce, such as for the Electricity Act, rather than do it in this House, where the opposition could respond and where the media could hear and question, it is done in someone's living room or dining room. Everything is done to diminish the power of the Legislature. But the power in this Legislature is not the power that I possess as an MPP, or that any of us do—because we truly are servants of our constituents. It takes away the power of the citizens in our community, who want to be able to go to their member—and they may have an idea that would greatly improve the quality of life for everyone in Ontario or improve the efficiency, and they come to us as individuals, give us input, and trust us to have the ability to bring that forward and share it with the Legislature, whether in the chamber or at committees. People want to believe that they have full citizenship rights in this province. But instead, we see this government consistently saying, "We don't want to debate anything." Well, if you don't want to talk about something, there must be something in there that you're very ashamed of. Any good bill will withstand public scrutiny with no problem whatsoever.

We look on this current session, and in this current session 83.3% of the bills have been rammed through in a dictatorial style rather than a democracy. It is not an offence to the members in this chamber; it is an offence to the people of Ontario that continually, 83% of the time, this government is not interested in what they have to say. That is fundamentally wrong for democracy in Ontario.

Mr Levac: I'd like to express to the House my intention to discuss, on this time allocation motion, three issues in the time that remains for us.

First, in a nutshell, time allocation itself, the reality of what time allocation means: basically, the stopping of debate. In this case and in a lot of cases, what the government has been doing lately is no debate at third reading, which also steals more time from the people to speak their minds to the government of the day through their members of the provincial Parliament. The second is faulty legislation as a result of time allocation, and the third is this particular bill itself. I'll address this bill as quickly as I can and add a few points and a little ripple to what the government is saying is great legislation.

Let's start with the first thing—first things first. Time allocation is a new device that this government is using to extreme. It's not a new device for the House; it's a new device with which this government has been stifling democracy. I've got a couple of small points for us to hear and understand. I'll go back to the 32nd Parliament—Bill Davis and Frank Miller. From March 1981 to May 1985, there were three time allocations—just three. How many bills did they pass with full debate, disclosure and community hearings? Two hundred and ninety two. Three out of 292 is a very admirable record.

In the 33rd parliament, from May 1985 to September 1987—the Peterson minority government, in co-operation with the NDP—how many times was time allocation used? Obviously, with a minority government you have to be careful of that. Once, out of 129 pieces of legislation. In the 34th session, with a majority government, from September 1987 to September 1990: three time allocations in 186 pieces of legislation.

It goes on and on all the way through, until finally we get to the real issue. In the 36th and 37th Parliaments in the Harris years, from June 1995 to June 1999 we've got 35 time allocations, with only 118 pieces of legislation. Then in the 37th term from June 1999 to just July 2, we've got 46 time allocations with only 71 pieces of legislation. Today we've almost doubled that to almost 85% of our legislation using time allocation. Nasty stuff, that time allocation, because what we find out in that pension legislation—budget legislation—is that we even had the highest court in Ontario tell this government, "Wait a minute. You're barking up the wrong tree.

You've got to pull the plug." They're not even going to admit they want to pull the plug.

What's interesting about this is that even though they've got their fingers in the cookie jar, they're going to put their hand in the jar and walk around the kitchen with it and tell their mother, "No, I don't have my hand in the cookie jar. It's not there."

"Get your hand out of that cookie jar."

"OK, I will. I will, I will." And the hand is not out of the cookie jar yet.

They're not withdrawing that piece of legislation that could possibly take hundreds of millions of dollars out of our pensioners', our senior citizens' pockets. Unbelievable. That's what's faulty about this piece of legislation.

Admitting they're wrong and that they made a mistake would be a wonderful thing to happen. It's a piece of legislation that was pointed out in the middle of time allocation—no debate on third reading. When we bring these facts to the House they're still saying, "There's not a problem here. We're simply not going to proclaim it." But it's still going to exist. The problem is that that piece of legislation needs to be completely withdrawn from that omnibus bill and then reintroduced, if you think there's a problem to correct, before or after consultation. I want to point out very clearly to the people of Ontario, and it's really interesting, their claim on a regular basis, almost to a T: "We consulted." But guess how they do it?

They send out these consultation papers to everybody in the province and get their advice. Then they draft the legislation—they put it together—but they don't come back and say, "This is the piece of legislation we think we've got." They just simply hear the advice and then they stand up and say, "We consulted all the stakeholders, and they've told us what they want in the legislation." Well, kind of. They had no intention of listening, but they consulted. And when the legislation gets written, that's it. Time allocation, third reading, no debate; that's the problem with this. It's a process problem that they know exists but they don't want to use it. Why? Because it means they're going to have to take sober second thought on legislation they know is faulty. I shame them for it because they know they should be trying to pass legislation that is the best possible legislation with input from the opposition, with input from all the stakeholders and in particular from the citizens of Ontario. Why aren't they doing that? Because they know when they ram things through that it satisfies a smaller group of people who say, "That's good enough for me."

I want to move now straight on to the bill. We've made recommendations to this government. The Liberal Party will make this bill pass properly, but we're going to make sure you understand that the faults are there. We've pointed it out time and time again. I want to tell you, somebody on the other side made reference to the United States and talked about the toughest legislation around. It's not quite the way it is, because in my review of the four pages I received from the United States, they made it quite clear that there are up to six, eight months in jail for some of the offences. They also included some of the other faults that I pointed out.

All lights, all emergency flashing vehicles should be included. It's not in this legislation. In this bill, in Bill 191, it was pointed out quite clearly that it's only red and white alternate flashing lights. Quite frankly, there are many other types of flashing lights out there where we need to protect those people when they stop on the highways.

So what should we be doing? The member from the Wellington area likes the volunteer firefighters, I know he does. I do too. But they're not included in this bill because they use green. Green's not mentioned in the legislation.

Another piece that nobody on that side knows, because I pointed it out to him and he didn't have a clue, is that there are actually volunteer ambulance response vehicles that are not allowed to use green.

Mr Ted McMeekin (Ancaster-Dundas-Flamborough-Aldershot): Are you saying he's clueless?

Mr Levac: I'm making it quite clear that there are some problems in the legislation. But why are we debating this under time allocation, the stopping of the debate? We're trying to make sure they understand that there are problems with the bill. We're not here to hold up legislation; we're here to make it the best possible legislation it should be. There are people who need to be protected on these highways.

Quite frankly, for the past five years we've known the facts. We know that in other jurisdictions over 200 people have been killed doing their jobs; they're police officers. We know that. Quite frankly, I don't want to go through those cases again because I committed, for the dignity of those people, not to rehash those awful problems about their loved ones being killed on the highway. Suffice to say that the Liberal Party—Dalton McGuinty, myself and all of my colleagues—supports the type of legislation that this government is trying to do, but we're asking them to stop saying that we're trying to stall the legislation. We're not trying to stall the legislation; we're trying to make it better. Would you include all the different lights that are used on emergency vehicles, the plows?

In the jurisdictions I studied in the United States, almost every single one of them, to a T, included all emergency vehicles because a tow truck driver can get killed as well as anyone else could be out there but they're not flashing red lights.

Mr McMeekin: Why wouldn't they do that?

Mr Levac: I don't know. I asked them about that, and they're saying, "Well, just put it through and we'll take care of it. Put a lot of stuff through and we'll just take care of it." The people of Ontario are getting sick and tired of that promise.

Mr McMeekin: We saw that on hydro.

Mr Levac: We saw that on hydro; we saw that in the school boards; we saw that in the supervisors they assigned; we saw that in the most recent piece of legislation, the budget bill. "Trust us. We're not going to touch the pensions. Everything's going to be OK." But time after time, it's pointed out quite clearly we've got some problems with this legislation. I only ask that you take a look at these.

There are two other situations in there that I think this government should be looking at. This is a really good one, particularly for this bill, and that is the new evolution of studded tires. Believe it or not, studded tires have evolved past what used to be the destruction of highways with the use of metal clips. Rick Bartolucci from Sudbury offered us a piece of legislation in a private member's bill that would reintroduce studded tires. I know the Minister of Transportation is looking carefully at that because he knows the evolution of the studded tire has been improved so that there's no damage on the highways. In the Scandinavian countries they've reintroduced studded tires and they've dropped accidents by a large percentage. So we need to take a look at new innovation. Rick, what was it, 80% now?

Mr Bartolucci: Eighty per cent.

Mr Levac: Eighty per cent reduction in major accidents with the studded tire. That would help care and control of the car in the very bill we're talking about right now.

So it is a valuable exercise to try to get the government to see that there are things this particular piece of legislation should consider. But we get time allocation. Time and time again, as we've been pointing out, almost every single time they've introduced this there are problems with the bill and they have to retreat. I'm asking them, let's be proactive and get it right the first time. If you were to do that, you would get co-operation from this side more often. Instead of wasting time and telling us that we're wrong all the time, there are opportunities for them to improve the legislation, which also undoubtedly protects the citizens who work on the highways day in and day out.

Speaker, I want to thank you for the opportunity. Stop the closure stuff.

Mr Peter Kormos (Niagara Centre): New Democrats don't support this time allocation motion either. But what's most regrettable about this time allocation motion is that the government chose not only to cut off debate—all three parties support this legislation. So that, in and of itself, wasn't and isn't the most offensive or regrettable thing. The most regrettable thing is that the government in the course of the time allocation motion ensured that this bill would not see the light of a committee room. That is unfortunate.

The Police Association of Ontario, when they had their lobby here at Queen's Park just a short while ago, had this on their list of items that they were discussing with various caucuses—with the New Democratic Party caucus as well. I recall having been in the House with the Solicitor General, the Minister of Public Safety, when he railed about the need for this legislation to be passed. I addressed the police association reps who came to our caucus very directly. I said, "Look, the opposition members don't have the capacity to prolong debate. But what's most critical from your interests"—you, police officers' interests—"is that this bill go into committee."

I remain convinced that notwithstanding the purpose, the intent of the bill—and it's a laudable one; everybody has agreed with that proposition—the bill suffers from unenforceability. The contra-argument is made, "Well, the bill is merely designed to be symbolic. It's an educational tool." Let me put this to you, Speaker: it's not much of an educational tool if every time—the rare time—the charge gets laid, whoever it is gets charged walks away from provincial offences court with an acquittal, without an application of the somewhat high fines that reflect the seriousness of the offence. You want to educate the public? Pass a piece of legislation that if there's a violation, you can get a conviction, and have a few people walking around Ontario talking about how they got whacked by a justice of the peace for a $1,000 or $1,500 fine for not slowing down as they sped past a police cruiser with its red lights flashing on the side of whatever highway you want, whether it's the 406 down where I come from or Highway 3 or the QEW, what have you. That's public education.

One of the concerns that we had around this bill was that it was not a vicarious liability bill. You'll recall the amendments that were made to the Highway Traffic Act, as I recall it, around the failure to stop for the red lights that flash on a school bus. One of the problems that school bus drivers had was, as cars sped by them, they might have been able to get the licence plate number of the vehicle, especially if the car was passing them on the left-hand side. That was a scenario where it was almost impossible to ever identify the driver of the vehicle. So you can't charge, unless you have vicarious liability.

New Democrats have been advocating that this offence be a vicarious liability offence, where the licence plate number is sufficient identification to result in a conviction against the owner of the car or whoever else might come up and basically 'fess up to the crime. It's done with fail to remain at the scene of an accident under the Highway Traffic Act, for good reason. The fact is, somebody is usually taking off, speeding away. It's a rare occasion in a fail-to-remain case under the Highway Traffic Act that you can identify the driver. A police officer, whoever the crown attorney's or provincial prosecutor's witness is, has to be able to say, "It was that woman"—or that man—"who was driving that car that committed that offence," if you're going to charge that person.

New Democrats have pointed out that on this type of offence it's going to be virtually impossible for what will usually be police officer witnesses, in the case of police cruiser pullovers, to say, "It was that woman." They may have the licence plate number, but their ability to positively identify the driver as the offender is going to be seriously impaired. We're saying the bill should have gone to committee to consider an amendment to make it a vicarious liability offence. It's not unprecedented in terms of those types of offences.

Look, most police officers, if they're at the roadside, either you've got one police car pulling over a speeder in the most, I suppose, benign sorts of situations, and that police officer, by and large, is going to be put in a difficult position if he or she has to weigh, "Oh, do I abandon the"—I remember one time I got stopped for a Highway Traffic Act offence and as the police officer was talking to me a car went off the shoulder and rolled over. The police officer had to make a speedy choice as to who he—it was a male—was going to have to deal with. I was the one who didn't get the speeding ticket because the police officer had to attend to the more serious incident that happened literally while we were stopped by the shoulder of the road. The police officer is going to be in a difficult position. When a car speeds by, that police officer is going to jump back into his car, after he's stopped a speeder, to pursue the car that just went by. And if there's more than one police officer present—which implies that it's an even far more serious situation than just somebody being pulled over for speeding or no tail light, what have you—again, they're still going to be disinclined.

We New Democrats wanted to make this law better. I can't for the life of me understand why the government wouldn't have addressed that in the first instance, but New Democrats saw that fault, if you will, that defect in the bill, and wanted to make it better, wanted it to go to committee.

The other issue is this: it's police officers who have been injured and killed as they're attending to matters on the shoulders of the highways and various roads. I don't think there's a part of the province that hasn't been impacted by that type of incident. It's incredibly dangerous for anybody, but incredibly dangerous for a police officer who's there doing what he or she has to do on the shoulder of the road as cars speed by. But we raised, as did other opposition members, the prospect of considering whether other similar vehicles that are required to pull over to the side of the road with appropriate warning lights, be they the orange flashing lights of a road safety vehicle, be they the green lights of a volunteer firefighter's personal vehicle, be they the blue lights or white lights of a road-clearing vehicle—say, a road-clearing operator who has emergency flashing lights who has to get off to the side of the road and attend to a mechanical problem with the plow on the front or clear snow out from the mechanism underneath the vehicle—do those people not deserve the same level of courtesy that this bill requires? What about ambulance attendants? You can see that the bill is very specific, isn't it? The bill would seem to exclude an ambulance that's pulled over at the side of the road, or a firefighter, tending to a scenario on the side of the road. So we've suggested that this bill go to committee for those considerations.

It's not going to committee now. The government made that decision. The government, in this time allocation motion, had no fear of saying, "Oh, we daren't put it to the committee, because then the opposition members are going to prolong it or filibuster it in committee." No, because the government in this time allocation motion could have, as has been suggested to the government, indicated one afternoon, one day, or two afternoons, two days, of committee hearings so we could consider these things and hear from the stakeholders who would be impacted by such an amendment. The government chose not to do it.

I don't know if the government's going to proclaim this bill. How many pieces of legislation has this government passed—many of them with a whole lot of fanfare and publicity and PR and backdrops and photo ops, with ministers of all shapes, sizes and stripes and so on—and then failed completely to ever proclaim? I hope the police aren't being taken for a ride on this one by this government and I hope the government proclaims it.

My regret is that a first-year law student is going to go into provincial offences court and beat these charges. That's my concern. That isn't a very effective educational exercise when drivers get charged, because it's going to be the rare driver who gets charged because of the difficulty in apprehending these types of drivers from the very get-go. But when that driver does get charged and then the driver can beat the rap with relatively little effort, there isn't much of an educational exercise going on. That's unfortunate.

I've been involved in committees where committees have discovered defects in bills, have discovered ways of beefing up legislation and have found ways to make legislation better and in almost, dare I say it, a non-partisan spirit have ensured that that happens. I've also been in far too many committees, the majority of them, where efforts to clean up legislation are futile.

This is a bill that could have been improved in committee. The government chose not to do it. I don't see how opposition members, then, could take any responsibility for this bill failing to achieve the purposes it seeks. We support the proposition of creating a safer environment for police officers and other front-line emergency personnel—police officers, firefighters, ambulance workers. We regret this bill being proceeded with in this fashion by this government stands but a modest chance of achieving any new security and safety for those same front-line emergency personnel.

The Acting Speaker: The floor is open for further debate. The government House leader.

Hon Mr Stockwell: I can't. I introduced the bill. I'm sorry.

The Acting Speaker: Very well. Then the floor now goes to the member for Durham.

Mr John O'Toole (Durham): I was actually looking forward to the government House leader standing up, because he's usually quite entertaining and informative, I might add, as well.

It's my pleasure to stand on behalf of Minister Runciman this afternoon on Bill 191, An Act to amend the Highway Traffic Act to ensure the safety of emergency vehicles stopped on a highway and people who are outside a stopped emergency vehicle. If you listen to the debate, I think all members from all sides will be supportive of this bill because, as the minister said in his opening statement, the day the police associations were here was really a day of celebration.

The preamble to the bill probably tells the viewer today all that's really needed to be said.

"The bill amends the Highway Traffic Act to require drivers approaching an emergency vehicle that is stopped on a highway with its red light flashing to slow down and to move into a lane not adjacent to the vehicle if it is safe to do so. A person who contravenes these requirements will be guilty of an offence punishable, for a first offence, by a fine of $400 to $2,000 and for subsequent offences, by a fine of $1,000 to $4,000, or to imprisonment for a maximum of six months, or to both a fine and imprisonment. The court that convicts a person of an offence may also suspend his or her driver's licence for a maximum of two years."

Clearly, these are very severe consequences for not respecting the hard work, and important work, that our front-line officials on the highway perform.

We could go on, but there are a couple of things I want to put on. As you've heard from my colleagues, this proposed legislation is endorsed by all the people it is meant to protect. We have the support of the Police Association of Ontario, which represents more than 20,000 front-line police officers in the province; the Ontario Provincial Police Association membership; the Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police, with whom I met about a month ago; the Ontario Association of Police Services Boards; the Ontario Safety League; the Fire Fighters Association of Ontario; the Ontario Professional Fire Fighters Association; the Ministry of Transportation; the Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care; and the list goes on.

I'd like to take a moment to read into the record comments made in a letter to Public Safety and Security Minister Bob Runciman by Brian Adkin, president of the OPPA. Mr Adkin and his front-line OPP officers, who face danger every day on our 400-series highways, are appreciative of what the Eves government is doing to protect them as they go about their daily, and difficult, routines.

Mr Adkin writes, "We believe the legislation being proposed by Minister Runciman is a potential lifesaver that will help protect our members in the line of duty."

"Our members are keenly aware of the dangers they face from motorists when they are stopped on the shoulders of Ontario's high-speed, high-traffic routes, especially the 400-series highways."

"We have had several officers killed on the shoulder of the road in the line of duty by drivers plowing into them. Each day my members face an unprecedented danger as vehicles, including tractor-trailers, pass them within inches at speeds up to 140 kilometres per hour."

"This is a very important health and safety issue to our members. We police all multi-lane 400-series highways in Ontario. We ask for your support to protect your OPP officers and my members."

Mr Adkin's letter brings home the dangers these men and women face each and every shift, each and every day. They are fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, sons and daughters. Those in this House who have family members serving as police officers, firefighters or in other life-threatening jobs know what Mr Adkin is speaking about.

Allow me to remind you of the distressing circumstances and statistics you heard just a little while ago, lest we forget why it's important that Bill 191 receive all-party support this evening. It's an important statement. I know there are members on all sides of the House who want to go off the record and make their own little tirade, but this is a simple statement, as I read in the preamble. It needs all-party support to show the support that our front-line people have.

In the past five years, OPP officers have been killed in the line of duty as a direct result of motor vehicle collisions when their cruiser was stopped on the shoulder of the highway. Between 1998 and 2000, 78 parked and/or stopped ambulances, 69 fire and 819 police vehicles were involved in motor vehicle collisions in Ontario; nine police vehicles were involved in fatal collisions; 237 emergency vehicles were involved in collisions that resulted in injuries; and 720 vehicles were involved in collisions that resulted in property damage only, fortunately.

Commercial drivers are already taught to move over for stationary vehicles at the side of the road, but the driving public will need to be educated to help them understand what is expected and to recognize what to do should the situation present itself as they go about their daily business.

As has been pointed out, the Ministry of Transportation is committed to improving the safety of all road users and to developing strategies that enhance the safety of emergency service personnel.

When police, firefighters and other emergency service personnel are focused on the incident at hand, they have little or no opportunity to address their own safety. The proposed legislation will protect these workers as they go about their difficult but important jobs.

Future deaths and injuries can be minimized and potentially eliminated by enacting this legislation, and the sooner the better, especially as we enter the winter season where the likelihood of emergency personnel and police and firefighters having to respond to accident situations is increased at this time of year.

I can assure the House that the Eves government is serious in its quest to protect these very people. That's why the penalties for not obeying the law, once enacted, will be serious. Few other jurisdictions have penalties as stiff as these that this government is proposing for those who fail to adhere to the law. Our message to the drivers who are inclined to disregard the law is clear: "Do so at your own risk. It will be expensive. You could lose your driver's license and you might even end up in jail. Clearly, pull over and avoid the dangers." Tough penalties, absolutely. Our police, firefighters and other emergency personnel deserve nothing less from each of us in this House.

In closing, I would ask the honourable members to remember the OPP officers who have been killed in recent years while on duty patrolling our provincial highways. While they will live on in our thoughts, through their names being placed on the police memorial just outside this very building, let us ensure that they didn't die in vain. I would encourage each member of the House to stop and think before they vote on this very serious Bill 191. Stop and show respect. We expect the best from our emergency personnel and it's only right that we, too, do the right thing. It's time to do it.

In the remaining time left, I'm hoping our former Solicitor General will get up, because he's worked long and hard, and I'm anxious to hear Mr Tsubouchi's response to this important bill before us today.

Hon David H. Tsubouchi (Chair of the Management Board of Cabinet, Minister of Culture): I thank the member for sharing his time. I asked if I could have some time to speak on this very important issue as a former Solicitor General. I must say—and you know as well, Speaker, as a former Solicitor General yourself—that it's certainly a privilege and an honour to work with the men and women who represent us in the Ontario Provincial Police.

It was my unfortunate duty, I guess, and the toughest thing when you are Solicitor General, to have to attend police funerals. It's a very difficult thing to do. On my watch, unfortunately, we lost three OPP officers: Sergeant Marg Eve on June 9, 2000; Constable James McFadden on December 31, 1999; and Constable Chuck Mercier on September 30, 1999.

What I want to bring to this very important bill is the fact that we're dealing with an important safety measure. It's a measure that will save and protect our police, our emergency workers, but it also has a huge personal and human impact. I think you only see that when you see the effects it has on the families of these officers who go out and protect us day to day and put their own safety behind our safety as civilians. You would not think, if you were married to a police officer, either the husband of a police officer or the wife of a police officer, that when your spouse goes to work and they are on traffic, there is a greater risk that they will be killed than if they were working undercover on organized crime or with the drug squad, something that you would think might carry a huge amount more danger than going out in traffic. But the reality is that many officers, not only in the OPP but in municipal forces across this province and across this country, are at a great deal of risk because there are people who drive on the roads who are careless and treat emergency situations in a very poor way.

I would want to say this: when Marg Eve was in this crash, along with her team, Constable Patti Pask and Constable Brad Sakalo—all from the Chatham division, by the way—I visited the hospital with her family as we were waiting with her. Her husband was there, her sister—all her family. There must have been about 12, 14 or 15 people in that waiting room. You see the real impact it has on the family. They were waiting to find out what was going to happen to Marg. When the bad news came, there was a real human response to that. Once again, here's someone who devotes her entire life to protecting you and me, and yet people tend to forget these families.

It was the same thing when we attended the funeral of Jim McFadden. It was a very cold day. He was killed in December, so it was January. We were at the funeral, in the cemetery. He had a couple of really fine sons who were taking care of his wife, and I still remember a very touching moment when one of the boys took off his jacket to give to his mother in this very cold cemetery.

That is why this is so important. This particular law really points out the things we should do out of common sense and that we don't do. To any of us who are on the highways and see that there is a police car on the side of the road, lights flashing, it's very evident that you should be cautious when you are approaching this particular situation, and yet people continue to speed by. In some cases, because they are watching the police car at the same time and they are distracted, this is what occurs.

This is just a commonsensical bill. It's a bill that is a long time coming. It's not simply police officers, as I said, but firemen and ambulance attendants. All are in very dangerous and tenuous situations as a result of all of this.

I will say this, though, just to talk on the upbeat side of all this. Of course, Marg Eve was in the hospital in London, and both Patti Pask and Brad Sakalo were in the Chatham hospital, so I went and visited them in the hospital. Patti had a broken pelvis, I was told, and was in very serious condition. When I knocked on her door to see whether I could come in, she was up in a walker—this was the day after—on a walker. I said, "Why are you on a walker?" She says, "Well, I've got to get back to work. I want to do what I can to get back to work." That's the kind of dedication these folks have.

When I saw Brad—and Brad, of course, was flat on his back. He was in casts all over the place with serious injuries in multiple places. I still remember this because it was very touching. I had a chance to chat with Brad for a while and see how he was and he said to me, "Will you do me a favour, Mr Solicitor General?" I said, "Well, certainly. What can I do for you?" He said, "Well, would you sign this piece of paper?" I said, "Why do you want me to do that?" He says, "No one will believe you were actually here. I want to share this with the guys and sort of laugh about it." Later on at Marg's funeral, in the condition that these officers were in, Brad was wheeled in on a gurney, just to be there with his fellow officer.

So there's a real brotherhood there. We have an obligation as legislators to make sure that people who protect us, our emergency workers, all of them—whether ambulance workers, whether they're paramedics, whether they're firemen or whether they're police officers—have as much protection as we can possibly give to them.

This is a bill that was a long time coming, I believe, and I'm really hoping that everyone will support it. I believe they will. It's a good thing for all of us out there to make sure that our officers and our firefighters and emergency workers are all protected.

But there are many other things that we can be doing and should be doing for our police. The good news is, I know that when I've been here as Solicitor General I've had a great deal of support from all members of the House on bills I've brought forward—whether it was the Sergeant Rick McDonald bill, whether it was the sex offender registry—that people here seem to get past the parochial type of political playing that we do from time to time. When we have a serious bill that has huge public safety implications, somehow people are able to see past all the baloney that goes on from time to time and see real issues and are supporting issues that are really important for the men and women who protect you and me out there, day to day.

Speaker, I'm very happy to be here to support this bill, and I hope everyone here does as well.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

FUNERAL, BURIAL AND CREMATION SERVICES ACT, 2002

LOI DE 2002

SUR LES SERVICES FUNÉRAIRES ET LES SERVICES D'ENTERREMENT ET DE CRÉMATION

Mr Hudak moved second reading of the following bill:
Bill 209, An Act respecting funerals, burials, cremations and related services and providing for the amendment of other statutes / Projet de loi 209, Loi traitant des funérailles, des enterrements, des crémations et des services connexes et prévoyant la modification d'autres lois.

Mr Michael Gravelle (Thunder Bay-Superior North): On a point of order, Mr Speaker: I don't believe we have quorum this evening.

The Acting Speaker (Mr David Christopherson): Would the table please check and see if we have quorum.

Clerk at the Table (Ms Lisa Freedman): A quorum is not present, Speaker.

The Acting Speaker ordered the bells rung.

Clerk at the Table: A quorum is now present, Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Quorum now being present, we'll go back to the minister for the order of the day.

Hon Tim Hudak (Minister of Consumer and Business Services): Mr Speaker, I am splitting my time this evening with a couple of other members—Mr Gill and, I believe, Mr Wettlaufer as well—who are anxious to contribute to the debate.

Mr Rob Sampson (Mississauga Centre): What are you hiding?

Hon Mr Hudak: Of course, Mr Sampson is welcome to contribute if he feels the desire. I know he has really kept up to date on this issue.

I'm pleased to speak tonight upon second reading of the proposed Funeral, Burial and Cremation Services Act, 2002, also known as Bill 209. As members of the House will know, this bill is a companion piece to Bill 180, the proposed Consumer Protection Statute Law Amendment Act, 2002, also known as CP21, consumer protection for the 21st century, which is currently before this House. This is a package that is part of a comprehensive consumer protection agenda that is the most ambitious ever proposed in the province of Ontario and is being proposed by the Ernie Eves government.

Bill 180, as members here this evening know, proposes to update a set of consumer protection laws that were passed back in the 1960s and 1970s, a time when computers were the size of Mack trucks, owned only by NASA scientists, colour TVs were a luxury item, and the Internet was simply the stuff of science fiction.

The world has changed. Business practices have changed. Culture has changed in the province of Ontario. That's why it's important to change our legislation to keep astride of emerging business practices and cultural evolution. Just like in the consumer protection bill, Bill 180, in the bereavement services sector our legislation is in need of updating. In fact, our legislation with respect to bereavement is even older. It was brought forward to the Legislature almost an entire century ago. Mr Speaker, you won't remember, but I'm sure you have read that 100 years ago people were commonly still driving a horse and buggy. The Wright brothers were making their first flight. Obviously, lifestyles and customs have changed significantly since then, and we need to update our bereavement sector laws accordingly.

I'll give you a couple of examples. In today's Ontario, we see more people choosing cremation as an option, very much unheard of, or very rare, in those days when the legislation was brought forward in earlier sittings of this Legislature. In the last 10 years or so alone, it has grown from 28% of services to almost 40% in 2000. Similarly, there's an emerging and growing demand for simple or "no-frills" bereavement services.

There's no doubt, as we can see every day in the province, that today's Ontario is far more diverse and multicultural than it was 10 years ago, let alone 100 years ago, when the legislation was first brought forward. Members of different religions and different cultures are looking for bereavement services that meet their needs and reflect their traditions.

It only makes sense that our laws governing this sector must be modern and flexible to respond to how times have changed. As with our broader consumer protection package in Bill 180, our goals with this bill are twofold and they are complementary. We want to provide excellent consumer protection to the people of Ontario, and we want to level the playing field so that businesses can continue to grow and prosper in this province under fair and equal competition.

Mr Sampson: Where's the hideout?

Hon Mr Hudak: I don't want to hide anything in this legislation. I want to come forward and let members know what Bill 209 contains.

First of all, for those watching at home and those in the assembly who want to learn more about this bill, I'll describe why this legislation is needed. No doubt bereavement is a difficult topic for most of us. It's a topic that most of us put off thinking about until, unfortunately, a loved one dies and we can no longer avoid dealing with this very sensitive issue.

As MPPs, we all know the providers back in our home ridings, and we all agree that bereavement services is a very unique type of business. People are in a very vulnerable grieving state when they make purchases in this sector. Often they will have little or no experience in dealing with bereavement services, and they must make these difficult and sensitive decisions rather quickly during a time of great stress for the family and friends of the deceased.

With all of these factors, combined with the significant expenditure involved in a funeral and cemetery service, our government believes this area calls for special attention and consideration; hence the bill in debate this evening. It's also why it's important in this discussion to talk about protections for consumers to make sure they have fair dealing practices at this very difficult and sensitive time.

A bit about the industry. Bill 209 not only protects consumers; it provides fair rules, allows for new business models reflecting the evolving culture in the province, and creates a level playing field for businesses that work in this sector. Furthermore, as I always say with consumer protection, by strengthening confidence that people—taxpayers and consumers—have in a particular industry, it also helps those businesses to thrive.

I know there are many honest and hardworking service providers in the bereavement sector. Back home in Fort Erie, Beamsville and Dunnville, they are all very honourable people doing a great deal of hard work and doing their best to help people at a difficult time in their lives. I would expect members in the assembly would give the same indication from those they have worked with in the bereavement sector.

Most of us naturally think of funeral homes when considering bereavement services. Funeral homes, as we all know, make up an important part, but just part, of the bereavement services sector altogether. In fact, today there are approximately 550 funeral homes across Ontario, 5,000 cemeteries, approximately 60 monument retailers, and several other types of businesses, such as casket retailers and transfer services, among others, that all work to provide services to consumers after the death of a loved one.

There's no doubt that diversity characterizes the participants in the bereavement sector. Funeral establishments, as I mentioned earlier, tend to be private, for-profit businesses, but on the cemeteries side we have private businesses co-existing with religious, not-for-profit and municipal cemeteries across the province. In that context, this legislation would allow for new business models and working more closely together so they can continue to grow and create jobs and respond to consumer demand in the evolving culture in Ontario.

Certainly legislation of this complexity and this history would not come about without a great deal of consultation in the sector, meaning those who are involved in the business, those who are representatives here in the assembly as part of the debate, and of course consumer groups as well who advocate on behalf of consumers who encounter the bereavement sector during difficult times. It's been a very extensive and lengthy process of consultation, but it has been essential, given the sensitive and complex nature of this type of industry.

The consultations to date have arrived at a consensus in principle on the direction the legislation should take, with the assistance of many people both within government and from a variety of service and consumer groups. I'll give you a bit of background on this process to update the members on where we have been and how we got to this point. In 1998, the member from Markham, then-Minister Tsubouchi, who is with us this evening, asked the Red Tape Commission to consult with businesses, organizations and consumers to prepare a report of advice. I want to thank the members of the Red Tape Commission, who did an outstanding job and a great deal of work in consulting with those in this industry and consumers. In fact, sitting next to me tonight is Steve "Cookie" Gilchrist, one of those members—vice-chair or co-chair—

Mr Steve Gilchrist (Scarborough East): I'm demoted?

Hon Mr Hudak: Sorry, co-chair, of the Red Tape Commission; his colleague Gary Stewart, who has a great deal of knowledge in this business; Joe Spina, John O'Toole and Marcel Beaubien, among others, whose report, a number of years ago, set the stage for this proposed legislation now before the assembly and who offered the benefit of their esteemed counsel and research during the consultation process. Again, we're indebted to your efforts.

Shortly thereafter, then-Minister Bob Runciman retained former Justice—esteemed Justice—George Adams to conduct mediation in this process to bring the sides together in response to the recommendations that he had received. In fact, that was continued in the summer of 2001, when my immediate predecessor in this portfolio, the lovely and talented Norm Sterling, himself met with many consumer groups and organizations in the bereavement services community to explore the needs of both consumers and service providers.

An advisory group of consumers, service providers and government came to be known as the Bereavement Sector Advisory Committee, or BSAC as I'll refer to them throughout my remarks. They worked toward finding a consensus on how to move the industry forward into the 21st century based on the advice they've had to date. With the assistance of the Honourable Justice George Adams, meetings of BSAC, which involved 15 organizations and 30 members sitting around the table, through facilitation came out with some very important, well-thought-out and principled recommendations for legislation.

I want to be clear about the BSAC process. It included a diverse group of members, including representatives from the funeral services industry, monument builders, cemeteries, casket retailers, transfer services, retailers, the Consumers Council of Canada, of course representatives from the ministry who had worked with the sector for some time and the Canadian Federation of Independent Business as well as religious organizations. Certainly no one can deny the importance of the faith community when it comes to bereavement services.

I mentioned it upon first reading and again want to, on the record, as we begin second reading, personally thank the Honourable George Adams for his efforts and echo his sentiment that the level of professionalism and commitment to finding common ground demonstrated by all of the participants in those discussions has helped us, helped him and helped us, the government, in moving this important initiative forward into the Legislature. As I indicated in the description, it was a long time coming, and a great deal of work has been done to this point.

I shouldn't forget to thank a lot of hard-working staff as well with the Ministry of Consumer and Business Services. Certainly Rob Dowler, Alice Young, Deborah Brown, Gary Demers, Joe Richer, Beverley Wise and Joan Spence, among others, have provided a great deal of effort and assistance throughout the process and have been with this piece of legislation for many years.

Of course, it would not be a fair discussion of the bereavement sector without mentioning the continuing importance and the historical role of the religious community in bereavement services. Certainly that was an important part of the consultations and a result of the consultations: the need to respect and to support religious traditions and sensitivities, especially given not only the history but the emerging diversity of religions in the province of Ontario. This bill is designed to allow religious groups to partake in the rights and rituals surrounding death as they always have. We're not, members of the assembly, to presume that we could override some 2,000-year-old ceremony built on great tradition and religious belief. In fact, we want to support the continuation of those important religious activities. The importance of the faith groups in bereavement sectors cannot be understated.

We have already consulted extensively. I intend, if this bill is passed by the assembly and as reforms go forward through the regulatory process and beyond, to continue to ensure that the religious communities are consulted and that their feedback and concerns are heard and acted upon.

So there's a bit of an introduction, an overview of the industry as a whole, and an indication of how we got to this point of second reading this evening, on November 25, 2002. As I mentioned, Minister Tsubouchi began this process in 1998. The legislation was first introduced in the Legislature almost a century ago.

Here's an overview of some of the provisions in the proposed legislation that I think are very important to protect consumers and to level the playing field for business.

First of all, I'll start with the consumer protection side of the legislation. The BSAC group, the consultation panel, the consensus panel, identified no less than 18 provisions to strengthen consumer protection. These 18 provisions, to a one, have been embraced in the proposed legislation, Bill 209. They range from very simple things like "consumers should have easy access to pricing and product information"—that makes a lot of sense. We want to make sure that consumers, whether a widow grieving for a lost husband, a son or daughter grieving the loss of a parent, have the proper pricing and product information to make a decision under very complex considerations.

Similarly, other parts of the consumer protection initiative include a code of ethics—for example, to help protect consumers against high-pressure sales tactics. Maybe they were looking at doing a budget-oriented funeral service. There is a concern we hear from time to time about being moved to, so to speak, a Cadillac type of service when they can only afford, despite their willingness to send off their loved one as well as possible, a budget provision. We want to make sure that high-pressure sales tactics and misrepresentation will not take them to some place that they could not afford to go or their loved one would not have wanted them to go in the first place.

I'll give you another example of a practice that will be restricted even further if this bill is passed into law. It will enable restrictions on telemarketing and solicitations that could be considered aggressive or unethical, such as calls to homes for the aged, a practice that I think very few members of the assembly, if any, would support. We want to make sure that these types of solicitations maintain a high level of ethics. There's an example of some of the consumer protection initiatives that are part of the proposed Bill 209.

Secondly, we want to ensure that there is a level playing field between different types of businesses that are in this field. Currently, I don't think anybody in the assembly would argue with the statement that there is an uneven playing field, as we speak today, in the bereavement sector. I'll give you some examples to help us better understand the importance of Bill 209.

I know the member from Stoney Creek supported Bill 209 on its first reading, and I hope that with these examples I'll convince him to continue his support as we go through second reading. I appreciate his open mind.

Visitation centres are currently unregulated because technically they're not funeral homes as defined by the current act, the current act being almost a century old. Unlike funeral homes, visitation centres do not need to be licensed; they operate in a bit of a grey area in the law. They can be located on cemetery grounds, which confers an advantage to them if somebody was looking to do their entire rite, so to speak, in one place. But because cemetery lands are excluded from municipal property taxes currently, on-site visitation centres are actually tax-exempt. So not only do they not have to comply with the code of ethics and the rules behind funeral parlours, similarly they are also tax-exempt, which conveys a business advantage to them. But consumers using the visitation centres would not have the same types of protections that exist currently for funeral homes. They can offer similar services to funeral homes, except for embalming, but the same protections do not exist.

I know my colleague across the floor was looking to address this in his Bill 54, if I recall—and hopefully he'll be satisfied with the approach today—to make sure that if it's a visitation centre or a funeral home, you'll have high standards, a code of ethics and protections in place for consumers, and that if there's a funeral home across the street on Main Street and a funeral home on a cemetery property, they should pay the same taxes. It's only fair to the business model, that principle of a level playing field throughout this legislation.

If the legislation is passed, we would include visitation centres within the definition of funeral establishment, meaning that just like funeral homes they would have to be licensed, they would have to pay municipal property taxes and they would have to meet the exact same high standards of service and ethics as the funeral service director across the street. Most importantly for consumers, this would mean they could expect the same high level of service regardless of whether it's a visitation centre or a funeral home. Probably for most consumers it's an apples-to-apples comparison. It's only fair that the same high standard of care, the same code of ethics and the same consumer protection initiatives make sure fair dealing results would occur whether it's a funeral home or a visitation centre. For businesses, this means a level playing field in business practices and in taxation, which is something they've been asking for for some time.

Mrs Margaret Marland (Mississauga South): And the same licensing.

Hon Mr Hudak: And the same regime in its approach with respect to licensing, with respect to code of ethics, as I mentioned. I appreciate the member for Mississauga's support on that.

As I said, 100 years or so ago, when the legislation was first introduced, you had the Cemeteries Act and the funeral services act. There are other types of service providers who are not really adequately covered by legislation and hence work in an unregulated environment, which, as I said, can be problematic in a unique and sensitive industry if abuses occur.

Bill 209 proposes to license new groups that operate in this field. For example, marker and casket retailers currently operate in an unregulated environment. Quite frankly, this is a hole in the current consumer protection framework that we aim to correct through this bill. We believe it is important for consumers to be protected when purchasing caskets or grave monuments, as they are for other bereavement services. It's the goose and the gander argument—

Hon Brad Clark (Minister of Labour): The gander and the goose.

Hon Mr Hudak: —or the gander and the goose—equal treatment. There would be similar consumer protection initiatives when purchasing caskets or grave monuments as there are for other bereavement sectors, because these are similarly large purchases at a very vulnerable time in someone's life.

We're joined by some representatives from that industry today, and I want to commend them and thank them for their work, because the casket-making and grave marker industries have recognized this and have asked to be regulated as services in the funeral and cemetery sectors are, and voiced that through that BSAC consultation process. I thank them and welcome them here this evening.

As I said, for consumers these new licensing requirements will provide assurance that all bereavement supplies and services would be sold by qualified practitioners who meet the professional and educational standards appropriate for their sector of the industry and licensed facilities right across the province.

Combinations and alternative options: the proposed legislation, Bill 209, would set out conditions under which combined cemeteries and funeral homes would be permitted. I talked earlier about visitation centres. This is happening today in Ontario, but it's happening in an unregulated environment with an uneven playing field and a lack of protections for consumers who deal with visitation centres on cemetery properties. Under current legislation, by the letter of the law, it is not permitted to locate a funeral home on the site of a cemetery or to have a crematorium in a funeral home. That's prevented by the old legislation; it says those two must be fully separate business.

As I said, the reality is that in many ways there's a grey area, and this line has been crossed in the name of these visitation centres, which the member opposite had tried to address in Bill 54. In fact, Ontario is currently one of only two provinces, along with Prince Edward Island, that does not recognize and try to regulate this emerging business practice and try to bring protections to consumers. Similarly, by making this change, we bring Ontario's laws in line with eight other provinces and 40 US states and recognize what is happening anyway in the province by providing the proper regulatory framework to protect consumers.

I mentioned earlier that under current legislation, visitation centres are able to locate on cemetery grounds because, since they're not technically funeral homes under the old legislation, they fall outside a legislative framework. Under Bill 209, while we are bringing visitation centres under the definition of funeral establishments, we are allowing combinations so they can continue to operate within existing cemeteries. So again, it's an apples-to-apples situation, having the same level playing field and the same types of protections for consumers, whether it's in a cemetery or on Main Street.

Traditional funeral homes would also be able to locate on cemetery grounds or combine with a crematorium or scattering ground on one site. This would help consumers who, in a vulnerable time after a loved one has died, might prefer to make all their arrangements in one place. We would give them that option—

Hon Mr Clark: One-stop shopping.

Hon Mr Hudak: —one-stop shopping, as the member from Stoney Creek describes it—but, under that option, a regulatory framework to protect them at this vulnerable time.

Importantly, the proposed legislation would, with some exceptions, prohibit what is known as tied selling. Tied selling, which we deal with in consumer protection legislation on a regular basis, is a practice whereby consumers have to purchase a package in an all-or-nothing proposition to them.

Hon Mr Clark: That doesn't seem fair.

Hon Mr Hudak: It doesn't seem fair. In fact, we have complaints about this where somebody who is buying a service is told they can only buy the gravestone from a particular site, and if they don't buy the gravestone from that site, there's an additional administrative fee put on top. We don't agree with that.

Hon Mr Clark: That's shady.

Hon Mr Hudak: Well, it's an unfortunate practice, because it doesn't give consumers full knowledge and full choice as to where they can buy the services for their loved one.

Let me give you an example: a cemetery might expand into also providing grave markers, but the cemetery would not be able to refuse to install or accept a marker from another company. If the legislation is passed, they cannot tie the consumer's hands so that he or she must buy the grave marker from that particular cemetery. We want to give consumers the choice to deal with an operator they're most comfortable with and will get the best quality and price from. If the consumer wants to buy a grave marker from a shop of great reputation that has supplied the family for generations or shop for one that offers a better price or quality, he or she would be able to do just that if this legislation is passed.

Prepaid services: increasingly, people want to make arrangements for their own funerals while they are healthy, because frankly they want to avoid burdening their loved ones at some future date; in fact, that's often recommended by people in this field. It's a difficult decision for your loved one to make in grieving one's loss. Often it's encouraged to try to make those arrangements ahead of time to relieve that burden and also to give an indication of what type of service you would like once you pass away. The proposed legislation would protect the rights of people who want to pre-purchase bereavement products or services.

It would also provide a 30-day cooling-off period for consumers who purchase goods and services. So if they felt they were a victim of a high-pressure sales tactic or, on sober second thought, changed their mind within the cooling-off period, they would be able to get out of that deal, no questions asked—for example, if they had second thoughts about one of these prepaid package deals. The proposed cooling-off period is consistent with rules set out for other prepaid services in our companion package, Bill 180, the brother of Bill 209, which also has cooling-off periods.

Hon Mr Clark: CP21.

Hon Mr Hudak: CP21, exactly; consumer protection.

The bill also provides for new trust requirements. The money a consumer pays would have to be held in trust by the service provider, so that if the company goes out of business and can't make good on the contract, the consumer's money would not be lost. It would come back. It's a very important protection, because this could be a substantial investment for someone. If it cannot be conferred by the contract, it would come back through the trust requirements.

In addition, this bill provides for the resale of grave plots or scattering rights. Scattering rights is an evolving practice—it has existed for a while, but it is evolving; for example, if you were cremated and you preferred your ashes to be scattered in a particular area or scattering ground. In this bill we contemplate the ability to resell that plot or scattering right at market value. The fact of the matter is, unfortunately, under the current legislation in the province today—not this bill; the existing legislation—if you bought a grave plot 20 years ago and you moved or changed your mind and you were to resell it today, you would only get back the price of what you paid 20 years ago. It's not fair. You would lose out on the inflationary value. You would have put the money into that 20 years ago but only would receive, say, $1,000 back, but if you had invested that money or bought it today, it would be worth, say, $2,000.

We are going to remedy that under Bill 209, if passed, to make sure that consumers would get the purchase price in modern prices if they chose to change their mind in this type of prepaid service. Even if they bought it 20 years ago, they would get the current value of that asset. I think that's only fair.

Disclosure: under the proposed Funeral, Burial and Cremation Services Act, 2002, consumers would have more information about the choices available through the disclosure and consumer education requirements. We want to make sure—I talked about this a bit earlier and, as I said, I think that the vast majority of funeral service and cemetery providers, monument retailers and such are very honest, legitimate dealers who look out for consumers' concerns, but we shouldn't be shy from admitting the fact that we do get complaints about this to the ministry or to the board from time to time. Anecdotally, we've heard the same thing.

For example, to get to the point, we want to ensure that consumers are not shown only the most expensive or gold-plated packages or services, which can make them believe that it's the only package available or that the loved one would have wanted it that way. It's unfortunate, but we do receive concerns in this area. We want to make sure that if the budget of the family is at a certain level, they will be provided with information that would fit within that budget. Secondly, as I said, prepaid services—an indication through prepaid services as to what, for example, I would want for myself as I pass away: we want to make sure that full information is provided so that you know the full array of services at hand as part of the grieving service.

The bill also includes ownership disclosure, because quite frankly sometimes several different establishments are owned by the exact same company under a corporate structure. When a consumer shops around and finds prices are similar, they may assume that's what it costs. Or if they're referred to another service, they might assume that's what it costs. We want to make disclosure part of the business across the board so that consumers know who they're dealing with, and if the company they're referred to, or if they're shopping around, is owned by the same corporation, or if true competition exists in the sector or in their municipal area.

The bottom line is, we want to make sure that consumers understand the range of options that are available to them. Under this bill, consumers would be given an information brochure and, for example, a telephone number of the provincial regulators of bereavement services, so they could ask general questions about consumer rights and the obligations of the businesses, to make sure they're getting a fair deal and a fully honest representation of the options that they have available to them.

Regulations under the proposed legislation would make easy-to-understand information available through brochures and standardized price lists, to quote a couple of vehicles for doing so. I think we all believe the more information consumers have about the options available to them, the more likely they are to make decisions that reflect their preferences, the preferences of the deceased, their budget, and their religious or cultural traditions and beliefs.

Compensation funds: under Ontario's proposed new legislation, an industry-funded compensation fund that includes all sectors—I mentioned the different sectors—would be established and applied to all goods or services purchased but not delivered. Currently, only funeral directors are included in such a compensation fund plan. They already have one, but the other sectors currently do not. So insolvent cemeteries, for example, become the responsibility of municipalities, and casket and marker activities, those businesses, those retailers, are currently unregulated.

Under the proposed legislation, if passed, consumers would be compensated for financial loss if goods or services are not delivered in any and all of the licensed sectors, including cemeteries and casket and marker retailers. Instead of only funeral services, it would go across the board into the four types of sectors—or more if they develop as culture evolves. We want to make sure that at this sensitive time and with a substantial investment the consumer is totally protected. Whether dealing with a funeral home, a cemetery, a monument builder, a casket maker or a transfer service, we want to have a high level of protection for consumers and a high code of ethics and, in this part of the legislation, a compensation fund to make sure that they are not out funds in this type of investment. For example, if the monument retailer goes bankrupt before completing a headstone, the consumer would be compensated for that monetary loss and buy that headstone from another retailer that can make good on what the individual wants for the deceased. It's very good. It's an important provision and probably a lot of us were surprised—I was—to know that it currently does not exist in the province of Ontario, which goes to the earlier point that it's time to update this piece of legislation.

Code of ethics: under current legislation, only funeral directors in the province are required to adhere to a code of ethics, offered to ensure the protection of consumers and service providers alike. This bill, if passed, will include a provision that all bereavement service providers would be obliged to comply with a code of ethics which I, as minister, would like to see raised across the board. As I mentioned, currently some areas are unregulated, and to their credit they want to become part of this approach and to bring forward a code of ethics to reinforce confidence that people have in this particular industry.

Under this proposed code of ethics, all industry members would have to provide the same high standards. If not, if they were caught giving improper service or—hopefully not, but it could happen—taking advantage of consumers, they would face redress from the regulator.

This would ensure first and foremost that human remains are handled and treated with the respect they deserve and dignity and care across the province and throughout the industry.

A strict code of ethics would also help to protect consumers from unconscionable business practices, such as misrepresentation and high-pressure sales, while protecting quality service providers from the poor reputations earned by bad operators. And it would help create a level playing field, because all licensees would have to abide by similarly high standards across the board.

I know my colleagues here are going to regret the next word I say—"conclusion—but I do have some—

Hon Mr Clark: I'm not sold yet.

Interjection: It's too soon.

Hon Mr Hudak: I haven't sold—it's too soon? Well, maybe throughout the debate I'll have time to add some more comment.

Hon David Young (Attorney General, minister responsible for native affairs): Hear, hear.

Hon Mr Hudak: I appreciate it, but I know that some colleagues of mine, esteemed colleagues who have done a great deal of research in this area and feel strongly about representing their constituents, like Mr Wettlaufer and Mr Gill, may be among others who want to contribute. But I want to wrap up.

The Ernie Eves government believes that promoting development in Ontario's bereavement sector is crucial to being able to offer protection to consumers in the bereavement industry. To summarize, this proposed legislation would support honesty in business dealings, encourage a wide and appropriate variety of services on the market, provide consumers with information on prices and services to make proper and appropriate decisions, and ensure quality services at prices that are fair to both consumers and suppliers.

As I said, bereavement is a topic that not all of us are comfortable talking about, but at some time or another all of us will experience the loss of a loved one, and we will need to rely on the advice of professionals in this sector to provide us with these services.

Our government wants to ensure that we have efficient, up-to-date legislation so that, when the time comes, there are strong protections in place so that consumers can be dealt with honestly and fairly, not only now but into the future.

We also want to ensure that the businesses in this sector—and many of them are small businesses throughout the province, located in communities across Ontario—can grow and expand within a fair, level playing field and modern legislative framework, with a high degree of ethics across the board. As I mentioned, some sectors currently unregulated, to their credit, want to get into this type of framework to help raise the code of ethics across the board.

Through the hard work of my predecessors, the work of the Red Tape Commission and from good advice of the Bereavement Sector Advisory Committee, we have been able to reach a consensus between industry, consumer groups and government on these principles reflected in Bill 209. This bill, I can say with confidence, reflects that consensus.

The principles of strong consumer protection, of a level playing field for business, are consistent with those set out in our general consumer protection package, Bill 180, CP21. These proposed reforms to the grievance services sector are a sister bill to that proposed legislation, and I can say that together Bill 180 and Bill 209 would bring our consumer protection laws into the 21st century and provide some of the strongest, most effective consumer protection not only in Ontario but in the entire country.

Mr Wayne Wettlaufer (Kitchener Centre): I am very pleased to be able to speak to the proposed Funeral, Burial and Cremation Services Act, 2002. I know you share something in common with me. You have a great deal of sensitivity to people who need protection in times of stress, in times of need, and that is what this legislation does.

This legislation, as you've already heard from the minister, replaces two statutes: the Cemeteries Act and the Funeral Directors and Establishments Act. It has four main goals: to strengthen consumer protection, to establish clear rules under which funeral home operations will be permitted with combined cemetery operations, to foster a level playing field for industry participants, and to enable the creation of a single regulatory regime.

Interjections.

Mr Wettlaufer: There are a number of benefits that we need to address, and I'm having a hard time hearing myself speak because of the nonsense going on around here. But that's all right.

Our government has made a commitment to the consumers of Ontario, and that is what this legislation addresses. The reforms to the bereavement legislation before the assembly today are another part of the most comprehensive review of consumer protection legislation ever undertaken in this province. The reforms are sweeping but they have not been developed in isolation. Consumers, sector participants and all businesses alike have been asked for input and they have asked for reforms to accommodate a 21st-century business environment.

Stakeholders have given significant output. We are trying as a government to find a balance, to find practical solutions that will balance industry and consumer interests. We had input from the Red Tape Commission, plus we had input from the Bereavement Sector Advisory Committee, and it all forms the foundation of this act. We are confident that the proposed legislation is based on stakeholder consensus.

I personally find it a little bit difficult to think of anything more emotionally charged than making preparations for my own passing or for the passing of a loved one. I was in the life insurance business as well as the property and casualty business and, when selling a life insurance policy to a family, because it is usually the family that is involved, first of all no one wants to think that he or she is going to die, even though mortality is real. No one wants to think of a loved one dying. Least of all do they want to think of someone dying before his or her time. It's an emotionally charged item.

What happens quite often is that consumers will make their first foray into this industry at a time of bereavement, at a time when they are vulnerable. So what happens? Because of their vulnerability, they then make a financial commitment, a commitment (a) that is significant and (b) that is not one they may be fully prepared to handle. The financial commitment that someone makes when discussing a funeral is the fifth largest purchase that one will make in their lifetime. The average cost of a funeral is about $5,700. Considering that many people have less than $5,000 life insurance, they then have to go into their pockets and sometimes don't deal with that properly and they will purchase something they can't afford.

The consumer expects that we will strengthen his or her protection, that we as a government will strengthen the protection of the consumer. The consumer must feel secure that we have put in place the necessary mechanisms to protect them when they make the crucial decisions regarding bereavement arrangements. Consumers need to feel secure that they have the means by which to change their bereavement arrangement if the situation changes. Consumers need to feel secure that their financial investment will not be squandered. They need to feel secure, period. I believe this act does provide that security.

Most members in the bereavement sector, whether they be funeral dealers, whether they be—well, whatever segment of the bereavement sector, they deal with their clients in a very respectable and honourable manner. In fact, I have to tell you, in my riding I can't think of one who wouldn't. They're all honourable people. But I have heard of instances, as I'm sure we all have, that throughout the province there are some situations in which clients have felt they haven't been treated honourably or that through mistakes they feel they haven't been treated properly or that there are those who confuse consumers deliberately, or not necessarily deliberately, or perhaps there have been those who through poor management did not deliver the product or service as the consumer expected.

What we've done with this act, the proposed act, if passed—and I would like to think that it will be passed. I cannot believe that the members opposite would not vote in favour of this.

Mr Rosario Marchese (Trinity-Spadina): Come on. How do you know?

Mr Wettlaufer: I say to the member for Trinity-Spadina, I know there is a possibility that there will be members opposite who will say they're going to vote for it and then won't vote for it, who may speak in favour of it and then vote opposed. On the other hand, they may speak against it and vote for it.

Mr Marchese: Who would they be?

Mr Wettlaufer: If Dalton McGuinty were to appear in the House, it may be that they will speak against and for, and vote for and against. That is a possibility. I'm saying that.

But I do say that I really do believe all of the members will support this, because this bill prohibits unfair business practices; it increases disclosure requirements; it allows for mandatory 30-day cooling-off periods with expanded cancellation rights; it permits consumers who hold interment and scattering rights to sell rights that they no longer require; it expands trust requirements for pre-paid services; and—this is very important—coming from a profession in which we had to maintain a trust account for the benefit of the consumers, I see this as a very valuable part of this bill: consumers must be protected financially, and only a trust account can do that.

This bill also licenses sector participants, who were previously unregulated—specifically, casket and market retailers. It provides that all licensees must comply with a code of ethics. Whereas right now funeral directors are subject to a code of ethics, this act will require all those in the bereavement sector to abide by a code of ethics. It guarantees consumer compensation schemes that will include all sectors that are regulated.

The proposed legislation will protect consumers through all phases of the bereavement arrangement. This would start with the decision-making process, it will continue through the contract process and then, of course, finish with delivery of the commitments governed by the contract.

The first step in protecting consumer interests, of course, is to prohibit unfair business practices. Falsifying information, false advertising and the furnishing of false information will all be prohibited, and there will be very stringent penalties in place. The proposed legislation will give power to control current advertising, and also regulations will be in place that will require advertising to be pre-approved before publication. No false advertising will be permitted.

An informed consumer definitely is the best defence against unfair business practices, so obviously disclosure requirements are part and parcel of this legislation—including, of course, ownership disclosure. Educational brochures and standardized price lists are mandatory. They're part and parcel of the disclosure requirements. Licensed operators will be prohibited from selling at a cost that is more than the price indicated. "No surprises" will be part of this legislation; no additional financial burdens for the consumer.

I think all of us in this House realize that no matter how carefully a consumer may make a decision, no matter how carefully the element of the bereavement sector has tried to make the consumer aware, nevertheless there are situations in which the consumer may want to change his or her mind. That could be a function of his or her emotional state at the time; it could be a relocation of residence if a pre-arranged negotiation has been made; it may be a function of a change in the financial circumstances; or it may be a function of a new interpretation of the loved one's last wishes. I think we can accept that. We can appreciate that. We have to be willing to accept that consumers may want to change their mind about how they want to proceed. I think if we had legislation without a remedy for these situations, it would be incomplete legislation.

The act will accommodate this changeable nature. It will ensure appropriate protection nevertheless for members of the industry. The proposed legislation takes the human factor into account. There will be this 30-day cooling-off period and expanded cancellation rights for the consumer. But the consumer must realize that, with any expenditure on his or her part by the member of the bereavement sector, there has to be some allowance that the bereavement sector be reimbursed for that. The consumer will be able to rethink the decision, fitting in with his or her financial constraints or personal beliefs, but the member of the bereavement sector nevertheless would have his financial obligations satisfied.

The purchase of licensed supplies or services by an individual other than interment and scattering rights may be cancelled at any time before delivery—however, less the prescribed amount that could be compensated to those businesses.

Stakeholders identified to us a need for flexibility in certain areas of contractual obligations. They gave as an example someone who has purchased prearranged services, but even though they planned their funeral—not just the funeral but the scattering rights or the burial; they did everything they thought was right—they may decide to move, for whatever reason—for economic reasons or for other reasons—to another city. Therefore, they are in a position of having to change their mind for their bereavement arrangements.

The new legislation would allow for routine life changes like that. It would permit someone to sell their interment or scattering rights to a third party if they no longer require them, unless the cemetery bylaw prohibits such a sale. In instances where resale is prohibited by a bylaw, the cemetery owner would then be required to repurchase the rights from that rights holder, in accordance with this legislation.

Protecting consumers must extend well beyond the decision-making and transitional phases. This is where I get into the trust fund process. It is so necessary to have the trust fund in place. It ensures that consumers are not only being protected during the initial transaction but also in the future when obligations of the contract must be honoured.

Licensed operators will have to maintain trust accounts. Money received by an operator in respect of sale of supplies and services in advance of the provision of those supplies and services will have to be held in a trust account. The monies must be held to protect the consumer. Cemetery operators who sell interment rights or scattering rights, especially with respect to a part of a cemetery that is not yet developed or ready to be used for interment or scattering purposes, would also be required to hold that money in trust, the money received from sales.

Cemetery owners who sell interment rights or scattering rights would be required to establish and maintain a care and maintenance fund to ensure the proper care of cemetery lands and their markers and structures. Again, this is protection for the consumer which was recognized by the stakeholders. Legislation that doesn't protect consumers or legislation without teeth that does protect consumers is not legislation. Legislation, as we all know, must have teeth, and this legislation does.

As I mentioned earlier, licensing is part of it. Regulation of the bereavement sector, which now includes licensing, will cover cemetery operators and their sales representatives, crematorium operators and their sales representatives, funeral establishment operators, funeral directors, transfer service operators and their sales representatives, casket retail business operators and their sales representatives, market retail business operators and their sales representatives, and on and on. Of course, they must all comply with a business code of ethics.

The Acting Speaker: Members now have up to two minutes for questions or comments on the government's leadoff debate.

Mr Bruce Crozier (Essex): I'll be having more to say on this particular bill as we move into our leadoff, but it was interesting to me that the member for Kitchener Centre would assume without any reservation that we would support this bill. That's not always the case. That would assume that somebody has written a perfect bill, and that would also assume, then: what's the point in having debate?

This is a very interesting bill. There's no question about it. It isn't often that we deal with consumer issues in this Legislature that involve death, that involve the funeral business, that involve cemeteries.

I just wanted to say to the member for Kitchener Centre that there may be, and in fact I think we will point out through debate, some areas in this bill that can't just simply be accepted because the member says we should. Absolutely when it comes to consumer protection in this very sensitive area we're all interested and we all want to do the right thing. But that doesn't simply go to the point that because the government is presenting this we should do it without any issue. So I suspect, as we get on in the debate, it may even surprise the member for Kitchener Centre that there are some issues that we will take the government to task on. There may be some areas that we'll ask the government to consider doing in a different way. So I just ask him to be patient. When the debate is finished, I'm sure we'll all have the bill that we want.

Mr Marchese: I do not want to make light of a very serious discussion here, but I must confess: funeral, burial, cremation services are not subjects around which I ruminate much. I do have to say that I concern myself more with matters of the living than I do with matters of the dead. I must also confess that I personally rage against the dying of the light and I do that as best as I can, as often as I can, because I enjoy being awake and being alive. I've got to admit that. So one could spend more time on these matters, and others do—God bless them—but no doubt there are matters that other people raise with respect to this bill.

People worry about the imposition of new charges, fees or levies for small congregations. I'm sure they're concerned and they probably talked to you about it. They're worried about the imposition of new administrative burdens and personnel qualification requirements on volunteers. They probably talked to you about that, and I don't know how you deal with those issues. I suspect you're not dealing with them in the bill, but maybe in regulation, and I'm not quite sure whether people feel comfortable about whether you're doing that or not.

They're worried about any provision that might lead to new property taxation. That would certainly be an incredible burden. Some would love to make sure funeral services at least are kept within family control versus corporate control. Maybe you heard about that. I don't know what you have to say about that.

I'm personally concerned about having a consumer watchdog, of which you speak much about, in terms of protecting consumers. I argue that unless you have a consumer watchdog out there, I'm not sure consumers will be supervised very well or protected very well. That's why we need hearings.

The Acting Speaker: The member for Mississauga has been on her feet for the better part of half a minute. I gather it's because you'd like the floor.

Mrs Marland: Yes.

The Acting Speaker: Please go ahead.

Mrs Marland: Thank you very much, Mr Speaker.

I just want to take the opportunity to emphasize my personal appreciation and that of my constituents for the fact that Minister Tim Hudak has finally brought forward a bill that has been needed for a very long time—I would suggest through two previous governments and realistically through the government before the last two governments, going back to our own government.

This is obviously a very complex subject. When we talk about making decisions in this place on behalf of our constituents and their well-being, I doubt there can be anything that's more important than this subject area. I would be very surprised if anyone in this Legislature would vote against this bill, recognizing there is, and has been for a very long time, a need for protection of the consumer.

The interesting aspect, as the minister so well explained, is that the whole approach to funeral services and the accompanying parts of that—whether we're talking about monuments, caskets, cremation or cemeteries; everything to do with what happens to our loved ones on their demise—is a critical personal responsibility for each of us within our families, but certainly as legislators we have an enormous responsibility to serve the public, and this bill does that.

Mr Michael A. Brown (Algoma-Manitoulin): Up front, I have to say to the Legislature that I potentially have a conflict of interest. I am a licensed funeral director, although I have not been involved in the business for approximately 16 years now.

But I want to say, first of all—and members might not remember, but the member from Mississauga South would not be surprised that I remind her—that there was a funeral directors' act passed in the late 1980s with the support of all the members of the Legislature.

I want to suggest to the Legislature that probably the problem is not with the funeral directors. This legislation is not directed at funeral directors. Funeral directors conducted about 83,000 services in Ontario last year. Of those 83,000 services, do you know how many complaints there were? There were 26. Of the 26, half were made by other funeral directors. In other words, families in Ontario complained 13 times out of a possible 83,000 times about the funeral directors in this province.

I would suggest that families in this province have been well served by funeral directors. We have many women and men who have devoted their lives to helping people through one of the most difficult stages in anyone's life, losing a loved one, and they turn to funeral directors. And people might know, or might be surprised, that at the time of the loss of a loved one, when families are asked who was the most helpful person who got them through this dark stage in their life, they name the funeral director. So I think what we need to understand here is that this is not about funeral directors.

The Acting Speaker: The time for questions and comments has expired. Any one of the members who gave the leadoff debate may respond, up to two minutes. Minister.

Hon Mr Hudak: I appreciate the comments from my colleague Mr Wettlaufer and my colleagues from across the floor. In their two minutes, we'll look forward to their discussion. Certainly, this industry, as I indicated, is very complex, a great deal of history and tradition, and at the same time, we're seeing the face of Ontario change, the culture evolve in the province. That's why it's important to bring this legislation forward.

As the member from Algoma-Manitoulin mentioned, the last kick at the can, so to speak, I think, was 1989. I believe his colleague Mr Kwinter was minister at the time, if memory serves, and brought forward some important changes to modernize the legislative framework. If Mr Kwinter has a chance to comment on this legislation, I'd enjoy hearing from him as well.

The member for Algoma-Manitoulin makes a fair point. The funeral services industry, as I indicated in my remarks, has a code of ethics, and they have a board to ensure that code of ethics is maintained. They also have a compensation fund. The issue, I mentioned in my speech: they don't exist in other parts of this sector—but the entire rite involves a funeral, often a cemetery or cremation, monuments, as well as casket retailers, all of these areas. We need to ensure as a whole that where the loved one has passed on, the family member will be assured of those similarly high standards, or that even higher standards across the board will exist for consumer protection.

Similarly, in the business practices, it will level the playing field so that opportunities that exist currently only for cemeteries will be available to funeral service directors, for example, and vice versa but on a level playing field with similar rules. As I said, to the credit of the other industries that are not currently as tightly regulated—for example monument builders, casket makers—they want to get involved, they want to ensure that those high standards are throughout the industry, and they want to ensure that consumers have the opportunity to find redress if not dealt with properly. They deserve that credit; they were part of the process. I want to thank, again, Bob Youngs, who is here from the Ontario Monument Builders Association, joining us here in the gallery—from Niagara, may I add, importantly.

The Acting Speaker: The time is now upon us for the leadoff debate of the official opposition. The Chair will recognize the member for Essex.

Mr Crozier: I'm pleased to rise this evening to speak to this bill, Bill 209, An Act respecting funerals, burials, cremations and related services and providing for the amendment of other statutes.

I want to say at the beginning of the debate that in the abstract this legislation, this Bill 209, has to stand up to the same test that any other piece of legislation must stand up to: on first reading, the bill is introduced. We then have the opportunity to review the bill, all of us, government members, members of the opposition and members of the third party. Then, second reading of the bill, which we are standing on tonight, is to debate the principle of the bill, and I don't think that there is much argument as to the fact that if the principle of this bill is to protect consumers, we all want to reach that end at the end of the debate.

There may be, though, differences of opinion on how we do that. This is one piece of legislation, I suggest, that is not partisan in nature. It isn't a philosophical bent of any particular party; we all want to do the right thing. But I remind a couple of members from the government side who have insinuated that we should accept this bill and adopt it and not be opposed to it that we're not opposed to the principle of the bill. I can go on record as saying that. What we might be opposed to is how you're arriving at that principle.

Of course, in the legislative procedure, what we do then is debate the principle at second reading. It then is normally sent off to committee, hopefully for some public hearings, because there have been stakeholders who have had the opportunity to have input into this bill, we are told, but I'm not so sure those stakeholders included the general public. Once they learn more about this bill, they may have something to say about this. So while it's at committee, it's hoped on our part that there would be public hearings on it so that the public could understand what it is we're talking about. Then after those public hearings, at committee, the right thing to do is to consider amendments to it, to make that bill better, if that's what we can do. Then it comes back to the Legislature for third reading so we can debate the bill after it has been amended.

I'm going to make a prediction that if this bill comes back to the Legislature after second reading, and in fact I'm going to make a suggestion that even before it goes to committee, if the pattern is followed that has been followed in this session in particular, this bill will in all likelihood be time-allocated. In all likelihood, it will have limited committee hearings—I hope that it has public hearings but I'm not optimistic about that—and in all likelihood will be brought back to the Legislature and have no third reading debate.

The Acting Speaker: I'm sorry to interrupt you. Could you take your seat for a second? I know no one is doing it deliberately, but there are two discussions going on on both sides of the House involving people standing and congregating. For anything more than a moment or two, please go outside, because it is very distracting for the speaker on the floor and the Speaker in the Speaker's chair. I appreciate your co-operation. Thank you.

Sorry for the interruption. Please continue.

Mr Crozier: Notwithstanding those predictions, I want to get on with the debate of this bill. I would hope that the government members who have suggested we support this out of hand will take into consideration some of the issues we have to bring up on this Bill 209.

This bill repeals the Cemeteries Act and the Funeral Directors and Establishments Act and replaces them with one statute. The act will be administered by the Board of Funeral Services.

This bill is going to cover a wide range of issues. It's going to cover the licensing of funeral service providers, consumer protection, trust accounts for cemetery maintenance and prearranged funerals. It's going to cover compensation for consumers, the establishment and closing of cemeteries, and the investigation and discipline of licensees.

To give you a little bit of background about this particular bill—and my colleague from Algoma-Manitoulin referred to some of this—there are approximately 500 funeral homes in Ontario that conduct in excess of 80,000 funerals every year. The average cost of a funeral is $6,000—probably one of the major expenses any of us will face as we go through life and as we care for our loved ones. Probably next to the purchase of a home and automobile, funeral expenses are next in the major expenses that we will incur.

As my colleague mentioned, of those 80,000 funerals last year, there were a little more than 20 complaints to the Board of Funeral Services, and half of these complaints were from one funeral home to another. So one would ask, what's broken, what's the problem when we have so few complaints out of some 80,000 funerals? Well, perhaps because of the sensitivity of this issue, the bereavement process, what families go through, we might say there isn't perhaps a lot to complain about. We generally deal with, in small towns certainly and I would even suspect in major urban centres, people we know, and we trust those we know. Therefore that's a good enough reason that most, by far the greatest percentage of, funerals that are conducted in this province are carried out and completed with little complaint.

Funeral homes and cemeteries have been governed by two separate acts for over a century, and the legislation governing funeral homes has been, in the past, very stringent. Funeral directors are licensed, and they go through a two-year college program before working in the industry. Legislation, as we have it today, prevents funeral homes from operating on the grounds of cemeteries, for example, in order to prevent monopolies.

However, over the past few years, large cemetery operators have opened visitation centres on cemetery grounds. Essentially, a visitation centre is a funeral home without a preparation room. Some of these large cemetery operators have expressed a desire—and maybe even some of the small ones, although not any I've heard of in my area, where it's small urban and rural—to have funeral homes as part of an overall service and that they might be located on cemetery grounds.

The new legislation will give cemeteries the ability to build funeral homes on the cemetery grounds. This will create, in my view, the opportunity for the funeral business to become much larger than it has been in the past. In fact, many of us may know of a particular large funeral operator in both the United States and Canada—and I look to my friend from Algoma-Manitoulin—the Loewen Group operated in both countries? Yes. They have in fact run into some financial difficulties. So just because it's a large operation that provides a significant service, it doesn't mean that they can't run into some of the problems that some of us might think smaller operations could.

Some specific details in the legislation: the bill requires the licensing of cemetery operators and sales representatives; of crematorium operators and sales representatives; of funeral establishment operators and funeral directors—who have, I pointed out, had to be licensed in the past—of transfer service operators and their sales representatives; of casket retail business operators and their sales representatives; and of marker retail businesses and their sales representatives. So in each of these cases, as I've said, there are sales representatives involved, and therefore we do need consumer protection. There's no question.

Purchasers will be entitled to cancel a contract at any time if the specified requirements of the contract are not met. A 30-day cooling-off period for prepaid services, for example, will be required. All monies from prepaid services must be held in a trust account, as it has been in the past. I do not know of—certainly none that have come to me in my constituency office—anyone who has dealt with prepaid services that were required to have trust accounts, who lost any money. There may be examples that others in this Legislature are aware of, but I'm not.

The board of funeral services will have certain powers over casket retailers and sales representatives, as I've said, of transfer operators. What's been the stakeholders' reaction? The government has said it has consulted widely on this issue, and there were a number of stakeholders, certainly from the retailer side and various religious organizations, who have had some input to this. Again, I'm a bit concerned—and it's a difficult thing to do—that the general public has not had the opportunity to have any input to this. Private funeral home operators are concerned, I can tell you, as they feel this legislation will allow large monopolies to take over the business.

The faith groups are concerned that the imposition of new charges, fees or levies will have serious consequences for small congregations, mosques, synagogues and parishes that operate small cemeteries. There are cemeteries in this province that have as few as a dozen or two interments a year, totally unlike the large cemeteries in a metropolitan area; for example, like Mount Pleasant, where they have thousands of interments each year. These small cemeteries have to be assured that they won't be put into the same category as some large operator.

The faith groups are also worried about the imposition of new administrative burdens or personnel qualification requirements, as much of the work is done by volunteers.

We have to take these smaller congregations and smaller groups into consideration, because there are many of them around this province, I would suggest, particularly in the areas where the population is much more sparse; for example, in northern Ontario.

There's also a concern about any provision that would lead to any taxation issues. We wonder, for example, with these thousands of cemeteries around the province and with over 500 funeral home operators in the province, who really is going to go around the province and make sure that all these licensed companies and licensed individuals are following the letter and the spirit of the law. It costs money to do that. This is where the smaller operators are concerned that the fees involved with this will be particularly onerous on them. Under those circumstances, I suspect you're going to have to wait for a complaint. I expect that since a funeral service isn't a purchase that people make very often in their lives and is one that's made without a great deal of research, complaints might not be forthcoming. So the law might not be followed, and the complaints may be few, as we know already they are. So how is this legislation going to be administered and monitored so we can be sure, notwithstanding the fact there may be a complaint, that the consumer is being treated fairly?

Often in this situation and in many others, people really don't know whether they have been duped. It seems that most often it's on the consumer to report any shady or manipulative tactics, just as he or she would complain about a bad wiring job at home. I'm not trying to trivialize this at all in making that comparison, but it's just the kind of service we don't hear a lot of complaints about.

We know, for example, that the Association of Municipalities of Ontario is not happy with the legislation as it's presently proposed. They're concerned about the fact that cemeteries and all of their related expenses will become the responsibility of municipalities if they're abandoned by their operators and the municipalities will receive no compensation for that. At the present time, I am told, municipalities in Ontario operate 47% of the cemeteries, and they're concerned that this board that's going to be formed to oversee this legislation will not reflect the interests the municipal stakeholders have in the operation of these cemeteries that are abandoned.

So although we, again, appreciate the sensitivity of this legislation, there are some facts, some real concerns about the bottom line, the costs of them. The legislation is not endorsed by all the stakeholder groups who were involved in the consultation on it. As I pointed out, there may be some serious repercussions for faith groups, private home operators and, yes indeed, the consumer.

I hope through the debate on this issue that we can be better informed about how the changes came about, but it would appear that it may be more the interests of large operators that are being served by this than it is of small, independent and volunteer workers in this market.

The legislation, as it's written now, doesn't create a level playing field, in my view, as the cemetery owners and funeral home owners are at the present time subject to totally different tax issues. We would, again, hope that this might be addressed throughout the discussion on this legislation.

We're told that the government started consultations on this legislation about three years ago. They've put forward a bill that in some instances we think creates more problems rather than solves them. In a letter to Minister Hudak dated September 20 of this year, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business states, and I quote, "Our reading of the legislation is that there are areas where it does not respect the agreement of principles put forth by the Bereavement Sector Advisory Committee to your predecessor" of Minister Hudak in some correspondence in November of 2001.

We suggest to the government that although you've taken several years to come up with changes to the legislation, which hasn't been dealt with in the last 12 or 13 years, you apparently disregarded many of the recommendations you were given. Smaller stakeholders, like the faith organizations and small municipal cemeteries, were initially, we are told, left out of the discussion. That again goes to the fact where I wonder who the driving force is behind the changes in this legislation.

Currently, it might be of interest for you to know, Speaker, the top 10% of cemeteries in this province make most of the money. Soon, we feel, they could be taking an even greater share of that from independent operators.

We feel that this legislation, as it's currently written, is a threat to smaller funeral homes. Allowing funeral home operators' involvement with commercial cemetery operators will, we think, result in large corporate monopolies. As I alluded to a little bit earlier, at least in my experience in small, urban and rural Ontario, we're used to dealing with independent funeral directors and operators in our own communities. Many of these operators, if not all of them, are involved in their community. They're part of the community. It's more than just a business; it's really a service to the community. We don't want anything in any legislation that would be a threat to those smaller funeral homes and operators. If smaller, independent funeral homes become no longer viable, consumer interests will in fact be put at risk. That's the way we feel monopolies work.

In this bill, there are a number of problems. There's still not a level playing field when it comes to taxes. Private sector funeral homes, monument builders and retailers must all pay taxes levied by all levels of government. I have had, for several years, the example a small, independent monument maker who, because of the nature of his business—he is independent, separate from any faith group or cemetery—must collect provincial sales tax. Yet, if you are involved with a faith group or a cemetery, you don't have to pay provincial sales tax—maybe not much of an advantage. I would suggest that if we were going to resolve that, perhaps we could take the view that there shouldn't be any provincial sales tax, whether it's small independent operator, a faith group or a cemetery.

Private sector funeral homes, as I said, are concerned about the taxing issues. Municipal cemeterians who engage in the same business, however, may not be presented with these issues. If you're talking about markets and fairness and making things equal for all players, then surely we have to take all of them into consideration and treat them the same. If not, we feel that you're continuing or ensuring the continuation of a group that gets some kind of special treatment, one that can keep costs down, compared to someone else. So this is something that we feel should be addressed before this legislation becomes law.

When we're speaking of taxes, crematoria, in this legislation, will not have to pay taxes for five years after it's enacted. I understand that rather than suddenly creating a tax issue, it's an effort to allow this to be brought in over time to ease that burden. But in the meantime, does that treat others who are involved in the business fairly? That is something that deserves some second thought. It presents an advantage, for example, over any new business that might wish to start up. You seem to be favouring the older business at the expense of the new, even as you say you wish to increase consumer choice, but there won't be that consumer choice because one will have advantage over the other. It hardly encourages consumers to choose the small crematoria that starts up and is forced to charge the taxes which therefore make the prices higher overall.

Greater consumer choice is usually a good thing, but we have to be careful not to surrender ourselves to the cult of choice and market forces. In the circumstances surrounding a loved one's death, when a family is confused and vulnerable, the family doesn't exactly fit the classic definition of informed consumers. They're not going to go out, at least not usually, and compare quotes, and those few that do don't represent the majority. As I mentioned earlier, most often I think they go to those whom they trust and whom they know. If they're not in a position to do that, then they may do what appears to be the easiest thing and go to the one that offers the least hassle.

That's why we need greater consumer protection—and I agree with the minister on that view—in this industry, because at that time, consumers are not always able to think in the most clear terms. We feel that this bill, in its present form, doesn't offer that. The bill makes it easier for large corporations to take over in the marketplace. They can offer you—I almost hesitate to use the words "one-stop shopping," but that's what it is—one-stop service. If we allow them to have funeral home, cemetery and monument service all wrapped up in one package, we feel that might not be in the consumers' best interests when they're making a decision at a time when they're the most vulnerable.

We feel you really can't treat the bereavement industry like any other industry. You can use formulas, and you can do everything from fines to licensing to advertising, but we have to understand that there are unique characteristics and requirements of this sector.

As we've pointed out, of the 26 complaints made to the Board of Funeral Services last year, half were made funeral home to funeral home. I assume that means the other half, the other 13, were made by consumers. Maybe it's my cynicism, but I'm wondering who this bill sets out to protect in regulating these complaints: the big business or the consumer? We're in desperate need of consumer protection in this province in a variety of areas. We have to be very careful that we don't simply treat this industry like many of the other industries that we deal with from day to day. At any rate, 13 consumer complaints out of a total of 80,000 funerals is really a trifle compared to what we face in all of our other purchases from day to day.

Some of the groups have said that final authority must rest with the minister. That's because they feel the minister is best able to, at arm's length, take their concerns under consideration. By delegating to a self-managing authority, the Board of Funeral Services, though, individual groups like faith communities are afraid that they won't be able to access the minister directly and that if they're not able to do that, they may not be able to present their concerns as well as a large corporation might be able to do.

As always, there's much that's in the regulations that we don't debate in a bill. So as we go to committee with this bill, I would ask the minister that some of the regulations be addressed as well, if it's possible. By doing that, I think we can all better understand the legislation that's being put before us, the objective of that legislation and the fact that we all do want to protect consumers.

With that, I will ask my colleague from Algoma-Manitowlin to say a few words to you.

Mr Brown: I want to thank my colleague from Essex for his presentation, and start by saying to the government that this is an important and significant piece of legislation. This legislation will touch virtually every Ontarian at some point in his or her life.

I heard someone earlier say that this was about the dead. Nothing could be further from the truth. This is about the living. Legislation relating to the bereavement sector is about the living. It is about the families. It about those who survive. It is about those who are able to get on with their lives following what often is a tragedy in a family.

I, as I said before, am a funeral director. I've not been working in the field for some time but believe I do know something about it. The minister would have done himself some good, in my view, if he had provided those of us on this side of the floor with the submissions of those who responded during his consultations so that we understood where the various parties to this bill came from, what they were thinking, what views they brought to the table, what concerns they may have had. It puts an opposition that is trying to be constructive in a difficult position when you present a bill at the end of a week, and the next Monday evening we're debating it. This bill is 86 pages long. It is a considerable undertaking—to use a pun, I suppose; I was waiting for somebody to do that—to understand how this all came about, particularly if you understand the funeral directors act of, as the minister says, 1989, which was the last revision of that act and which apparently works reasonably well. The emphasis in this act apparently is to bring the other sectors up to a standard where the funeral directors have been for some time.

That may not be quite a fair statement, but I think maybe it is, because the funeral directors act of 1989 had as its premise that separating the sectors, making sure there was transparency between the sectors, that there could not be tied selling between cemeteries, funeral directors, monument providers etc, was a good thing and that it would protect the public because there was some transparency in the transactions. But we know the act was not successful in doing that. We know that especially large corporations, some of them not-for-profit corporations but nevertheless very large corporations, have found ways around the concept of the 1989 bill. They put visitation centres, for example, in cemeteries. You don't pay municipal taxes on visitation centres. They put funeral directors at a distinct disadvantage as various sectors started to sell monuments, making it very difficult for monument dealers to ever actually approach a client. We know that, as well-intentioned as the 1989 legislation was, people found a way to run around it. To be fair, in many jurisdictions, probably in most jurisdictions in North America, there are combinations of cemeteries, funeral directors and the various other businesses that might be associated with that.

I have some grave concerns, however, about sales forces. The minister should know that this bill provides for—listen to this—the licensing of cemetery operators and their sales representatives, crematorium operators and their sales representatives, funeral establishment operators, funeral directors, transfer service operators and their sales representatives, casket retail business operators and their sales representatives, and marker retail business operators and their sales representatives. It's very interesting, because what that would say to me is that there is somebody out there selling. The funeral directors act, by the way, precludes that; you cannot solicit sales if you are a funeral director. I think that's a good thing.

Mr Frank Mazzilli (London-Fanshawe): They advertise all the time.

Mr Brown: Yes, you can advertise, but you cannot directly solicit. You can't phone up Frank Mazzilli and say, "Hey, Frank, how about...?" It can't be done.

The issue is that most, for example, cemetery salespeople—I don't know if the members know this—would be on a commission basis. They sell on commission. That's how you sell graves and plots etc in cemeteries. I presume many people in the retail casket business, whatever that might be, are on a commission basis. I presume that marker or monument salesmen are often in a commission sales position. I would suggest to you that we don't want that rolling into the funeral business.

Presently, as people would know, under the funeral directors act, if you were to prearrange a funeral in this province, 100% of the money provided to the funeral director is placed in trust—not 99%, not 98%, not 97%, but 100%—which means there is no room for commissions. It's not hard to figure that one out. And that's the way it should be left.

I look at the Minister of Labour over there; he's looking very interested in this particular issue. I think he would agree that you do not want people, door to door, selling funerals on a commission basis. I think we can all understand what kind of difficulty that would put us in. I would like to see in this act a provision that makes it very clear that commission sales are not possible; frankly, I would prefer that it be in the cemetery business also, but at least in the funeral directing portion of this act.

Mr Mazzilli: How about mausoleums?

Mr Brown: Mausoleums? Those are cemetery crematoria. That's another issue that I think is interesting and we need to canvass more. We desperately need public hearings to talk about this and to understand from stakeholders what it is that we're trying to accomplish. We know that the cremation rate in Ontario is now roughly 50%. That, in my view and in the view of most people, will continue to go up. It will probably approach 80% to 85% in the next 20 to 25 years. There are a number of reasons for that, but it has changed a number of the ways we approach this sector.

I understand that the bill—although I haven't specifically been able to understand how it does this—for the first time actually provides status for cremated remains. At the present time, cremated remains, under the common law and the law in general, really have no particular status. I think the law looks at it that you may do anything you wish with them unless it causes mental anguish to another person. That needs to be changed, for a number of reasons, in this new relationship we're going to see. When we look at columbariums, which are essentially mausoleums for cremated remains, we're seeing those because at the moment there is no status for cremated remains. You can put them virtually anywhere, and people are. I think that's not in the public interest. I don't know what people across the floor might think, but I'm seeing some things in my mind that I wouldn't like about that particular issue.

I suggest to you that there are a whole lot of issues here that the government isn't addressing, but I am particularly concerned about the cemetery side. On the cemetery side, it talks about all this wonderful regulation and bringing it to the standard of the Board of Funeral Services, I guess. The problem with that, as my friend from Essex pointed out, is the small rural cemetery, the faith community, the small churchyard cemetery. You cannot do it. I'm here to tell you right now, it cannot be done.

I have, over the period of being a member, been approached many times by people concerned with the state of rural cemeteries. I'm going to read this letter I received almost a year ago now. It's from Donald Shackleton, who's the chairman of the Tarbutt Township Cemetery Committee, RR#1, Desbarats, Ontario. He says:

"I am the chairman of the cemetery committee for the township of Tarbutt and Tarbutt Additional. In the boundaries of the municipality, we have two cemeteries. One of these, the Port Findlay cemetery, is used. The other one, the Stickney cemetery, was closed in 1916. There have been a few burials there over the years, but none for quite some time. This cemetery is the final resting place of the pioneers of the area. There was little to no upkeep done between 1916 and the late 1990s, so you can imagine the mess. In the late 1990s, some volunteers went into the cemetery to do some brushing, but found it impossible because of the forest of trees. We arranged for someone to come in and cut the trees and remove them with payment being the wood. Since then, we have been looking for funding to bring the cemetery back to its original condition. The majority of the graves are sunk in, there are tree stumps everywhere and a lot of the headstones need repair. The fence surrounding the cemetery also needs to be replaced. We have come to dead ends everywhere, but have a few leads.

"Are there any grants available," is what Mr Shackleton is asking, "from the federal government" or the provincial government "regarding historic sites" and regarding the restoration?

I don't think the Stickney cemetery is likely to have the kind of dollars that you're going to need from your regulatory regime to make it work. It isn't going to happen. I would suggest to you, over my constituency there are many of these cemeteries. There are some in the Bruce Mines area, there are some as you go through Iron Bridge, as you go back toward Espanola, certainly on Manitoulin. I would tell you at one of the small cemeteries on Manitoulin that I used to need to work with on occasion, they sold the graves at that cemetery for $6—$6 for a grave. Perpetual care at 35% of that was about $2 they put in trust for every grave they sold. That isn't going to cut the grass for very long. But you know what? That cemetery was looked after by the community. It was a well-kept cemetery. People did those kinds of things for free. The opening and closing charges on a grave were very minimal, and the money was donated to the cemetery. The community looked after seeing the grave was open.

I suggest to you, that happens all over Ontario. It doesn't happen in the big cities, but in rural Ontario it is a reality. I don't see anything in this legislation that addresses those realities of those communities that need to have assistance. They can't afford to pay. They're looking for money from somebody else. AMO, the Association of Municipalities of Ontario, is very concerned that many of these cemeteries will eventually have to be taken over by the municipality and eventually the municipality, out of municipal coffers, will have to do the restoration.

I don't think the model that the government has for administering the cemeteries is going to work. It might work here at Mount Pleasant, the Necropolis and various other very large cemeteries here in the city of Toronto or in London or in Hamilton or Ottawa, but I'm telling you that in Middlesex county there will be quite a number of small rural cemeteries that aren't going to be able to work in this regime. I think you have created something that just will not work, and I think you've done it not for the consumer. That's the really strange thing here. I think you've done it because the business community has found a way around the old act and you're trying to catch up. You're trying to figure out how to put this square peg into a square hole rather than into the round one that it's being pushed into today. I think it is not in the interest of consumers to have the combinations in the first place. But if we must have these combinations, then clearly that's what this legislation is about. It is about these combinations. If we have to find a way to deal with these combinations, I think we'd better take a deep breath. We'd better take this bill to committee. We'd better have the opposition furnished with the comments we had from the people who submitted in the "consultation."

I'm not sure the red tape that you're convinced we need in this bill is going to accomplish what you want it to. From a government that likes to talk about red tape, this bill has more potential for red tape than any bill I've seen in here in a long time. I think the minister would also do himself some credit if, when it comes to taking this bill to committee, he brought some of the regulations along with it. There is grave concern in a number of areas that this bill does not spell out what the minister says it does. It is a permissive bill. In most cases, it does not give us the regulations. If we don't get regulations that people, for example, who are concerned about commission selling can actually see, read and understand, then I think it wouldn't do any member in this Legislature any good to pass this bill. It would be a mistake.

I think we need, as legislators, to take the opportunity here—and I think there is a real opportunity to get this right. I think there's an opportunity to have the support of all parties in the Legislature. I think there's an opportunity for the government to show that it really does understand this sector. I think that would come from providing us with hearings, with information, with time to get a little bit of a deep breath. I know the critic and myself spent much of today talking to groups on the telephone, and there are still many more to talk to that we just really don't have an opportunity to talk to because we didn't even know we would be debating this bill until late last week. We hadn't even seen the bill till—the first time it was printed would have been Thursday, I believe.

So I think in fairness the minister has to understand that if we want to get this right—if you want the support of other people, which I would think you would—it needs to go to committee with the regulations attached to it, or at least the important regulations, so we can put meat on the bones here, so that we can understand that the consumer in Ontario really will be protected. This is not about protecting the business community or protecting a particular group in the province. It really is about protecting consumers at a time in their lives when they are very vulnerable. I think we should recognize that.

With that, I think I'll conclude my remarks, but I would hope that someone on the government side could stand up and give us a commitment that it will be going to committee, that we will be able to see the important regulations that would accompany some of the sections to make sure that we do not have a commission-selling regime involved here and that we really know that every consumer in Ontario will be protected.

I would say one more thing and it's worth mentioning, and my colleague from Essex did mention it. In the area of prepaid funerals in the province of Ontario, consumers have never lost a nickel. Yes, we've had businesses that failed, we've had some bad apples that have absconded with some money, but in every case consumers have been fully compensated from a fund that is established under the former act, or the act that's now in place. So it did provide real, true consumer protection for their funds, and nothing less is acceptable in this act for either funerals or cemeteries or any of the other parts of the sector.

So with that, Mr Speaker, I thank you very much for your forbearance.

The Acting Speaker: Members will now have up to two minutes for questions or comments.

Mr Michael Prue (Beaches-East York): I listened to the two previous speakers, the members for Essex and Algoma-Manitoulin, with some considerable enthusiasm, actually, considering the topic, which I didn't think I was going to enjoy at all.

The member for Essex spoke about a great many things during the 30 or so minutes he spoke, but what hit home the most to me was the whole concept that this government may again invoke closure on a matter that really requires a huge amount of public input. He set it out, but I think it bears repeating: we need to look at a whole broad group of people—those who run municipalities, those who run cemeteries, those who run funeral homes, and faith groups—who have to date not had sufficient public opportunity to debate the merits of the bill or the changes that might be necessary. He set it out very well and I'd like to commend him for that. He also went on to talk about how many of the commenting agencies or groups have not had an opportunity to bring forward to the government in a meaningful way those changes they want to see contained within the bill, and I think primary among all the groups he talked about were the municipalities and the Association of Municipalities of Ontario.

The speaker from Algoma-Manitoulin talked most cogently about the problem of small municipalities, that we need to bear in mind that many of the cemeteries and funeral parlours in small municipalities may be adversely affected, although the large municipal services may be able to weather any change. The small municipalities may find themselves at a point where they have to shut down cemeteries and places of final resting. Since many of them are historic and are the only places available in those towns, we need to protect them.

I commend the two speakers for what they had to say.

Hon Norman W. Sterling (Minister of Transportation): I've been involved in this particular area, once as the minister in 1995-96 and, more recently, in 2000-01. I can remember going back as far as 20, 25 years and trying to unravel an unbelievable mangled mess in terms of who is responsible and who can do what and who can do whatever. I was really pleased, when I went back to the ministry the second time through, that Bob Runciman had appointed the Honourable George Adams to negotiate and mediate with all the different groups that were involved. Out of that mediation, this bill has arisen. I want to assure each and every member of this Legislature that there is no political agenda behind any part of this bill. This is truly a mediated solution to a mess that didn't make sense to either the people in the industry or the consumer.

Therefore, I plead with the opposition members—yes, I think we should have hearings on this if that's what you feel comfortable with. There's no fear on our part about the outcome because the outcome should be whatever the consumer and the industry want. But let's not spend three or four days on second reading and then force the government to a closure motion and try—it's a waste of everybody's time. Let's pass this bill on second reading, put it out to committee and we will have public hearings under those circumstances. But if we're forced to the other, then why bother? We have consulted very, very widely, actually for not only the past two, three, four years, but really we've talked about this for 20 years. Let's get on with it. Let's do it in a logical sense.

Mr Dwight Duncan (Windsor-St Clair): I'm pleased to have the opportunity to respond to my colleagues from Essex and Algoma-Manitoulin. I say to the Minister of Transportation that this bill would have lent itself, ideally, to going to committee after first reading, because you're absolutely right: this is not the type of bill that lends itself necessarily to partisanship, and I realize the complexity of the issues it deals with. But I can say this: based on the conversations I've had over the last couple of days, whoever was consulted—and a number of the people I've talked to who were consulted—they don't like it and they're urging us not to support it. That's why I think this bill would have lent itself well to committee after first reading and spared the time in the House on second reading, to see if the opposition could work with the government to piece together something that would hold up.

My colleague from Essex mentioned by way of example the small, independent monument maker who has to pay PST on every aspect of what he does. Perhaps that company should have an exemption, as do the non-profits and the cemeteries in the same business. The list of these problems with the legislation goes on and on and on.

My colleagues, in indicating that the official opposition will not vote in favour of this legislation, have given us, I think, good direction. I regret that the government did not use the provisions of the standing orders to send this bill to committee after first reading. Perhaps tonight we could have been debating pension surpluses, which—well, actually, we couldn't tonight. You forced closure on that last Thursday before we really had a chance to debate it. This would have, I would argue, lent itself to that process. Perhaps now we can go to committee.

But it's just an example of mismanagement. This government is mismanaging that whole file as well, at least based on the conversations we've had. My colleagues have put it very well: you can't support this bill in its current form.

Hon Mr Hudak: I'm pleased to respond to my colleagues opposite. The member for Windsor indicated that it didn't lend itself to a partisan process, and he ended up being quite partisan in his comments.

This is not, per se, a bill the government created that I or my predecessors had pulled out of thin air and brought forward. In fact, this has come about, as my colleague Minister Sterling said, after decades of consultation, with this government over three years with a very broad round table, with representatives from funeral services, from cemeteries, from transfer services, from monument builders, the small businesses, consumer groups as well, with that consumer protection mandate, and as such, tried to develop a consensus on principles on these issues. Sure, there's always going to be give and take in that process. Would everybody say they got 100% of what they wanted? No, I don't think any group would say they got 100% of what they wanted, because it's give and take. Would they say they got 90% of what they wanted? I bet you that the vast majority would say they got 90% of what they wanted through this process. It has been a very non-partisan, well-thought-out, well-reasoned process that has been highly consultative.

I got a nice letter from the Honourable George Adams, the justice who had helped with this process. We're indebted to him. He says, "The parties and ministry staff are to be commended for a job well done. On BSAC's"—that's the committee—"behalf and speaking personally, I also want to thank you for your ongoing support," for that committee completing its central task.

They passed on the BSAC report, which, he says, because of those "in attendance at all BSAC meetings, outlines a workable framework for the sector now supported by a very broad consensus." I want to make clear that the principles of the report were, to a one, incorporated in the legislation before the House.

Also in the letter of November 23, 2001, he says, "I am pleased to report that all outstanding differences in principle between the parties were bridged at a final meeting of BSAC held on September 13, 2001." So a great deal of work was done at that committee, and I thank Justice Adams and the participants.

The Acting Speaker: Now one of the two original speakers may take up to two minutes and respond.

Mr Brown: I appreciate what the Minister of Transportation and the minister with carriage of this bill just said, and I agree: this does not need to be a partisan exercise. Frankly, it's too important for us to be getting into the trenches and putting on our red and blue sweat-shirts and going at it. But I think the ministers need to agree that the opposition, or frankly the private members of this Legislature on all sides, have not been privy to these discussions. We do not have the submissions from the various groups that, as he said so eloquently, acquiesced. We are facing a bill that was presented—the first time we could read it was last Thursday, and we are supposed to be here Monday night saying, “Boy, you guys did a great job. Thank you very much.” We wouldn't be doing our job if that were the case, and you know it.

What I'm suggesting to you is a suggestion my House leader made. There's no reason now that we can't take this out—we don't have to continue with second reading. You could take it back to first and we could take it out. Let's go to committee, let's hear what the people have to say about this. I'm particularly interested. I haven't been contacted, and neither has my colleague from Essex, as far as I know, by any consumer group to say what their views on this were. We may know what some of the industry views were, but we do not know what the various consumer groups, maybe memorial societies or other groups, might have to say about this.

All we want is some information, some consideration and some time in committee so we can make, as private members on all sides of the House, intelligent judgments on this piece of legislation. I think that's not too much to ask.

The Acting Speaker: It is now time for the leadoff debate of the third party.

Mr Prue: Mr Speaker, I'm going to ask as the first item that our leadoff be stood down, with the consent of the others. The speaker for our leadoff is not available this evening, and I would propose that I be allowed to speak for 20 minutes as the second speaker.

The Acting Speaker: There's a request for unanimous consent to stand down the leadoff debate of the third party. Is it agreed? I hear no opposition; therefore, I'll declare the request and motion made. The member for Beaches-East York may now take the floor for a regular 20-minute speech.

Mr Prue: Thank you very much, Mr Speaker. It is indeed a privilege to stand here tonight to talk about Bill 209 and what we believe is necessary for this bill to be a success. Quite honestly, when I was first asked to speak to this, for an hour or perhaps for 20 minutes, I thought, what could one possibly say to a bill of this nature? It seemed to me to be totally uninteresting, and I did not relish the thought of speaking to it at all. But having done some research and having read the provisions of the bill, this is quite an interesting document—interesting to anyone who relishes municipal input, who has a sense of history about the cemeteries in this province and even someone who is interested in small family business. There's a little of each of these elements to all of it.

But what one is left with at the end, in looking at this bill, the overwhelming thing that jumps out at you is that there is a necessity here, an overwhelming need, for there to be public input—public input that has not been received in a way that is necessary for this bill.

I welcomed hearing the Minister of Transportation, when he spoke in his two-minute commentary, saying that he has no objection—and I take it from that that the government has no objection—to sending this to committee. Surely, if ever there was a time for a bill to go, this is a bill that cries out to go to committee. It cries out for all those people who might be commenting agencies, all those groups that might want to comment, but also for the general public. I think the public in large measure will be caught completely unaware by the contents of this bill, perhaps even more unaware than I was before I had a chance to read it, because contained within the body of this bill are some massive and fundamental changes to how the business of burying the dead has been done in this province for at least a century: massive changes to our Cemeteries Act, massive changes to our taxation act, massive changes to how the public will come to see the funerary services provided in Ontario.

As has been said by other speakers, we are taking two acts that have existed probably for a century—the Funeral Directors and Establishments Act and the Cemeteries Act—and we are melding them, changing them, giving them new force and new life in order to change them in a way that is fundamental to the entire funeral business in this province. It has been in place literally for years. Within what was in place up until today and up until the promulgation of this act, it was impossible for cemeteries to do funeral home business and it was equally impossible for funeral homes to do cemetery business. What we're seeing today is a new act which will allow each group to go into the field of the other. It will allow each group to take business on to themselves that heretofore they never had an opportunity to do. We have to, I suggest, proceed with some degree of caution to make sure that something that has worked well for the people of Ontario for 100 years—if change must take place, then it must take place, but we have to proceed with caution to make sure that that which has been understood by everyone in our society is done correctly. This is not a time for us to be rash. There is no need to be rash. There is nothing to be gained by not sending this to committee and there is everything to be lost by not listening to all those who are affected, all the groups: the municipalities, the funeral directors, the cemeteries, the church groups and even the general public, who will be affected. It's sure that at one time or another in their lives or their loved ones' lives they will be affected by the changes we are making here today.

It has been suggested that all the problems may be solved by way of regulation. But with the greatest of respect, those who are out there and those who are on this side of the House are not willing to wait for the regulations.

Mr Marchese: Or to trust.

Mr Prue: Or to trust, perhaps. The regulations will come and there will be no force and effect from this side of the House, no force and effect from the general public. It will be done by ministerial fiat, as is the law, and that is not in keeping in terms of making this into a policy that can be accepted by everyone.

In fact, there are those who have stated to us on this side of House, to us in the New Democratic Party, that they believe the regulations may be weighted to those who have pecuniary interests, those who have the money and the wherewithal to make the changes. There are those who have stated to us categorically that they believe the changes will pose a significant threat to family businesses that have operated for one, two, three and sometimes even more generations in this province, primarily the family businesses and funeral parlours in cities, towns and villages throughout Ontario.

There are many commenting agencies that have set down their concerns. I'd just like to go through some of them here today. The faith groups have stated they have some very real problems with this bill. They believe the contents of the bill have been stacked in favour of for-profits—that is, what has been done will make much more sense to those groups out there in the funeral and cemetery business who are there to make a profit. Now, that is not a dirty word, not to anyone. It is not, because people are in business to make a profit. It's how they feed themselves and their families. It is how they do business. It is the whole concept of being independent. But it is believed by some in the faith groups that the bill is stacked in favour of the for-profits and against the religious institutions and municipalities.

Many of the small churches, secondarily, are worried about the potential of taxes. They are worried that they will have to pay taxes when they did not have to pay any in the past. They are worried about their ability to do so. A classic example—a parishioner from St John's Norway church in Beaches-East York approached me just the other day and talked about that cemetery plot. I know it well. My great-grandmother and my father-in-law are buried there. She was very concerned about the ability of that church, that parish, that group of individuals to sustain the cemetery in the long term if they are going to have to pay taxes. St John's Norway has provided graves for many people for whom they received no funds at the time of interment and receive no funds today. This struck home to me, because my great-grandmother—her name was Rachel Gillead—is buried in that churchyard. She is buried in what today we would call a pauper's grave. It is three-deep. Two other members of her extended family are buried in the same grave. There is no headstone. I am given to understand that they were all buried because the church allowed it although there was no money for headstones, the plot or anything else. In fact, that church maintains that site and has maintained it since her death some 50 years ago. I'm not sure how long my other extended relatives have been there, but they were there even before that. That is the problem some of the faith groups have.

In terms of the independent funeral establishments, we have heard from them, particularly in the urban and small urban areas, that they believe they will have a problem, that they will not have access to cemeteries because all the land is swallowed up in places like Toronto, Ottawa and Hamilton. There's no land available to them so they can make the transition from funeral directors to cemeteries, whereas the cemeteries will have a much easier job going after the funeral parlours, because of course the land is secured and to simply get a building is much easier. They have a little bit of a problem with that.

They also have a problem with the big independents coming in, that they might be crowded out by one-stop service, where people think they're making it easy upon themselves to go and get one-stop service even if they do end up having to pay slightly more for it. It's much more convenient for bereaved families to simply go in, sit down with one person and make the whole deal rather than sit down with two.

We see the problems of medium-sized urban municipalities as well. They are most fearful, as they have commented to us, about corporate funeral establishments coming in to invade their markets. They are worried about big American, multinational and even big Canadian funeral establishments coming into smaller-city Ontario and taking over what was once family businesses.

We have the whole problem, which has been mentioned to us by many people, of the training of funeral directors. Right now they receive extensive training, and it is not clear from this bill whether people who work in cemeteries or in ancillary fields will be given the same kind of training, the training to be sympathetic; I think that is a learned trait as well as one that is heartfelt. There's a concern about the reduced trust one might have in funeral directors, who do not work on a commission basis and are oftentimes known to the people, either through family members, extended relatives, or friends or community; oftentimes families will go back to the same home again and again. What will happen if that trust is ever reduced?

They have talked about the tax regime for municipalities and whether the municipalities will be able to afford the additional taxes that will come upon them, or the lost revenue, on the other hand, that they may encounter should the municipal cemeteries be reduced in size, volume or scope.

They talk about the visitation centres, which will be given, under this bill, a five-year tax reprieve. This was something I found rather unique, because I hadn't realized they were going to be given a five-year tax reprieve. They have operated on the fringe—if not illegally, at least on the fringe—for a number of years, and now they're about to be rewarded. I take some solace and some understanding from a most unlikely group, probably, for a New Democrat to quote. We have here a letter from the Federation of Independent Business, 100,000 members strong and growing—

Mr Duncan: Old friends of yours.

Mr Prue: Old friends, and they make a very good point. This is a letter they wrote to Minister Hudak on September 20, 2002. It's a two-page letter; I'll just read the third-last paragraph into the record. It says, "Operators of existing 'visitation centres' on cemetery property and existing crematoria are being rewarded through a 'grandfathering' arrangement. So-called visitation centres operating as unregulated funeral sites confers an ongoing benefit to those who chose to break the rules. Crematoria will also be granted a continued five-year reprieve from taxes, a clear advantage over any new business proposed."

I'm not sure. This could be wrong; I don't know. But I believe that they should have an opportunity to speak to this issue, and that is what I'm saying, to go back to that. This is important that we go back.

We also have the whole problem of consumers. They need to be satisfied that there will be competition, because if this bill in fact does not increase competition; if it in any way reduces competition; if it closes down the number of cemeteries; if it reduces the number of funeral parlours because big multinationals come in with very large facilities; then in the end the consumer will not be the one who benefits. So what we are saying is that we need to be assured, and the public needs to be assured through the public process, that this is going to work and will in fact allow for more competition.

Most important, the problems that have been put forward by the Association of Municipalities of Ontario need to be canvassed. Most recently an Alert went out, a communication to all of the 480 or so municipalities in Ontario. This Alert went out on November 21, 2002, just four days ago, and it went to every single one of them. I think it's quite telling. In that Alert, about Bill 209, the Funeral, Burial and Cremation Services Act, which was just released that day, the Association of Municipalities of Ontario says, "On November 23, 2001, Bereavement Sector Advisory Committee ... submitted its report to the Minister of Consumer and Business Services. The report offered a number of recommendations aimed at meeting the minister's objectives, claiming it had broad consensus from committee members. However, municipal representatives on the committee have indicated that a broad consensus does not exist and a number of recommendations have the potential to negatively impact municipalities."

I believe they need to be heard, and what the municipalities and AMO have said on this very topic is important to all people. AMO is saying I think fundamentally that the abandonment of cemeteries to local municipalities, which could happen if they no longer remain profitable—church groups give them up, towns take them over—will cause a real problem to the municipalities and a real problem with their being able to deal with the social safety net. Many churches and religious groups are being able to provide cemetery services for the indigent and for the poor, and the municipalities may have to take this over. We know the municipalities are bleeding in many respects—from transit to hospitals to education—we know that there is a whole problem of housing and a lack of municipal revenue. Please don't add another one without hearing them.

They have also said there is a failure to guarantee funding or financial tools for abandoned cemeteries, so that if and when cemeteries are abandoned the municipalities will have a problem in paying to keep them going. They have said, third, that there is an unlevel playing field being established by this act that they would like to comment on. They do not believe that it is in the municipal interest for it to proceed as it is.

They have stated, fourth, that the requirement will be for the municipalities to tax themselves. This is rather unusual, that they would tax themselves, but then the really unusual problem, as they see, is that the money would have to be turned over to a bereavement fund and not to the municipal reserves. At present I understand that some of the money may go to the municipal reserves, but this is money that offsets taxes for those who are still living, as opposed to turning it over to a bereavement fund.

Hon Mr Clark: You've got two minutes. Give me something positive.

Mr Prue: I am, I am. The tax incentives for additional cemeteries may go to the abandoned cemeteries. So the tax incentives that municipalities used to get may not be there.

They believe also that it may create unfavourable market conditions for consumers, although they have not expanded on this for me to know why they think this.

Last but not least, they say that allowing a single regulatory body is not in the consumers' interests or in the interests of church groups or municipalities.

Having said all that, is there something positive? Of course there is something positive. When you take an old act or two acts that are 100 years old—just like the Municipal Act, when I first got here—when you take an old act and attempt to reform it, you cannot help but do some good things with it. I believe there is an honest and sincere effort being made here to do something good with those acts, to bring Ontario into the 21st century, to do what is necessary to assist the consumers and to bring reality to a changing funeral market and a cemetery market and a market where people are choosing to be cremated. But it needs to be done with slowness; it needs to be done with consultation; it needs to be done with all of the stakeholders being present; and quite frankly it needs to be done with a great deal of public sympathy and an opportunity for groups to come forward.

This is a bill that, as I believe I said earlier, sparked no interest in me until I started to read it and to go into the history of it and the economics of it and all the other things that are contained within this bill. It's an important bill that I believe the general public and the communities abroad in Ontario need to discuss. I would suggest to the minister that it would not be untoward to schedule as much as a week of hearings on this. I would not have said this—

Hon Mr Hudak: I thought you said four weeks.

Mr Prue: Four weeks, if you want.

I would not have said this prior to my reading of this bill yesterday and today.

Hon Mr Clark: You just don't want to go home for Christmas.

Mr Prue: Yes, I do. I want to go home very much for Christmas, but I also want the people of Ontario to have the opportunity to comment on this, and they can only do it if you proceed to the committee stage, and not to closure as you have done on other bills. So I'm asking you to do that.

The Acting Speaker: Members now have up to two minutes for questions and comments.

Mr R. Gary Stewart (Peterborough): I too want to make some comments on this. Much like the member from Algoma-Manitoulin, I also am a licensed funeral director and retain my licence on a yearly basis, so I too feel that I have a little bit of knowledge on this, having graduated in 1960, which seems like a long time ago, from the University of Toronto and the Banting Institute, the latter of which no longer exists.

Interjection: The minister wasn't born.

Mr Stewart: The minister wasn't born then; that's right.

I want to make a comment about when I listened to folks saying there was no consultation on this particular bill. I was asked by the then minister, who would be Minister Sterling, to chair a group, along with my co-chair, the member from Lambton-Sarnia, Marcel Beaubien, and we had a group of about a dozen and a half people there. They represented the funeral industry, funeral homes; they represented cemeterians, both public and private, as well as church cemeteries; we had public advocates on it; we had members from the memorial society, from the various cemetery associations; we had members from the monument field as well. So we had good representation, excellent consultation for about a dozen to 15 times, and we came up with recommendations that were passed on to Judge Adams, who was later appointed. Indeed, Judge Adams confirmed many of the recommendations that we arrived at, the consensus from these people. Those recommendations are in this bill and I will speak to them later on.

Mr Dave Levac (Brant): I appreciate the opportunity to lend my two-minute toward the member from Beaches-East York, who outlined very importantly the concerns and some of the issues that have been brought to light after his reading of the bill—and the members from Essex and Manitoulin.

Member Stewart indicated the consultation, and I want him to know that what I did in my riding when I received the package, which was graciously sent to each MPP, in terms of the consultation papers. I did forward them to all of those who were involved in this, including the city, who own cemetery plots, and the Catholic Church etc. I want him to know that we received information back. They started setting up meetings with me in my constituency office because this was the first time they'd heard about it. By sending it to them—I don't know why they wouldn't have gotten a copy. But this consultation process that everyone seems to want to talk about and take credit for needs to process a little bit better than that, because quite frankly a lot of the areas that I'm representing did not know what was going on and were quite surprised about what was happening.

The members on this side believe, and I know that the Minister of Transportation has even indicated, that going to committee is the right thing to do because there is going to be need for more input from the people who are affected by this. Because we do that, what we're now saying is that there is a process problem and, very similar to what's been happening to many other bills, the claim of consultation always gets laid in the front and the bill gets drafted and then, bang, you get that time allocation, where there's no possible reason why we shouldn't be adding that extra time after the legislation is finished to ensure that those who are going to be directly affected have an opportunity for input.

When we don't get that process started right from the beginning, what's always going to happen is that you're going to alienate an awful lot of the people who need to give input on it—consumer groups. Particularly in my riding, not one of them had an opportunity to answer the concern for the consultation. I'm hoping that we'll improve that process.

Interjections.

The Acting Speaker: We don't seem to be quite ready. I was trying to get you to be quiet, and I guess I was failing. So please be quiet.

Mr Marchese: I wanted to congratulate the member from Beaches-East York for raising the concerns, which is our job, right? I was listening to the Minister of Transportation. Perhaps I didn't hear him very well, but I don't remember the Minister of Transportation, when he was here on this side and we were there, standing up and saying, "Yeah, you guys consulted so much on employment equity. Let's just get it out for a day or two and that's all we're going to need for that bill."

Hon Mr Sterling: Yes, we did.

Mr Marchese: No, no, Normie. And I don't remember on rent control your standing up and saying, "Yeah, you guys consulted for years with the tenants. We don't need any more debate. Just send it out for a day and we're quite happy with that." I don't remember your standing up—

Hon Mr Sterling: Your memory is failing.

Mr Marchese: No, no, Norm.

Interjection.

Mr Marchese: We gave you four weeks for employment equity to beat us up on your equity bill, as you called it, right? We gave you four weeks to beat us up on the rent control act so you could go out with the guys, the greasy guys, to get them to beat us up as well. Four long weeks we gave you. You weren't standing up in line to say, "We know you consulted. Let's just get through this right away."

Mr Bill Murdoch (Bruce-Grey-Owen Sound): We beat you up for five long years.

Mr Marchese: I do remember that.

Norm, I've got to tell you, we're not asking for four weeks on this bill, because we're reasonable folks, but at least a couple of days so people could be heard. That is our job, and remember, we don't have a consumer watchdog to do the job for us. The minister says, "Leave it to me." No, Minister, we can't leave that job to you. People don't trust you guys to be their consumer watchdogs, right? We're advocating for a consumer watchdog in every sector imaginable, because I'm telling you, unless you've got a consumer watchdog—he ain't so very good at protecting, no siree.

So we need hearings. We need people to be heard. That's all we're advocating, so people can come and raise their concerns so that we can hear them.

Hon Mr Hudak: We should probably step back a couple of years. I think what my predecessors used to hear would be a group coming forward maybe from the funeral services industry—and I'm going to exaggerate for the sake of the argument—saying, "We want this changed, this changed, and that changed, but don't change anything for the cemeteries or for the religious sector or for the municipalities." And the cemetery guys would come forward and say, "Make this change, allow combinations, but don't do what the funeral guys want, or don't do what the municipalities want, or don't do what the faith community wants." Then the municipalities would come forward—you get the point, I think.

Instead, in his wisdom, Minister Sterling set up the advisory committee with Justice Adams, and had all the players around the table to try to build consensus on the principles, whether it's consumers or cemeteries or funeral services. Yes, there's give and take in any part of that process, but I think at the end of the day folks got more of what they wanted and much further than the mess that had happened before, the one-on-one lobbying. So I think the process was outstanding.

And to be clear, the member opposite brought up some points. Yes, the municipally-owned funeral parlour or visitation centre, what have you, would have to pay taxes. You could say that's a criticism of the bill. But if there's an independent small business across the street from that funeral home, competing against the municipality, I think it's only fair that they would pay taxes equally on the property; the same on the faith-based community if they're running a funeral home or a monument builder or a casket maker—it's a level playing field. It's fair, and I would hope the members would support that.

Secondly, the member opposite talked about a five-year holiday for visitation centres and such. To be clear, that's not in the legislation. I think if he had a chance to review it, he would probably see that visitation centres or casket makers or monument builders on cemetery property would pay property taxes right away. There is an exception for existing crematoria that have historically never paid. New ones would pay taxes, and the rest after a five-year transition period.

The Acting Speaker: The member for Beaches-East York has up to two minutes to respond.

Mr Prue: I would thank the member from Trinity-Spadina, the member from Peterborough, the Minister for Consumer and Business Services, and the member from Brant.

Much has been said, but I'd like to go back to the primary thrust of my argument, and that is that we need to do further consultation. As much as the members opposite say that there is nothing wrong with the bill—and perhaps there is nothing wrong—there are people out there who need to assuage their fears, there are people out there who have a fundamental need to talk about what should be contained within the bill. There are municipalities that may be financially impacted by this bill in terms of taxes or their operations. There are problems with independent industry within the funeral parlours. There are problems with the cemeteries themselves, that they need to be able to make sure they will operate in a way which will be in the community interest. This is particularly true of small cemeteries and in rural and northern communities. We need to make sure that all of those places remain open and remain accessible to the people who continually go to visit them, either for peace and solitude or to visit loved ones and the gravesites of loved ones. We cannot for a moment simply turn our back on 100 years of history in this province and on circumstances that have worked, I think, to the betterment of most people.

Most people, if you would ask them today, have really had very few or no problems when having to bury a loved one. There are complaints from time to time—and I will acknowledge them—there is a need for the legislation to upgrade and to be brought into the 21st century because of changes that are taking place in funerary practice, but it can and must be done slowly, and I would ask the members opposite to ensure that there is at a minimum at least one week of hearings so the public can satisfy themselves that it is in the best interests.

The Acting Speaker: It now being well after 9:30, this House stands adjourned until 1:30 of the clock tomorrow afternoon.

The House adjourned at 2133.
